If Washington, if Jefferson, if Lincoln, if Davis, if Grant, if Lee—if all our great statesmen and patriots of former generations could press back the veil that hides us from that mysterious realm where they have taken their places "in the silent halls of death" and speak a word of warning to the American people that would echo throughout the "illimitable void of space" until it drowned all other sounds to silence, their unanimous admonition would be—as it has always been—"Keep America out of European wars."

If Woodrow Wilson, after being disillusioned as he was by his bitter experiences with the hatreds, the animosities, the intrigues, the duplicities, and the ingratitudes of Europe, could peer through the eternal mists and utter one word of fatherly advice to the people of this country, that word would be to, "Keep America out of this war."

If the gray-haired fathers and mothers who gave their sons in the last war, including the ones who have sunk in heart-broken silence to untimely graves, could make their voices heard, they would appeal to every Member of Congress to, "Keep America out of this war."

If the voiceless thousands of our patriotic dead who went down in the last war, including the Unknown Soldier who sleeps in Arlington's sacred tomb, could "wipe the grave dust from their palled brows" and come forth "in tattered robes of bony whiteness" to utter one word in the cause of their country, for which they died, it would be an appeal to, "Keep America out of this war."

God give us the wisdom to see the right and the courage to do our duty when we see it, that we may hold aloft the American flag and perpetuate American institutions to bless the coming generations as they have blessed our own. May the spirits of the immortal founders of this Republic guide and sustain us during the trying months that lie ahead. And may we, the recipients of American liberty—that proud heritage of patriotism, conceived in the minds of the greatest statesmen the world has ever produced, guarded and protected by the undying loyalty of a noble ancestry—may we forever preserve and defend that liberty in our time and transmit it unimpaired to our posterity, that this grand old Republic may go down to the future with strength in her loins, hope in her soul, and the Miriam song of triumph on her lips. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, it takes a lifetime for a man to build up an honorable character. It takes but a moment to destroy it.

A few minutes ago I heard the reputation of the general counsel of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bitterly assailed. I happened to have studied the workings of the distinguished, brilliant, and eminent general counsel of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Claude Hamilton, Jr. He is one of the most indefatigable and persevering workers, one of the most assiduous and persistent caretakers of the rights of the people of our Nation, and one of the most indomitable public servants in the service of the Government of the United States.

He is a disciple of the present Justice of Supreme Court Hugo Black. He has endeared himself to all who have come into intimate contact with him for his gentlemanliness, for his kindness, and for his humanitarian services. While I do not desire to subtract anything that the previous speakers might have said about the drought, I am sure if they would contact this genial and able general counsel of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation he will do everything that is compatible with law and dignity to serve the cause that they represent. [Applause.]

THE ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the record roll call vote of the Members who voted to adjourn a few moments ago, like Banquo's ghost, will never die. It will rise to haunt many Members who voted to adjourn, not only those from the drought-suffering districts but those from many other districts. In view of the many important distressing and perplexing problems, domestic and foreign, which confront our country and our countrymen, the Congress should remain in session and help in their solution.

With reference to the complaint that was made after the sine die adjournment resolution was agreed to, I believe that if the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] had voted against the resolution to adjourn so that this Congress could remedy the situation about which he complained, he would have been rendering far better service to the drought-afflicted areas of America. Action by Congress and not mere vocal protests after adjournment on drought relief and many other important problems is what the people want and are entitled to receive. Voting to adjourn and then protesting about administrative ills which Congress should and can cure reminds me of locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM, OF VIRGINIA, AT ROANOKE, VA., SEPTEMBER 18, 1939

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address made by me over the radio on September 18, 1939, as follows:

An American patriot once said of a pending crisis, "These are times that try men's souls." Certainly the sentiment applies with full force and effect to the present hour. Once again greed and ruthless thirst for power have unleased the hounds of war and civilization plunges headlong into another conflict, the extent or ultimate effect of which no one can predict. It is impossible to conceive that such a situation could come about. Past experiences have shown us that no one can win; that everyone will lose; and no human language can picture the sorrow, suffering, and distress—to say nothing of the economic and spiritual losses that will ensue—and yet * * * on we go. The rapid spread and enlargement of this conflagration in the past 2 weeks has shown us in a very vivid way that no one can predict just what it will amount to, or when or where it will end. History will show, however, that it was unavoidable, that the "madman of Germany" would listen to no reason or logic, and would be satisfied with nothing short of the imposition of his iron will upon the people of the world by force. Certain it is that Great Britain and France, as well as our own Nation, wanted peace. This war to these countries, as well as to all of the nations, can mean but one ultimate thing, and that is irreparable loss.

The question uppermost in the minds of every American citizen today is, Can America keep out of this war? As the matter stands at the moment, I think the question can be very definitely answered in the affirmative. If you mean by keeping out of the war, can we avoid any aggressive action against other nations which will necessitate the sending of troops to foreign soil—then certainly the answer is "yes." We will keep out of that kind of war. Those of you who heard Elmer Davis in his broadcast Sunday morning will remember that he made a very pertinent observation: "That while America certainly would keep out of the war, the real question would be perhaps whether we could keep the war out of America." This is very definitely an element in the situation which we must not overlook in charting our course of conduct as a nation in this crisis.

I have just returned from the Nation's Capital, where, in connection with my duties, I came in contact with leaders in the legislative branch of the Government, in the State Department, and of the press. I can say this to you very positively, and I hope it will be reassuring: That no person connected with this Government in any official capacity has any other thought at the moment than that America should and will keep out of this war. Certainly that is the passionate desire of the President of the United States. Every official act of the administration, in my judgment, has been to the end that American neutrality shall be a very real proposition and that we must be careful to guard our position in that respect. For my own part, I have adopted a slogan for this crisis. There is nothing particularly new or novel about it, but I believe it represents the sentiments of my constituents and feel confident that it expresses the thought of an overwhelming majority of the American citizens. It is this: "Keep America safe for Americans in America." I commend this sentiment to your careful consideration. In whatever may come before Congress and in whatever official action I may be called upon to take as your representative, this shall be my guiding star. I feel very keenly the responsibility that is mine as your representative in Congress during this critical period. The peace, the security, the welfare of America, in my judgment, transcends all other considerations. So far as I am concerned, political considerations are "out of the window" until the war clouds have passed away. My official action is going to be governed solely by what, in my humble judgment, will be for the peace and security of America.

In connection with America's position in this crisis, there are several matters that I would like to comment upon briefly.

First. Our neutrality.

We all agree that America must stay out of this conflict. There is no difference of opinion on that score. There is some difference of opinion as to whether the present so-called neutrality, or the revision which the President has requested, will best serve our purpose to remain neutral and stay out of this war. What is neutrality? I think we mean by the word "neutral" that we will not take aggressive action, that we will not actively discriminate between belligerents, and that we will not permit our territory or our property to be used by one belligerent against another. I believe that sort of neutrality can and will be enforced in America. We should not, however, put a strained or unnatural construction on the word "neutrality" so as to have it mean that we must be indifferent to the happenings in this conflict, and that we must be unconcerned as to its ultimate outcome. That is not and cannot be the sentiment of the American people. A newspaper reporter remarked to me the other day, very pertinently, that in his judgment 90 percent of the American people were emphatically favorable to the cause represented by Great Britain, France, and Poland and that they wished to see them succeed. Yet, that same 90 percent of our citizenship are in favor of "America keeping out of this war. Remember now * * * we are making America safe for Americans, in America. Therefore, I do not believe our country should, or would get into this conflict to protect business interests abroad, nor should we as a nation be involved with some other power for safety of adventuresome American citizens traveling in foreign lands, or upon belligerent ships, after repeated warnings not to do so. They should do that at their own risk and not put our country in a position of having to pick a quarrel because of their indiscretion.

The President has called Congress to meet in a special session. The big issue will be a revision of the Neutrality Act. It is most unfortunate that this action was not taken at the regular session of Congress, as suggested by the President. It could have been done then without embarrassment. Personally, I voted for the bill that passed the House, as did every other Virginia Representative. I shall vote for revision in the coming session, as I am emphatically of the opinion that by so doing we will come nearer having a real neutrality law that will protect the safety and security of our own country. While heartily agreeing to the sentiment that we have no business getting mixed up in this brawl, I confess I am unable to find much of a convincing nature in the arguments against neutrality revision. Some of our friends seem to suddenly have a bad case of jitters, for fear we will offend someone. Just what might we do to "get us into war"—and with whom? Now, let's be a bit realistic about the matter. Every thoughtful citizen knows full well that the continued peace and security of our own country, and our ability to stay out of war, may to a very large extent depend upon the outcome of the present conflict in Europe and Asia. What are we supposed to do? Pull down the shades, turn out the lights, and crawl under the bed? Is it possible that there are those amongst us who are so credulous as believe that the German dictator entertains any regard for the American Government, or that he would hesitate a split instant to take any action of any sort against America or her interests if he thought it would serve his purpose? Must we not know that if the time ever comes that Germany or her allies wish to mix it with America—and such time will most likely never come—that it will make no earthly difference whether we have sold supplies to belligerents? Or what our attitude has been? Does not the record show that to Herr Hitler international law means nothing? Treaties mere scraps of paper? And that his will is superior to the laws of man or God? As Great Britain and France have vividly realized, the only thing that will stop him is superior force; let us not emulate the stupidity of the ostrich and seek to avoid facing the coming storm by burying our heads in the sand.

Now, just what is involved in the neutrality fight?

In the first place, let us remember that if there were no neutrality law upon the statute books of America, and we were governed entirely by international law and custom, it would be lawful for America as a neutral nation to have unrestricted trade and commerce of every description with all belligerent nations. We could load munitions of war on our own ships and send them to Great Britain and France, or any other belligerent, taking the chance, of course, of having them destroyed at sea, with resulting international complications. Under the neutrality law, which is now in existence, we can sell to belligerent nations food, clothing, iron, steel, and many of the other commodities and materials which are necessary to nations in war; but cannot sell, under any circumstances or conditions, guns, airplanes, or any munitions.

Right at this point let us dispose of the chief argument of the opposition to revision. They say our Army and Navy will follow the war goods sold to belligerents; that such sales will lead us into war. That would be a most potent argument if we intended to sell the supplies, load them on ships flying the American flag, and manned by American seamen, and deliver such supplies to the purchaser in foreign ports. Of course, in such a case an American ship loaded with goods at that time belonging to Americans and manned by American seamen would be attacked and destroyed—then international complications would arise. But we propose to do no such thing. The purchaser must pay cash and come to the American port and get his goods in his own ship and under his own flag. If he gets into trouble after he leaves our shores that's his business. Such a transaction is perfectly in accord with American custom—with international law * * * and it's silly to talk of it getting us into war. Not only that, but our country, and its trade and commerce are entitled to benefit by the favorable economic position we occupy as a neutral. Farm and factory and labor are entitled to the benefit of the trade that by all rules of law or morality may come to our shores.

Now let us remember right at this point that it oftentimes happens that a belligerent nation, because of economic conditions or geographic location, may reap very great benefit from the neutrality of another nation. This can be very readily shown by the situation that Italy occupies today. Perhaps the greatest service that she can render to Germany at the moment is to remain a neutral nation, because by so doing her frontiers are closed to Great Britain and France, which means that perhaps the only practicable opportunity that these nations would have to reach Poland would be across Italian territory. Under our so-called Neutrality Act as it stands today, Germany is very decidedly and definitely favored. For economic and geographic reasons, Germany would not likely—under any circumstances—want American planes, but Great Britain, France, and Canada have now unfilled orders in America for airplanes and other defense implements. Our so-called present neutrality denies to these nations the right to purchase these necessary implements of war. Now, where does this lead us? Germany has rushed headlong into this war, after years of feverish preparations. Nothing could stop her. It was forced upon Great Britain and France. They have tried in every conceivable way to promote peace and to avoid war. They have not spent their time and energy in building up a huge war machine, as has Germany. Our present so-called neutrality, which denies these democracies the right to buy our supplies, is a most flagrant and unjust discrimination against these democracies and in favor of the aggressor in this sorry business. It just doesn't make sense.

What do we propose to do if the law is amended?

We propose, as I have said, to say to all of the belligerent nations that they may purchase our commodities in America for cash, but that they must load them upon their own ships and be responsible for their transportation to their own countries. There is no way that such a policy can involve us with any other belligerent nation. Now let us be perfectly frank about the matter. If, as a matter of practical effect because of our neutral position, Great Britain, France, and Poland are in an advantageous position in this conflict * * * then I for one am very happy indeed. It suits me fine, as I believe it will please an overwhelming number of our people.

We have been assured at Washington that vigorous action is going to be taken to prevent profiteering, and that the Government is going to require American interest to deal with all belligerents impartially on a cash-and-carry basis.

The second proposition which I shall comment upon in passing is that we must see to it that our neutrality is respected and that present conflict does not come to the shores of America. I am sure this is what the President meant when he said "the frontiers of America would be extended to protect this Nation." We must keep the battlefield in Europe and Asia.

In the third place, we must proceed in an orderly and logical way to build up our defense forces and strengthen them at every point. Certainly we have learned that much.

In the fourth place we must have a careful check of all aliens in America—those aliens who remain here illegally should be deported or put into detention camps. Please do not misinterpret this statement. There are literally thousands of foreign-born Americans who number among our very best and very finest people. Their sons have fought in our wars; they have contributed to our country; and, in fact, they are real Americans. The people to whom I refer in the first group are aliens who have slipped into this country contrary to our immigration laws and are here illegally. This group of people are a very definite menace to our security in this crisis. Leave them here, and we may expect sabotage.

Fifth. The war crisis in no way lessens the necessity to set our own economic house in order, to hold down and curtail Government expenditures, to simplify Government functions, and to try as best we can in such an emergency to have a better balance between income and expenditures.

Sixth. Someone has suggested a truce on partisan politics. This, of course, would be ideal. A friend of mine in Washington the other day said: "It is very fine for you fellows who are in power to want to call off politics, but what about those of us who would like to get in power?" On the neutrality issue there seems to be some effort to make it a partisan question * * * yet—almost without exception—the Republican press of the country has supported the President's foreign policy. I am sure in the coming session of Congress that there will be found many of the leaders of the Republican Party staunchly supporting the proposal to amend the neutrality law. But maybe it would not be fair to deny the American people their favorite sport—politics. When all is said and done, I am quite sure that in the year 1940 we will have a real little war of our own in America. The blessing of it is, however—for which we must be continually thankful—that it will be settled by ballots instead of bullets * * * and, however it is settled, the country will be safe.

In closing, let me express the hope that in these days of frequent dramatic news broadcasts of happenings abroad that we try to keep our heads and not get excited about emotional and melodramatic appeals. Let us go about our daily tasks and daily duties in a normal and orderly manner, and try to keep out of our hearts hatred and bitterness for anyone. Let us, individually and as a nation, remember that there will come a day when these warring nations, torn and bleeding, and tired of conflict, will be ready to listen to reason and to respond to logic. In such a day our country will have a mission to perform.

Armageddon Again?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1939

ARTICLE BY RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Daily News of last evening contained an article by Raymond Clapper that should be given the widest possible circulation. Mr. Clapper's article is timely and thought-arresting. It is with the hope that its circulation may be extended to all parts of the country that I avail myself of the privilege kindly granted by the House to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The article follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 20, 1939]

ARMAGEDDON AGAIN?

(By Raymond Clapper)

Those who think, as I do, that no issue has as yet arisen to warrant us sending several million American youths to Europe again are being taunted with the question: "Are we going to think only of our skins and our own pockets?" Says another: "This is not a back-room brawl. This is Armageddon."

I think it is very much to the point to be thinking of our skins—at least to be thinking of those American families whose sons would have to risk their skins. Certainly it is not for us armchair kibitzers, safe behind our trusty typewriters, to be lecturing our friends into sending sons to fight in Europe.

Neither does it come with good grace from highly placed new dealers, who have been so solicitous about the skins of the unemployed and the economic underprivileged, to be so horrified now by the thought of anyone wishing to save his own skin.

I hope sincerely that this time the American people will think about their own skins—about the great skin that is America, providentially blessed by a degree of natural isolation from this crazy carnage in Europe; the America which shelters us within a potential paradise rich enough in natural resources to enable those so fortunate as to be Americans to live in the peace and comfort to which human beings are entitled. And to be ready to protect these treasures. Why not be thoroughly selfish about America? Is there anything to be cherished more?

But they tell us this war in Europe is not a back-room brawl. This is Armageddon. Yes. That's what they said before.

You can find it now in Walter Millis' The Road to War. How Walter Hines Page, our Ambassador to Great Britain in the World War, wrote to Woodrow Wilson about the first World War.

"It's a death grapple," he said. "All preceding mere 'wars' are not in the same class of events. It means extermination, not of the people of either nation, but the utter extermination of the system of either one or the other—English free institutions or German military autocracy."

And Elihu Root in a rousing speech: "There is no nation on earth, not England, nor France, nor Belgium, nor Italy, nor Russia, with a stake greater in the success of the Allies in this (1917) war against German militarism than the United States. * * * If we enter this war, we shall be fighting over again the battle of American democracy, along with the democracy of England, the democracy of France, the democracy of Italy, and now, God be praised, the great democracy of Russia; fighting for the principle of free self-government against the principle of old-time autocracy and military power."

Still they insist now that this present war is different. It isn't an ordinary war. It's a war of ideologies.

Well, 6 weeks ago Hitler was fighting to crush bolshevism. Now Hitler and bolshevism are allies. For years the ideological war raged. But the minute it was to Hitler's advantage to make a deal with bolshevism he made it. And what of bolshevism's war against fascism? Stalin has made a deal with Hitler because he gets something out of it. They both carve up Poland, and ideologies be damned.

All wars are fought under crusading banners which are supposed to take the curse off the loot that the powers are after.

If there is one thing that is completely cynical, it is war; and if we think of anything except our own national interests in trying to determine our policies during this period, we are plain suckers. It is part of the game to disguise those interests under high-sounding slogans, but that is the propaganda to lash up the morale. We are inclined to mistake the propaganda for the real thing, the selfish interest which hides beneath it.

Before we old folks begin talking about sending other Americans out to do the fighting let's be sure that something very vital to the future safety and security of this country is involved.

Chairman John Hamilton, of the Republican National Committee, just back from France, says: "It is my opinion that the Republican Party should dedicate itself to the task, not of hoping this country will stay out of war but of seeing that it does stay out of war."

The Republicans should not be allowed to occupy that platform all alone.

Fashions in Neutrality—Styles 1935 and 1939

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, on January 20 I addressed the House on the responsibility of Congress. In the concluding paragraph I made this statement:

The people should now take the law into their own hands by insisting that all departments in the Federal Government adhere to the Constitution; that all laws enacted in conflict with the Constitution be repealed, one by one, so that the people's rights may be restored. That will start the wheels of industry going, furnish employment, increase consumption, build prosperity, and return the American smile to our people.

Mr. Speaker, we are now confronted with the responsibility of keeping this country out of war, and it is our duty to observe the wishes of the people instead of allowing ourselves to be influenced by the "invisible government's" propaganda in the kept press.

Why not give this a little thought: Our people do not want war. Congress does not want war, and I am reasonably certain that the Army and Navy are opposed to war. Now, who or what is threatening our neutrality?

What we need at this time are a few loyal newspapers which will dedicate their pages to the general welfare of this Republic and to the fundamental principles upon which it came into being. It is unfortunate when our so-called free press becomes subservient to the "invisible government," and a mouthpiece for foreign propaganda, which is for no other purpose than to obscure and pervert truth.

The President's message to Congress on September 21, 1939, the opening day of this special session, is a compilation of semitruths and excursionary flights of imagination to delude Congress. It is a "Sandman's story" to close the public's eyes to actual facts, so it will slumber quietly and not exert pressure on Congress for its own protection while the Federal factory molds sufficient rubber stamps to insure repeal of the arms-embargo clause in the Neutrality Act.

In his message to Congress, he requests the repeal of the arms-embargo clause and not the Neutrality Act. In other words, he wants to retain the power granted to him by the act which is, by proclamation, to assume personal control in the handling of all war material and credit to such nations as he believes are entitled to help.

I wonder how many of us actually believe that the President has called this special session of Congress to enact legislation that will compel him and the Federal Government to be more neutral? Has the President or the administration ever asked to be restricted or shorn of power? I do not believe so, for while I have been a Member of Congress he has asked for more and more power. For the President to request restrictions would be like a person asking for a double set of handcuffs. In making such request, he admits that he is dangerous, and in this knowledge asks to be restrained. He knows himself best, but if he is sincere in this request, I say Congress must not repeal the arms-embargo clause.

I can only say that if anyone believes that this session of Congress is called to provide a purer brand of neutrality, he is gullible indeed, for we are not here for that purpose. Congress has been assembled for no other reason except to repeal the arms-embargo clause, and remove such restrictions as are objectionable to the President. He wants a free hand, and no doubt lives in the hope that he, like his Democratic predecessor, may be recorded in the pages of history with the war lords now strutting in Europe, or shall I say to join the powers now waiting for us, to render our aid in the common destruction of our civilization for the benefit of the invisible government.

The people have expressed themselves by wire and by mail as being opposed to war. Members of Congress have been besieged by small and large groups of citizens who have expressed themselves as unalterably opposed to war. I do not differ from them, because I also am opposed to participation in war anywhere except in defense of our own country. Has the administration declared itself? No! The Executive and his statesmen have not declared themselves as opposed to war. On the contrary, they rattle their sabers and shout to Congress, "Help us to remain neutral! Don't let anyone ravish our neutrality!"

The question may now be asked: What is all the excitement about? And as I have already asked, Who is threatening our neutrality? Why does not the President, in one of his fireside chats, inform the public? It would be interesting indeed to have these mythical neutrality thieves identified.

Why does not the administration, with the power it now has, place these disturbers of neutrality incommunicado?

Let us get away from this silly acting and clowning and place the responsibility where it rightfully belongs. Who can involve our Nation or move us from a neutral position except those who direct the Government? Who are they? They are, first, the President himself; second, the State Department and those who are instrumental in clearing ships and cargoes to foreign ports; third, all department chiefs and other Federal employees, including members of the President's family, who are constantly expressing themselves publicly about foreign affairs which are of no interest to us and should for that reason be left for settlement to the nations concerned.

We do not elect a President as director of the world, but instead as President of the United States, whose duties are clearly defined in article II of the Constitution. There is nothing in article II which empowers the Executive to interfere in foreign wars or to direct foreign states. We certainly would object to foreign advice and interference in our affairs, so let us extend to foreign nations the same courtesy that we expect from them.

It may also be opportune to advise the Supreme Court to acquaint itself with article III of the same document, for its duty is clearly defined therein. There is no occasion for any of the Justices to express their opinions publicly, as was done by Mr. Justice Frankfurter on September 21, 1939:

FRANKFURTER SAYS WE CAN'T BE NEUTRAL

"No man who thinks really is neutral," said the Vienna-born Justice, as he termed neutrality "one of those slogans and catchwords that cover up thought."

Mr. Frankfurter is one of President Roosevelt's appointees to the Supreme Court. On the same day that the President appears before Congress in joint session and requests its help to maintain neutrality this brilliant appointee on the Supreme Court comes out publicly with the statement "We can't be neutral."

Mr. Frankfurter's statement that we cannot be neutral is sheer nonsense, for many nations located in war zones remained neutral during the World War. And switching his statement to "neutral in thought" is, if nothing else, deceptive. Who cares what Mr. Frankfurter or anyone else thinks? Wars are fought with bullets and not with vacuolated ideas. It is expressions in public such as the Justice used that are unneutral. No one, of course, can deny to others the right to think, but sensible statesmen in public service should not lend themselves to expressions which may lead our country into war.

Unfortunately there are too many of such class of statesmen employed in the present Federal administration, and to remain neutral it is evident that Congress must get rid of them sooner or later. These national and international experts are now a plague in the land. No wonder Mr. Elliott Roosevelt said "Congress is obsolete." It is not only obsolete but helpless if it does not impeach some of these windjammers.

I quote another short paragraph:

Justice Frankfurter spoke at a banquet at Ford Hall Forum liberal discussion group which awarded him its annual gold medal for "preeminent public service."

I can well understand that Mr. Frankfurter is a liberal, for he is recorded, on page 33 in Senate Document No. 14 entitled "Attempt by Communists to Seize the American Labor Movement," as one of the members on the national committee of the American Civil Liberties Union. It is well to bear in mind that Mr. Baldwin, of the same organization, testified before a hearing of the Judiciary Committee in the House that they believed in murder and overthrow of the Government of the United States. Now Mr. Frankfurter says "We can't be neutral."

Let me now quote from Senate Document No. 14:

Other members on the national committee (American Civil Liberties Union) include Norman M. Thomas, who is connected with six other organizations and who is a clergyman combining intellectual radicalism with religion; Peter Poscal Cosgrove, of Boston, a Nova Scotian, who has recently been a recruiting agent for William D. Haywood's industrial unit, the Kuzbas, in Russia; Felix Frankfurter, member of the law faculty at Harvard University; Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, a solicitor of funds for the I. W. W.; William Z. Foster, born in Massachusetts and heading the Trade Union Educational League; John Haynes Holmes, member of the League for Amnesty of Political Prisoners—an enterprise to obtain the release of the potential Communist leadership from the Federal and State prisons; Norman Hapgood, a newspaper writer; Arthur Garfield Hays, a New York attorney; Robert Morss Lovett, former professor at the University of Chicago and first president of the Federated Press; Judah L. Magnes, head of the Jewish Kehillah in New York City; and Oswald Garrison Villard, a New York publisher.

Is it possible that he is one of those the President has in mind who is threatening our neutrality? If so, the President should request Congress to remove him from office.

I now suggest that Congress resume its full power and act in the common defense and for the general welfare of the United States. It is our duty and responsibility to maintain neutrality and avoid all entangling alliances which may directly or indirectly involve us in war. Congress should not hesitate to remove from office anyone or all who overreach their official positions and in such manner involve us in war.

Congress has been entirely too hesitant in asserting its power. This is particularly true in regard to the Communist and his brother subversionist. Both of them are enemies of the United States, for they are engaged in subversion and destruction of our Government. I shall quote article III, section 3:

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against it, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort.

It should be quite evident from this that those in official positions who tolerate such constitutional sabotage not only adhere to our enemies but actually give them aid and comfort. This is treason, and officials who fail in their duty "to preserve, protect, and defend our Nation" against such enemies should be removed from office.

Let us not forget that Congress alone is responsible, not to the President, not to the Supreme Court, but to the people of these United States, and to each State, for the welfare of our people and for the security of the Nation. We are elected representatives of the people and their Government. Let us not fail those who have placed their trust in us.

As a Member of Congress, my greatest desire is to aid the President not only in maintaining neutrality but also in keeping us out of war. I shall, however, do my own thinking, and I hope others will do the same; for, after all, we are here as Members of Congress and not as handmaids to the President and other Federal departments.

The people are, by an overwhelming majority, determined to maintain peace; and with us this should be easy, for we have nothing at stake in Europe or in the Orient. We are even casting the Philippine Islands adrift in 1946. This will, with the exception of Hawaii, leave us with a few unimportant islands in the Pacific.

It is not the so-called common or middle class of people that is instrumental in fomenting war. That is true today as it was in 1914, when from the Brandenburger Tor a thousand voices shouted, "Frieden! Frieden! Wir wollen keinen Krieg!" And from the Burgring in Vienna, "Frieden! Frieden! Nieder mit dem Krieg!" From the two great bridges on the Seine to the Quai d'Orsay, "A bas la guerre! Vive la paix!" And from the well-known Trafalgar Square in London, "Peace! Peace! No war!" And today I am sure that those who are fighting across the water, if allowed to express themselves, would say, as we, "We want peace—no war!"

The war 20 years ago was fought to place the international financiers or the invisible government in power so it could dominate the world. The character of the invisible government is engraved in the Peace Treaty of Versailles, and is responsible for the war in Europe today. Shall we rally to the support of the powers we helped 22 years ago to bring about a greater injustice than that which was written into the peace treaty of the World War? It is that question that Congress must decide, and I am sure the answer will be "No!"

If the present war in Europe continues, this and other sessions of Congress will be expected to keep the United States out of war. As a Member of Congress, I shall try to look into the future and base my decisions, not upon expediency or upon the now worn and frayed appeal, "We speak the same language, and blood is thicker than water," but instead upon what in my opinion is best for a greater and better United States of America.

I shall now quote from the President's message to Congress, September 21, 1939:

I have asked the Congress to reassemble in extraordinary session in order that it may consider and act on the amendment of certain legislation which, in my best judgment, so alters the historic foreign policy of the United States that it impairs the peaceful relations of the United States with foreign nations. * * *

Beginning with the foundation of our constitutional government in the year 1789, the American policy in respect to belligerent nations, with one notable exception, has been based on international law. * * * The single exception was the policy adopted by this Nation during the Napoleonic wars, when, seeking to avoid involvement, we acted for some years under the so-called Embargo and Nonintercourse Acts. That policy turned out to be a disastrous failure. * * * Our next deviation by statute from the sound principles of neutrality and peace through international law did not come for 130 years. It was the so-called Neutrality Act of 1935. * * * I now ask again that such action be taken in respect to that part of the act which is wholly inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations—the embargo provisions. * * *

I give to you my deep and unalterable conviction, based on years of experience as a worker in the field of international peace, that by the repeal of the embargo the United States will more probably remain at peace than if the law remains as it stands today.

The question may now be asked, Who is the parent of the Neutrality Act of 1935? When it was enacted, the administration had an overwhelming majority of New Deal liberals in both Houses of Congress, and the administration had sufficient power to stop any legislation of which it did not approve. The President was also aware that it not only changed our international policy but was, as he said, liable "to be a disastrous failure." In spite of all this, it was enacted into law and signed by the President, August 31, 1935.

In looking for a reason for its enactment, it is well to bear in mind the conditions which existed in Spain at that time, for the communistic "red" army was operating there and was engaged in the destruction of life and property. My reason for alluding to the "red" revolution in Spain is that the Neutrality Act refers particularly to that country. I quote:

Resolved, etc., That, during the existence of the state of civil strife now obtaining in Spain, it shall, from and after the approval of this resolution, be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to Spain, or to any other foreign country for transshipment to Spain, or for use of either of the opposing forces in Spain. Arms, ammunition, or implements of war the exportation of which is prohibited by this resolution are those enumerated in the President's proclamation No. 2163 of April 10, 1936.

Licenses heretofore issued under existing law for the exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to Spain shall, as to all future exportations thereunder, ipso facto be deemed to be canceled.

This joint resolution, which was enacted into law January 8, 1937, is evidence in itself that the Neutrality Act is intimately related with the revolution in Spain.

Senate Joint Resolution 173, which was enacted into law August 31, 1935, gives the President power—

That, upon the outbreak or during the progress of war between or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any port of such belligerent states, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country.

The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, or implements of war the export of which is prohibited by this act.

The President may, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

The President is hereby authorized to proclaim, upon recommendation of the Board from time to time, a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

It can readily be seen from this that Congress has delegated power to the President that it had no right to give to him. He now suggests that this wide power be allowed to remain in his hands, as set forth in the Neutrality Act, but that Congress should remove all restrictions, which, of course, is for no other purpose except to line up with such powers as he favors.

I quote another short paragraph for your consideration:

Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States, or of its possessions, by the submarines of a foreign nation will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations. * * *

I wonder what the compilers of this legislation had in mind when the act was drafted. Just what influence "foreign submarines" may have on the United States that should bring about a change in our policy is something new to me. And the statement, "in which the United States is neutral," would lead one to believe that neutrality is the exception.

The act of 1936, together with its amendments, does not constitute a Neutrality Act, for it is selective. I quote:

This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

How is it possible to draft neutrality legislation and call it "neutral" when it deliberately excludes all South American republics? Are we to assume from this that our neutrality is only extended to such nations as the proclaimer so designates?

In order to explode the neutrality myth I shall quote from the final act of May 1, 1937:

Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state * * * he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe as to lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States * * * for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials. * * *

The question which now arises is that there are only two countries which border on the United States—the one on the south, separated by a river that is sometimes dry, and the country on the north, separated by adjoining lakes. "To which one does this act refer?" is a question that might involve the United States in war.

After having read the act carefully I find that the only part of it which may enforce neutrality is the "embargo clause," and it is that which the President asks Congress to repeal. It is therefore evident that the President does not desire to be neutral, but wants instead to be released from such restrictions that may enforce neutrality.

In order to bring this out more clearly, I shall now quote another paragraph from the President's message to Congress:

The enactment of the embargo provisions did more than merely reverse our traditional policy. It had the effect of putting land powers on the same footing as naval powers so far as sea-borne commerce was concerned. A land power which threatened war could thus feel assured in advance that any prospective sea-power antagonist would be weakened through denial of its ancient right to buy anything anywhere. This, 4 years ago, gave a definite advantage to one belligerent as against another, not through his own strength of geographic position but through an affirmative act of ours. Removal of the embargo is merely reverting to the sounder international practice and pursuing in time of war as in time of peace our ordinary trade policies.

It is quite evident from this that the President, as he clearly stated in this paragraph, now fears that the embargo clause in the Neutrality Act will not allow such nations as now dominate the sea transportation to avail themselves of such war materials as they may buy in the United States. With him it is not a question of neutrality or fairness. It is, instead, to help those powers with whom he is in thorough accord and sympathy.

The President further states in his message:

Repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue. * * * It has been erroneously said that return to that policy might bring us nearer to war. I give to you my deep and unalterable conviction, based on years of experience as a worker in the field of international peace, that by the repeal of the embargo the United States will more probably remain at peace than if the law remains as it stands today.

How the President can make this statement is indeed difficult to understand. The United States has been operating under international law since 1789, with the exception of a short period during the Napoleonic wars. For 130 years we, as well as other nations, have observed international law, and it is during this same period, and under international law, that the most disastrous wars have been fought. Let us not forget that we had international law in 1917, but did it keep us out of war? Certainly not. We simply fell into the World War—or were shoved into it by an administration that was practically 100-percent probelligerent.

The Neutrality Act may not keep us out of war, but it will serve one useful purpose. It will restrain shipment of arms and the clearance of our ships to belligerent nations and ports located in war zones. It is a law, and as such, if violated, will leave those responsible for such violation subject to punishment.

There is no law, rule, or regulation suitable to keep any nation neutral, for neutrality is purely elective with the governments of such nations as select to be neutral. This was clearly evidenced, as I have already said, in the World War, because Holland, Finland, the Scandinavian countries, and others remained neutral, although they were situated in the war zones. All of these nations operated under international law, but that was not the reason for their neutrality. They were neutral because they had governments that wanted to be neutral, and that is the only thing we need to keep the United States neutral.

I am, therefore, opposed to repeal of the embargo clause, and I want to help to impeach those that directly or indirectly, by infraction of the embargo clause, become instrumental in bringing us into the present war.

Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SPEECH OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, BEFORE THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION CONFERENCE AT OSLO, NORWAY, AUGUST 17, 1939

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me on the peaceful settlement of international disputes before the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Oslo, Norway, on August 17, 1939:

Mr. HAMILTON FISH (United States). I propose to speak on the peaceful settlement of international disputes, which is the order of business before this Conference. I speak as an individual, and in the course of my remarks I propose to offer a resolution which I have not submitted to the administration at Washington nor to my fellow delegates from America. I want it clearly understood that I am speaking in an individual capacity as a delegate to this Conference and not as president of the American group.

We have at this conference 28 delegates from America, and I doubt if we have ever sent more than 10 delegates to any previous conference. The United States is allotted 28 votes, and we have here in Oslo 28 Members of Congress as delegates equally divided between the two great parties in America—14 Republicans and 14 Democrats. I do not see how any American could oppose on principle the proposition that I am submitting because that proposition is based upon arbitration, mediation, and the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means. That has always been the traditional policy of our country.

It is right and proper that the Interparliamentary Union should meet in this critical juncture of world affairs when Europe is confronted with another disastrous and ruinous war in peaceful, neutral, and democratic Norway. We in America are proud to count among our most industrious, loyal, and best citizens those millions of Norwegians, Swedes, Danes, and Finns who have emigrated to America and continue to uphold there the same principles of peace, neutrality, and democracy.

We are members of representative and parliamentary governments from all over the world which believe in the fundamental right of the people to govern themselves under free institutions and in the preservation of peace as a paramount and continuous policy. I never had more faith in the final triumph and extension of democracy and the right of the people to rule than I have today, in spite of its temporary challenge by dictatorships of the left or of the right. The answer to all dictatorships is to make democracy work in our own countries and to put our own houses in order. Parliamentary and representative forms of government are still the hope and aspiration of the struggling masses of mankind throughout the world. But it is none of our business what forms of government exist in other nations, whether it is communism in Russia, nazi-ism in Germany, or fascism in Italy; and by the same token it is none of their business what forms of government exist in any of our democratic countries. Free institutions, including free speech, free press and radio, and free assembly, together with personal liberty and economic justice, are the natural aspirations of free men and women in all sections of the civilized world.

I regret deeply to state that I believe that a European war is more imminent today than at any time since last September. If the Danzig and Polish agitation continues, the slightest spark may start a world conflagration. This Conference has listened to numerous interesting and able speeches from the point of view generally of the nation involved. As one who served in the World War, and for most of the time in the French Fourth Army under General Gouraud, I hate and loath war and do not offer any apologies for raising my voice in behalf of peace. I refuse to admit that the door to peace is closed or to yield to the defeatist talk that apparently covers Europe. I refuse to believe that if there is a will and sufficient determination that a way cannot be found to open the door of peace and the road to a peaceful settlement of international problems.

I am unwilling to agree that an issue such as the political control of Danzig, a small boil on the body politic, cannot be settled without the arbitrament of war. Where is the necessary leadership for peace? The military commands are prepared in the great nations of Europe to let loose the dogs of war and bring destruction, death, famine, and ruin throughout Europe. Is there no alternative or effective leadership for peace? Must pride, prejudice, and hatred dominate the councils of Europe and impose another war on its peace-loving people? It is not too late to strive for peaceful settlements of political disputes until war has broken out. The time to wage war on war is in time of peace. It is only too late after warring nations are actually at each other's throats. For my part, I submit and urge that nothing must be neglected in an honest effort to avert the horrors of war, the slaughter of millions of combatants and noncombatants, of innocent and helpless women and children, the economic and political ruin of Europe, and the advent of the forces of barbarism, paganism, mass murder, and communism. Not even the victor wins, but all nations will be bankrupt, despoiled, and ruined.

We have no power as delegates to enforce peace, but we have a solemn and sacred duty to exert our moral and political influence in our native lands to preserve peace through arbitration, mediation, and conciliation. We cannot dodge or evade the peace issue. We would be shirking our obligations to humanity and our duty as representatives of millions of free people throughout the world if we join in any defeatist attitude toward peace and wash our hands, like Pontius Pilate, over the crucifixion of Europe and maybe of civilization and Christianity. I urge this Conference to make a strong, united plea to the governments of the world, including the Vatican, in support of a 30-day moratorium on political and international disputes, and in the meantime to explore anew every avenue and possibility for a fair and peaceful settlement of the problems that are leading European nations to war, and to provide for a program of world recovery.

I submit the following resolution, which I understand will go automatically to the council for consideration and action:

"Resolved, That the Interparliamentary Union, in its session at Oslo, urges upon the Governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy an immediate consideration of a moratorium on war for 30 days or more, with a view to the settlement of international disputes by arbitration, mediation, and peaceful methods consistent with the principles for which the Interparliamentary Union was founded."

Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war. An armistice for 1 month pending a further effort for the preservation of peace might not only postpone war but prevent its outbreak for an indefinite period.

I speak for a great neutral country whose policy is to keep out of all foreign entanglements and wars. I offer no guaranty of success, but, as one who envisions the disastrous consequences to all nations involved, I appeal in the name of peace and humanity to this conference composed of delegates from democratic nations to go on record unanimously for the resolution I am herewith offering in favor of an armistice for 30 days between England and France on one side and Germany and Italy on the other to provide an additional opportunity to solve their immediate and serious problems. I take it for granted that the democratic nations believing in the principles of arbitration and mediation will be only too willing to resort to such peaceful methods of arbitrement.

I cannot vouch for the attitude of either the German or the Italian Government, but a repudiation of such an offer will be their responsibility and not ours. At least we will have the satisfaction of having endeavored without coercion to promote peace through arbitration and mediation, which is properly one of the main reasons for the existence of the Interparliamentary Union. We used the same method when we urged President Theodore Roosevelt to mediate the Russian-Japanese conflict.

The final solution of any peace program must take into consideration such fundamental problems as overpopulation, raw materials, adequate food supplies, and foreign exchange (gold). For the time being, however, a 30-day armistice or moratorium on war is of vital importance if the people of Europe are to be spared the most disastrous scourge in the last 100 years.

I pray that there will be no war in Europe this year, or for years to come. Modern warfare is a crime against humanity and civilization. The human loss is monstrous. No nation wins; even the victor loses and comes out a bankrupt and disorganized country, the prey to communism and anarchy.

Europe is foul with rumors of war. I ask this conference to rise above the deadlock in which Europe is engulfed into the daylight of peace and humanity. Hatred and revenge must be subordinated to the nobler principles of arbitration and peace.

If the great nations of Europe cannot settle their differences except by war, why not submit this problem of peace to a commission composed of distinguished neutrals, such as the King of Norway, the King of Sweden, the King of Belgium, and the President of Switzerland, or their foreign ministers?

There must be a peaceful way out of the existing deadlock except a bloody and disastrous war.

If we refuse to act and no armistice on war is arranged, the whole peace issue may go by default. Peacemaking machinery has broken down. The tension has been so continuous and so acute that it is not surprising if the statesmen of Europe are worn out and find themselves in an impasse or a deadlock that leads directly to war. If this conference can contribute its part in a democratic manner to the preservation of world peace, it will deserve the grateful thanks and prayers of millions of peace-loving and Christian people throughout all of Europe.

En conclusion, je dis aux membres de cette Conférence Interparlementaire: "A bas la guerre! Vivent la democratie et la paix!" [Loud and prolonged applause.]

The Arms Embargo

HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the repeal of the arms embargo. I believe there is great danger that it might become the first step toward war. To change the law at this point would be an unneutral act. Already the so-called cash and carry for arms and munitions is proving to be carry without the cash. Once credit is extended there is little difference between 90-day credit and credit for eternity when you are dealing with the nations of Europe. If the munition and financial interests of this country are allowed to have investments and profits in Europe's wars, the next step is apt to be the sending of American boys to protect those investments.

I am for keeping our neutrality law as it is. If any changes are made, they should strengthen it and not weaken it.

If America should be dragged into war, the first casualty would be our liberty and representative government. I am opposed to delegating any discretionary powers to the President.

What may or may not happen in Europe is not the issue. I am opposed to the United States policing the world. I do not want the life of one American boy sacrificed on Europe's battlefields.

Congress should proceed very slowly and make sure that no steps are taken that would endanger the peace of our country. There should be ample opportunity for thorough debate and ample time for the citizens of our country to express themselves to their representatives.

Safeguarding the Peace of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. ELMER J. RYAN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, today the House of Representatives met and adopted a resolution whereby we will adjourn until the 9th day of October, pending action in the Senate of the United States on the question of American neutrality.

Only one momentous question confronts the Congress in this special session which met last week. This session has only one objective, and that is the objective and goal of the American people today—the maintenance of peace for the United States.

Our Nation has nothing to gain and everything to lose by participation in European warfare. No profits which will entangle us in war can justify the horror and suffering which will be ours if we enter that conflict. Gold which comes to our people through the sacrifice of lives in war is fool's gold. Between profits and peace our choice must be, and the choice of the American people is—peace. To aid in the maintenance of peace for America is my goal in this special session.

MAINTAINING ARMS EMBARGO

I cannot believe that the supplying of munitions, arms, and implements of war to one side or the other will help us to remain neutral. To my mind the lifting of the embargo on arms is a step toward entrance into war. The furnishing of arms will create an economic alliance with those nations to whom we supply war implements. History proves that such an economic alliance inevitably leads to a military alliance.

I believe that there is a difference in supplying warring nations with raw materials, steel, wheat, cotton, and other commodities and supplying them with finished implements of war. The sale of manufactured war supplies to one side cannot help but increase the enmity of the opposing nations toward our country. We cannot permit our Nation to become an arsenal to furnish the implements of mass murder.

My vote was cast in the last regular session of Congress in favor of the arms embargo. I intend to again vote in its support in this special session.

RESTRICT AMERICAN SHIPS—NO SHIPPING TO NATIONS AT WAR

To allow American ships to carry commodities to the belligerents is to court the sinking of those ships, which would stir up war feeling in America. Therefore, I will support legislation forbidding American ships to carry commodities to the nations at war.

TRANSFER OF TITLE IN PURCHASES BY BELLIGERENTS

In my opinion the danger of loss of American property will be greatly lessened if we require the transfer of title to belligerents of all goods purchased in our Nation. If title is transferred to the purchaser before leaving our shores and if the requirement is made that the goods be transported by the purchaser we will greatly decrease the chance of American financial losses which would create war sentiment.

PROHIBITION OF LOANS AND CREDITS

By continuing our restrictions on loans and credits to nations at war we will prevent investments which would lead to sympathy and military help to those nations. Therefore I favor the continuance of the present policy of forbidding such loans and credits.

FORBID COLLECTION OF FUNDS IN AMERICA

Likewise, I believe it will tend toward our involvement if we permit the collection of money from our citizens to aid one side or the other. For this reason I favor legislation to retain the ban on such collections in the United States.

My efforts and my vote will be directed along the lines set out in these remarks. I reiterate that it will be my sole purpose and my sole concern during this special session to do my humble part in preventing the entrance of the United States into foreign war.

ARTICLES FROM THE PEN OF THE LATE UNITED STATES SENATOR LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, by leave given me I include in my remarks two articles written by my friend, the late Lawrence Yates Sherman, who was once a distinguished Member of the United States Senate. One of these articles is entitled "Miracles," in which Mr. Sherman expressed his faith in a living God. This article was read during the impressive funeral services which were held on September 22 in Illinois:

MIRACLES

Pause tonight in the workshop of the elements housed in the infinite. Here the Omnipotent forges the mighty instruments which rule the world and reach the remotest outposts that belt the unknown.

Nature's chemistry is on a colossal scale. Its laws are unerring and unchangeable.

They rule the kingdoms of the quick and the dead. Weakness and strength, health and growth and decay, deformity, and beauty wait on its imperial decrees.

Electric energy and the responsive vibrations of a universe of ether that outrun human imagination set no limit on the mind with courage like Columbus to sail for a new world.

The most learned scientist must at least be a worshipper at the throne of the Most High.

The deft and marvelous inventions that supplement and multiply the fruits of toil all echo in the inventor's heart Morse's first message, "What hath God wrought?"

The greatest minds of every generation have walked the way that led them to the God that rules in wisdom and power.

The unbeliever and the scoffer have voiced their doubts and demanded the reign of reason rather than the guidance of faith. Yet when their voice is hushed in eternity, they have left nothing to light the world on its way. If they extinguished hope in a single human heart, they have taught no truth to inspire or planted on belief to raise mortal man above the clod of the valley or the dying beast of the field.

From an antique age the intellects graven on the tablets of human greatness have bowed in humility before the Divine.

The doubter demands miracles in our generation and discredits them because they claim they are not.

As large a demand is made on our belief by Nature every day as on our faith by miracles.

Repulsive ooze and slime, touched by the magic of Nature's breath, smile in the blossoms' colors to please the eye and bestow in fruit and grain food upon the multitude of earth.

Not all the wit and mind of men have produced a blade of grass or gain of wheat.

That is done only in the workshop of the elements. Man can cultivate and improve. He cannot impart the life or control the alchemy of the transformation from the useless and unpromising to the beauty that pleases and the use that supports human life.

Nature's works in their final analysis are daily miracles. They defy our understanding and mock all human knowledge.

The wisest and most eloquent atheist who ever lived could not tell why a potato grows when placed in the ground.

Still he denied all religions because he could not explain the human resurrection taught by Christ and Moses.

Walk in the forest, on the plain, by the complaining sea, in the mountain ranges, where the eternal snows mantle in spotless purity the loftiest summits of the world, like Nature's vestments on the mighty altars of the ever-living God.

Here in the vast cathedral domes and on the altars, not reared by mortal hands, we must interpret and understand.

Those enduring tokens have seen the Chaldean shepherds watch their flocks. They saw the Assyrian build Ninevah and Babylon in its last night of tumultuous revelry and drunken riot.

The conquering legions of Cyrus, the Persian, passed in review before them.

They witnessed Alexander's slaughtering march and drunken death in distant Asia.

They stood on the picket line of the ages when Caesar fell beneath the hand of Brutus in the Roman senate chamber, and when Attila, the Hun, retreated after failing to crush the Christian world at Chalons.

Vision is the art of seeing the invisible.

To all such those mute but mighty witnesses thunder as the cloud-wrapped summit of Sinai spoke to Moses.

When we pass through Nature's aisles, beneath the heaven's fretted vault, where the sweet influence of the Pleiades beams from afar, and Arcturus still guides his sons as in the days of Job, and the solemn anthem of the ceaseless tides sounds the knell of passing centuries, we feel the truth that things moving under universal laws are greater than men, and that all this is not a system of mere chance, tempered by accident, but that the Lord God ordered it from the beginning and reigneth now and forever.

THE SCULPTOR

I saw a sculptor chisel from flawless marble the form of one who lived for self. On the statue's granite base was carved his name, his birth, his death.

How soon the centuries blot out the inscriptions and destroy the work of man! Such memories perish utterly from the earth.

I saw another who wrote the unselfish story of his life on the inextinguishable page of the human heart, so that the touch of Nature made him akin to all the world. For him the sculptors of every age shall give their talents; the inscription shall not fade away, for every generation shall renew them; memory levies tribute on the ages, for as he lived for others, so does the future live his deeds and thoughts anew.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the legislative program of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, which I commend to the consideration of the membership of the House.

It is my understanding that the legislation at this special session will be confined to the question of neutrality, and that consideration of veterans' legislation will be postponed until the regular session.

In the meantime I trust every Member of the House will study this program, as well as the programs to be submitted by the other veterans' organizations.

The matter referred to follows:

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM, DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

(Adopted by the nineteenth annual convention at Boston, August 1939)

1. That the D. A. V., independently and in cooperation with other patriotic organizations, aggressively combat all forms of subversive movements calculated to destroy the American form of government.

2. That the D. A. V., while supporting all worthy movements for better international understandings, continue to advocate proper military and naval preparedness.

3. That all hospitalized service-connected World War veterans receive total ratings while hospitalized.

4. That all service-connected disabled veterans shall be paid the same standard of compensation: Provided, That any statutory award to which a veteran is entitled shall not be disturbed.

5. That there be reenacted the "presumption of soundness" clause of the World War Veterans Act of June 7, 1924.

6. That there be a modification of the present stringent regulation governing the Disabled Emergency Officers' Retirement Act.

7. That the D. A. V. continue its policy of urging sites for hospitals according to the density of the military population rather than locating the institutions according to congressional district, State, county, or city lines.

8. That the policy be continued of improving and extending existing hospitals rather than establishing new institutions, except in extraordinary cases where the density of the military population justifies new projects.

9. That, through Executive orders or legislation, the D. A. V. urge stricter enforcement of present preferences under the United States civil service.

10. That in all cases in which a disabled veteran is to be skipped on the civil-service register and a nonveteran or a nondisabled veteran selected, the service-connected disabled veteran shall be furnished with written reasons why he was not selected and be afforded an opportunity to rebut.

11. That persons who did not serve in time of war should not be classified as veterans in the matter of preference in civil service.

12. That if appropriate preferences looking toward actual appointment in Federal jobs are obtainable, the present points added to earned ratings may be traded for such preferences.

13. That, except in cases of fraud, a compensation rating that has continued for 5 consecutive years shall not be reduced during the lifetime of the veteran.

14. That all privileges that now go to veterans under the W. P. A. shall be extended to wives of disabled veterans in cases in which the veteran himself cannot perform W. P. A. duties, and the same privileges shall be extended to the widows of deceased veterans.

15. That the present compensation rates shall be increased at the rate of 10 percent when the veteran reaches 45 years, another 10 percent at the age of 55 years, and another 10 percent at the age of 60 years.

16. That, in addition to the present quota of appointments to West Point and Annapolis, there shall be one appointment and one alternate for each academy from each of the nine corps areas for the sons of wartime disabled veterans.

17. That the rate of interest on loans on Government insurance be reduced to 3⅜ percent.

EDITORIAL FROM THE PORTLAND (OREG.) SHOPPING NEWS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Portland Shopping News, of Portland, Oreg.:

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Shopping News]

NEUTRALITY

The most important question confronting this Nation and its citizens today is that for which Congress has been called into special session: "Shall we or shall we not sell arms to warring nations so that they make make more war or finish their fight with quicker dispatch?"

It is a grievous question, this, that we of America have been called upon to answer, and there is much difference of opinion on it. Yet we should be proud that the men we have elected to head the Nation's legislative and executive branches are able to view and debate it without any cheap truckling to national or individual greed. The views of Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Borah, Mr. Nye, or Mr. Taft may differ, but they are honest and sincere in their individual beliefs.

On one point the mind of America is very much in accord. We do not want to grow rich on others' troubles, nor profiteer upon a war-torn world. Neither do we wish to be unfair in our dealing with those powers which depend upon this land as a source of supply.

Having thus raised a banner of fairness to others, let us be fair also to America. All war is a blow at the world. Death and depression are its team mates. The creation in this country of a huge, artificially created armaments industry to feed the guns of Europe while they belch would be a monstrous economic bubble waiting to burst. It would flourish for a time "like the green bay tree," but its eventual collapse might plunge this Nation into a pit of economic upheaval.

It is argued on the other side that since Britain and France have undertaken to crush "Hitlerism," we should not unfairly deprive them of American supplies, while the Nazis have a vast storehouse of Russian supplies. This sentiment is very strong, but it should be tempered with calm discretion.

Europe's endless quarrels must have proved by this time that the preservation of American democracy is the primary purpose of our sense of civilization. The course before us must not be one of "power politics." Neither should we plunge into the mad whirl of war production without serious thinking. This is a land that has built its civilization and its greatness on the fruits of peace—not on the fruits of war.

Let us remember the old fable of the man who sowed dragon's teeth and reaped a crop of soldiers. America must not sow dragon's teeth by selling guns to rival powers.

One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Bill of Rights

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ADDRESS BY HON. SOL BLOOM, OF NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 25, 1939

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following address on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the Bill of Rights:

On this day, 150 years ago, was erected one of the milestones of American liberty. The Congress, after long and careful consideration, on September 25, 1789, agreed upon the amendments to the Constitution which became the Bill of Rights.

From the hour of ratification until this hour, every person in the United States has been secure in the enjoyment of his right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

As we all know, the Constitution was ratified with misgivings, because that great charter did not contain specific barriers against governmental violation of individual rights and immunities. The framers of the Constitution pointed out that, since the powers of the new Government were enumerated and limited, individual rights could not be invaded. But the people demanded more. They demanded that the Government they were creating should be held down by positive written law, barring it forever from encroaching upon individual rights and liberties. Upon the assurance that Congress would heed this demand and bring forth the desired amendments for the people's approval, the Constitution was ratified.

In the first session of the First Congress, organized April 6, 1789, James Madison, in the House of Representatives, fulfilled his pledge to press for a Bill of Rights. He met with opposition and excuses for delay—and they were good excuses. Congress was swamped with business. It was organizing the new Government. Its first duty was to raise revenue. It had to regulate commerce and shipping. Great executive departments had to be set up, and the judicial department had to be organized. In the midst of this creative work Congress was forced to deal with Indian nations that threatened war on the borders. The relations between Congress and the Executive had to be defined. The President's power of removal raised a paramount constitutional question that consumed much time in debate.

Members protested that amendments to the Constitution should wait until the Government was put on its feet. "Why," they cried, "you have not even chosen the seat of government!"

With great skill and persistence, Mr. Madison pressed for consideration of a Bill of Rights. Others in the Senate worked to the same end. The promises to State conventions were held up as a sacred obligation upon Congress. Pressure from the States had its effect. Many State conventions had recommended amendments which they regarded as essential for the preservation of individual security.

All these proposals were debated at length in Congress. The discussions covered the history of the struggles for liberty throughout the ages, and all the methods whereby men had sought to evolve governments which, while protecting them, could be prevented from tyrannizing over them.

It is a pity that the papers of Congress were lost when the British burned the Capitol in 1814, for these papers contained the details of all proceedings which developed the Bill of Rights.

The outcome of the debate was the adoption by House and Senate of a resolution submitting specific constitutional amendments to the State legislatures. On the same day Congress adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, to request that he would recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the many and signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a constitution of government for their safety and happiness."

At this time, when the liberty of mankind is trampled upon by many dictators, and when free governments are destroyed by brutal aggressors, the American people may well renew their gratitude and thanks to the Almighty for preserving this free country.

Thanks to divine Providence and their own valor, the people won their liberty, and up to this hour they have retained mastery over their own Government, as well as maintaining their independence against all foreign assault.

In times of stress many attempts have been made by officers of government to violate the rights of individuals. These attempts have been made by Congress, Presidents, courts, and States. Congress has sought to penalize men for free speech. It has tried to impose a censorship over the press. It has tried to authorize unlawful search and seizure of private papers. It has tried to place men twice in jeopardy for the same offense. It has tried to take private property without compensation. It has tried to subject men to imprisonment at hard labor without an indictment. It has tried to deny to an accused man the right to confront his accusers. It has tried to give the Government the right to appeal a case in which the accused was acquitted by a jury. It has tried to make a crime out of an act which was not a crime when it was committed. It has tried to compel a man to testify against himself. It has tried to force the transfer to Federal court of a case which had already been constitutionally decided by a State court. It has tried to enforce bills of attainder.

In all these cases the Constitution and the Bill of Rights were invoked to protect the individual, and the courts, obeying the people's supreme law, held all these so-called laws of Congress to be null and void.

Presidents have attempted to suppress free speech. They have tried to take private property without compensation. They have tried to subject civilians to trial by court martial when the civil courts were open. They have tried to bring men from distant States for trial in the District of Columbia. They have sanctioned the stealing of private papers by Army officers and have tried to convict men on the strength of these stolen papers.

In all these cases the courts have intervened to protect the individual against the arbitrary and unlawful acts of Presidents. Addressing itself directly to the unlawful act of a President the Supreme Court said: "No man in this country is so high that he is above the law."

Corrupt judges have tried to defraud and oppress individuals in violation of the Bill of Rights. Congress has impeached and removed such judges from office.

The States have repeatedly tried to deprive individuals of life, liberty, and property in violation of the Bill of Rights and the courts have protected such individuals.

Treaties have been made which violated the constitutional rights of individuals and the courts have set these treaties aside.

No act of Congress, no order of a President, no judgment of a court, no law of a State, and no treaty is valid if it violates the supreme law embodied in the Bill of Rights.

During war the people willingly impose restrictions upon themselves, and the Government may impose restrictions under the Constitution. But even during war individual rights secured by the Bill of Rights cannot be violated. Neither Congress nor the President nor the courts can suspend the Bill of Rights on account of war. Come what may—peace or war—the right of life, liberty, and property is secure in the United States.

A great American statesman has said of the Bill of Rights: "Such provisions as these are not mere commands. They withhold power. The instant any officer, of whatever kind or grade, transgresses them he ceases to act as an officer. He becomes a trespasser, a despoiler, a lawbreaker, and all the machinery of the law may be set in motion for his restraint or punishment."

No American, looking out upon the world today, can fail to be shocked and grieved by the sufferings of peoples who have lost their liberty. In some cases they had very little liberty to lose. In other cases they were not vigilant in preserving their liberty. In still other instances brave, vigilant, and honorable nations have been destroyed by stronger neighbors.

Current events reinforce the lesson of history by showing how difficult it is for mankind to gain and hold liberty. The Americans 150 years ago thanked Almighty God for affording them an opportunity "peaceably to establish a constitution of government for their safety and happiness." We of today have 150 stronger reasons for gratitude to the Almighty, for we enjoy tested and tried security and liberty. American liberty is no experiment. It is our sacred inheritance. What was won by our fathers we must hold. Upon each generation falls the duty of safeguarding the great treasure, the precious jewel of liberty. The generations before us have done their duty. We must do ours if our children are to be free.

Our immediate duty now, as I see it, is to safeguard our liberty by keeping out of other nations' wars. It is easy to get into war, but sometimes nations have lost their liberty by plunging into unnecessary war. No triumph in any war we might wage could bring us greater liberty than we already enjoy. We risk nothing by remaining at peace. We risk everything when we engage in war to right the wrongs of the world.

"Our liberties we prize, our rights we will maintain" is the motto of one of our States. This breathes the spirit of individual domestic liberty and national defensive strength. Liberty and valor go hand in hand. With individual rights secure, with vigilance on our watchtowers, with the sword of might in our hands, and with the smile of God lighting the flag above us we can hold fast our liberty and independence.

Once Burned

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of November 18, 1933, entitled "Once Burned":

[From the Saturday Evening Post of November 18, 1933]

ONCE BURNED

The German people have been singularly unfortunate in their leaders, for their Government has twice been headed by a megalomaniac within the past 20 years. Apparently Germany, as exemplified in Hitler, has forgotten nothing and has learned nothing.

On the other hand, the Allies were singularly stupid in imposing on Germany a treaty that contained in it the germs of a new European war. Apparently, the only thing that Germany got from the most disastrous war in the history of the world was a new kind of militarism, and France a new and not wholly unwarranted case of the jitters.

Disarmament is not the immediate answer. The passing of the new Hitler militarism and the revision of the Versailles Treaty on a good-will basis is the only answer. Then, and only then, will disarmament be on the agenda. In 1914 the Kaiser came to the forks of the road and chose the path that led down to the hell of war. Hitler treads the same way today. In his day President Wilson advanced a weak theory that the Kaiser and the German people were two and divisible. There seems to be small doubt that today Hitler and the German people are one and indivisible.

Even so, we cannot believe that a new European war is possible. For if there is one lesson that stands out clearly for even the dumbest to read, it is that under modern conditions victors in war are losers in peace no less than the conquered. As a matter of fact, Germany's defeat and disarmament gave her certain very real advantages over the victors—advantages that were working to bring her back to a desirable place in the commercial sun.

America's course in the present situation and in every future situation that threatens a European war is clear. We must use our good offices in every way possible to prevent war, but if war comes in spite of every effort that we can make, we must retire within our defenses and refuse to be drawn into it on any pretext. We shall, of course, be propagandized, threatened, and insulted. We shall have to listen to all the old arguments and abuse, and stand out against the same insidious and undercover influences, social and business, that were so influential in bringing us into the last war. The hot-heads, the profiteers, the social and business internationalists—all the old propagandists will once more be out in front shouting for war. It will again be played up as something fine and holy. But most of us have not forgotten how sordid and destructive it was and how sordid and destructive the aftermath is.

Lest we forget, let us cast up our war account briefly:

Glory. More than a hundred thousand dead, other hundreds of thousands maimed or gasping out a miserable existence from gas and shell shock.

War profits. A short period of white lights and champagne for the few, long years of poverty and misery for the many.

War debts. Billions shot away for which we are paying and our children will continue to pay.

War loans. Most of the debtors defaulting. The others trying to save face by token or inconsiderable payments.

The big laugh and the last laugh. "A war to make the world safe for democracy." "A war to end war."

All the war profits were counterfeit money. All the war loans are being paid in conversation. All the cheers for Uncle Sam, sending his youth to the trenches and lending his dollars to the Allies, have changed into sneers and snarls at Uncle Shylock, the international sucker. All the high ideals are moldering in the graves of those who fought for them.

If, as, and when we are confronted with a similar situation, we must be strong to resist propaganda, strong to resist so-called war profits, and strong to defend ourselves. We must not be too proud to fight a defensive war for our country if it is attacked, but we must be too sensible to take sides in Europe's quarrels. By all means let us use our good offices to prevent war, but let no one in or out of the administration, by word or act, directly or indirectly, commit us to becoming a party to, or an ally or associate in, any new European war.

The declaration of Mr. Davis at Geneva that "we are in no way politically alined with any European power" is reassuring, but we must be on the alert to make sure that neither pressure nor circumstance modifies that statement. President Wilson was reelected because he kept us out of war.

For the moment disarmament is a losing cause. We must strengthen rather than weaken our defenses, but with one purpose—to keep out of war and to be so well prepared that warlike nations will hesitate to attack us. Just as our economic nationalism has no other than a defensive motive behind it, so must our preparedness have no other motive behind it than isolation from another world war.

Washington was eternally right when he told us to mind our own business and to keep out of European quarrels. Though it is the fashion to regard the Constitution as outmoded and Washington's admonitions as old stuff, both were never more up to the minute than they are today.

Do We Want Neutrality or War Trade?

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter sent by me in reply to the very large number of letters I have received from citizens of Wisconsin with regard to American neutrality:

Friends of Wisconsin:

I hope that you will pardon me for sending you a form letter in answer to your communication stating your stand on this war crisis. I appreciate your interest in this most important issue now facing the American people. I realize that as your Representative I am faced with the greatest responsibility of my entire life. My action does not only affect myself or my family but it could very well be responsible for plunging us into another world war that I am certain would be vastly more destructive than was the last one and would perhaps end our democratic form of government.

Therefore I feel that all my constituents are entitled to know my attitude. I am determined never to vote to send a single one of our young men across the ocean to try and settle the quarrels of Europe unless we are attacked. I am against the repeal of the present arms embargo and shall vote to retain it.

Well do we remember the fateful days of over 20 years ago. Under a wave of emotionalism and hysterics fanned to a white heat by the most adroit propaganda we embarked upon a crusade to make the world safe for democracy and to fight a war to end all war. After the armed conflict was over and the facts gradually leaked out we found that the major propelling force which drew us into that war was to protect our foreign investments and to protect and expand our commerce. This is putting it bluntly. But the facts are that our commercial and foreign policy gradually but inevitably drew us into the world conflict. Twenty-two years have passed, and the world is again at war. Never in all human history has the armament race carried on on such a gigantic scale as today. All the loss of the millions of young men and all the destruction of billions of dollars of property have seemingly been for naught. Wars have not ceased, nor are democracies secure. All this supreme sacrifice has been in vain. Instead, in its wake we have the most unprecedented world depression with its suffering and despair. Friendly trade relations have almost been destroyed. Fear has driven nations to intense nationalism. Huge national debts are breaking the backs of the people, and the heels of the dictators are crushing out the last vestige of human rights and liberty. The sum total of that supreme effort has been hate, fear, loss, despair, chaos.

Everyone is for peace. At least everyone says so. And most Americans will tell you with great emphasis that they don't want this country to get mixed up in another European war. But what we want and what we get are sometimes two different things. And generally the thing that determines is how much we are willing to give and to do to get the thing we want.

America will not stay out of this war, nor make her contribution to world peace, unless she makes up her mind now to pay the price that will be necessary. We have got to decide whether we will choose peace or profits. If we adopt a policy of allowing war trade to go on by selling arms and war materials, we would start straight down the road that led to the World War. Our munition factories would be enlarged to meet the war demand. When cash gave out, we would have to extend loans or close our factories, and we would have to help those who have been buying arms from us to win the war. In this connection, the following figures are interesting: Our trade with the Allies up to the time we entered the war amounted to $7,000,000,000. The World War has cost to date over $50,000,000,000. Here is another way of looking at the question of war profits: In the last war the United States sent 2,000,000 men to France. The pay for that period they were there was about $1,100,000,000. This is the sum which one corporation—United States Steel—made in clear profits, over and above all taxes in 1915–18. While soldiers fought in trenches for $1 a day, Eugene G. Grace, president of Bethlehem Steel, for the single year 1918, collected a bonus of $1,386,193. While 10,000,000 men lost their lives, the Du Pont Co. paid dividends on its common stock of 100 percent in 1916, 51 percent in 1917, 26 percent in 1918, and still had $50,000,000 to put into a new dye industry, $47,000,000 to buy 25 percent stock ownership of General Motors, acquired partial control of 26 other corporations. While 5,000,000 women were being left widows, profits in munitions companies ranged from 22 percent to 943 percent. While $208,000,000,000 were being spent on the war, profits in 1917 in a few of the munitions and supplies companies ranged as follows: Nagel Steel Co., 319 percent; Utah Copper Co., 200 percent; Calumet & Hecla, 800 percent; Bethlehem Loading Co., 362 percent.

Did it pay to choose profits from munitions sale instead of staying out of the bloody conflict?

Note what President Wilson himself told Frank Cobb the night before he asked Congress to put us into the World War:

"It means that we will lose our heads along with the rest and stop weighing right and wrong. * * * It means an attempt to reconstruct a peacetime civilization with war standards, and at the end of the war there will be no bystanders with sufficient power to influence the terms. There won't be any peace standards left to work with. There will be only war standards."

The whole question of peace or war for America is being threshed out now in Congress. The American people must make their choice about profits or peace. They should make their choice known to their Representative in Congress. This is a choice which will vitally affect all of our people. Let there be no delay in the people's decision. If there is prompt action by the people, there will be prompt action by the Congress. Let that action be for peace instead of profits.

There is one other important phase of the war-and-peace question which I would like to call to your attention in closing. That is the question of who shall have the power to decide on peace or war when we are not attacked. Many of you know that there have been introduced in this Congress various proposals to give the people the right to make the war or peace decision by means of a Nation-wide referendum when the Western Hemisphere is not attacked. These resolutions have been introduced in both the Senate and the House. They ask that we shall not engage in a foreign war unless the people give their consent. This legislation, I believe, is a protection which should be given to the people who, in the final analysis, pay the bills in blood and taxes.

I believe that Congress will act as soon as you and your fellow Americans make your desires known to your Representatives. Let us stay out of foreign conflicts. Let us choose neutrality in place of profits. Let us all work to give to the people the right to vote on foreign wars. These, I believe, are the things we have to do to stay out of this war. We must be ready and willing to help the world and our own people achieve the economic security which is the bedrock of a peaceful world. Our contribution as a nation should be first to put our house in order and give to the world an example of democracy that is working for all.

EDITORIAL FROM THE IOWA LEGIONNAIRE

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein the following editorial from the Iowa Legionnaire, September 15, 1939, entitled "Must Stay Neutral":

[From the Iowa Legionnaire of September 15, 1939]

MUST STAY NEUTRAL

Will the United States eventually get into the European war?

Not unless the war menaces the Western Hemisphere—if enough Americans keep sane.

The chances of Germany and her possible allies offending any nation in this part of the world are extremely remote, so why the widespread belief here that sooner or later we shall engage in the conflict?

True, Russia and Germany are in a pact through which the Nazis are receiving munitions and supplies and may get military aid from the Communists; true, that while Italy is now neutral, she may be expected to join the forces fighting Great Britain, France, and Poland; and true, the personal sympathies of most Americans are with the latter trio, but still sober thinking and study should fire every one of us to vigorously oppose any move whatsoever which might cost the life of a single Yankee boy under the existing situation over there.

Should we sell arms and munitions to any of the belligerents, transported on our ships?

Ninety percent of Americans say no, because of what that policy caused in the last war.

Should we sell to those who would send after them and pay cash on delivery?

Many Americans say yes, contending this would be fair and neutral, but knowing it would help only one side—the side most of us favor, without risking a submarine attack from the other side which would certainly shoot us into the war. They either do not or do not want to realize that if an American plant producing for British and French purchases were to be blown up the reaction here would be like it would be if a vessel of ours were torpedoed.

We loathe nazi-ism and communism alike. We guessed months ago that Russia and Germany would unite, because their Governments were so similar. We have said and written repeatedly that the isms of both should be banished from our land because both would destroy Americanism.

We like some things about Great Britain and France, and our heart aches for Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Ethiopia and the victims of vicious persecution in Germany, Russia, and Italy. We earnestly hope the isms of Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini are exterminated from the earth.

But we saved Great Britain and France at heavy loss of blood and treasure in 1917–18, and what did they do in gratitude? First, they tried to draw us into a League of Nations which was nothing more nor less than an alliance of the victorious powers to be dominated completely by Britain with 5 votes to our 1 in the lower house. They clamped penalties on the defeated through the Versailles Treaty which made it a volcano of hate. They agreed at the Harding Limitation of Armaments Conference to scrap ships—we did that and they scrapped blueprints. They refused to pay their war debts—now with those of other allies amounting to $13,000,000,000—insisting it was our war as much as theirs, and that we should willingly take that burden because we lost so many fewer men than they did in battle. They let Japan bite into Manchuria and rape China, Italy confiscate Ethiopia, and Germany gobble Austria and Czechoslovakia with hardly a word of protest. They tried desperately to induce Russia to be with them against the Rome-Berlin axis; they failed to do with "red" Russia what Germany has accomplished, and their enemies in recent years have been doing only what Britain and France tried to do for centuries.

In the light of these facts, the American people should retain the utmost balance on what our country's course should be. We must above everything else have unity of spirit among all classes and creeds; turn blazing resistance to destructive isms and their organizations and agents among us and make the country simply too hot for foreign spies. We must support our Government in a national-defense program through which we might stand alone if need be against any probable coalition. We must let the world know that if our Congress declares war we shall go anywhere under the flag. We should intensify our efforts to put over the Legion's universal service bill. We should try to expose schemes of those who would thrust us into fighting that they might profit, and try to winnow dangerous propaganda from the facts in everything we read and hear. We should make it too uncomfortable for profiteers on food and other articles to continue their nefarious practices. We should keep ever in mind the guaranties of freedom provided by the Constitution, for to violate them is to act like the Communists and Nazis.

National Commander Stephen F. Chadwick is sounding ringing appeals for America to stay neutral. Seventeen wars were fought on this planet between Armistice Day and the outbreak of the present conflict, in not one of which was there any thought of America becoming involved. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, and other democracies kept neutral in the last war and will do so in this one; why, then, must anyone be certain that the United States cannot be because we were not 22 years ago?

America must stay neutral if it can be done with honor and security. To that end every Legionnaire and every other loyal American should commit himself to the limit.

War veterans, with true Americanism which fires them to commendably despise both nazi-ism and communism, and who realize the Russo-German Pact may force some of them and many of their sons and other people's sons to die in armed conflict, are right in earnestly protesting against red-hued Earl Browder and brown-baked Fritz Kuhn and their Commu-Nazis trying to justify it in American institutions which the ideologies of their European masters would destroy.

Of course, their are two ways to protest, and the right way is to, in every move, uphold the Constitution and maintain law and order.

President Roosevelt will call a special session of Congress to convene October 2, to consider American policy in the European situation, the daily press was reporting when this paper went to press.

It is entirely within reason that this probable date was set with thought that by then the more than 1,000,000 World War veterans in the American Legion would have spoken on the subject through their national convention.

Can We Keep Out of War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. JESSIE SUMNER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JESSIE SUMNER OF ILLINOIS, SEPTEMBER 10, 1939

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the C. C. C. Camp Gilman, Crescent City, Ill., on Sunday, September 10, 1939:

The question now uppermost in the minds of all Americans is, Can we keep out of the whirlpool of war in Europe?

Several small nations of Europe manage to remain neutral throughout war after war there. But the great strength of the United States is also our greatest weakness. Foreign nations have learned to think of America as a rich relative, easily persuaded to kill a fatted calf for every prodigal.

Months before any aggressor trespassed the boundaries of Poland an army of diplomats and propagandists invaded the United States. Apparently they had forgotten how we insulted them by urging them to repay money borrowed in the World War.

They proclaimed their love for us. They flattered and made friends with men occupying responsible Government positions. They had refused to join us in our effort to prevent a Japanese aggressor from gobbling up Manchukuo at our back door in the Orient. But they urged us to lead them in an effort to suppress a German aggressor on their front porch. They reminded us that the League of Nations was an American suggestion.

The League of Nations is a splendid ideal. It is, in my opinion, unconstitutional. For under the Constitution the power to declare war resides in the Congress. The League of Nations renders this power merely formal. The real power is surrendered to diplomats and members of the State Department, who are appointed by the President, who, moreover, are career men, who survive the defeat of President after President. So far we have never found men for these positions who seemed to know how to cope with European diplomats. Living in the rarefied atmosphere of diplomatic circles, they forget to remember that we are no longer a colony of Great Britain. In that atmosphere the troubles of the little farmers out here, who have to pay their share of the bills for large sums loaned to and not paid back by foreign neighbors, seem very far away. The Representatives in Congress, on the other hand, are reminded once every 2 years that they are not elected in Great Britain. Congressmen have to represent people who have come from all nationalities, who look on all the countries as mother countries, who remember these countries tenderly but independently.

It is not only propagandists from the democracies who invaded us. The Germans had a case to present. The Treaty of Versailles settling the World War was unjust, and the United States did not ratify it. It took away an unfair amount of territory. Germany was a noxious weed. So Germany was slashed and cut until nothing was left except the root—the root of trouble in Germany—her overwhelming ambition to be as great as any other European country.

Unfortunately for the German cause, however, German propagandists used Nazi methods of diplomacy in America. They organized a bund. They paraded in New York in Nazi uniforms. It was as if a widow who had shot three husbands went to propose to her beloved with a revolver bulging out of her pocket. To such wooing your Uncle Sam has been polite but unenthusiastic.

The neutrality bill was catapulted upon the floor of the House so quickly after the departure of the English King and Queen that it seemed like a parting salute to them.

The British wanted this bill because it revived the cash-and-carry provisions of the present law, which expired this spring.

The cash-and-carry clause, as you know, permits warring nations to buy arms in the United States, providing they pay cash and carry away the arms in ships that are not American. Japan in the Pacific and England in the Atlantic have big navies. They can take advantage of this law and prevent their enemies taking advantage of the same privilege.

The House of Representatives voted down this provision and substituted an embargo preventing shipment of arms. The Senate refused to consider the bill, so the old law still remains in force. Under it we can't ship arms to foreign nations in the present war.

Those who voted for the embargo felt that the traditional American policy is one of fairness to all nations. We knew that England has a way of hooking up with, first, Germany against France, then France against Germany. We refused to hook up with England ahead of time. The State Department had already issued a regulation short of war restricting trade with Germany—at some expense to American agriculture, since it deprived us of the German market for oil, lard, pork, and other commodities. So far, however, your Congress has sincerely tried not to play favorites with any nation.

The declaration of war in Europe has put so many new angles upon all our current problems that Congressmen need to be studying night and day. The cost of living is rising. The undertaker across the street from me complains that, due to speculation in steel, the price of caskets has risen 20 percent. It's growing too expensive to live and almost too expensive to die. The umbrella of our Monroe Doctrine extends over Canada to our north, now waging war against Germany and Mexico to the south, now become a base for German ships and furnishing them oil recently taken away from Americans. The Congress is about to be recalled, asked to repeal the arms embargo, urged to pass a cash-and-carry provision.

Congressmen will appreciate that this is a very grave decision because there is no way of determining in advance how grave it may turn out to have been. The cash-and-carry provision is as easy to evade as was the old liquor prohibition law. Cash becomes short term credit—short term credits, not paid, become gifts to foreign nations. It puts us officially and permanently upon the European sucker list. It will bring the European war to the borders of the United States, if the enemy becomes strong enough, or acquires strong enough allies.

The chief advocates of the cash-and-carry provision are those who have been as optimistic about the Government bond market as Wall Street speculators were about the stock market in 1928.

In July when the notorious lending bill was being studied by the House committee of which I am a member, I asked the Secretary of the Treasury, who was a witness, whether, in view of the danger of war, we had better not stop so much borrowing and spending. He disagreed with me. Today the bond market is contradicting his judgment.

The point is that no expert can tell you how far the balloon of Government credit can be stretched before it will burst. Your Government is not in the same condition it was in 1917. We have been borrowing money from the citizens of tomorrow, eating their bread. Through the Government agencies working like moles are people who sincerely think that if they could make our country into something resembling Russia they would be doing you a favor. Many well-respected statesmen believe that if we go into a war dictatorship, as we must if we go into a war, we shall not emerge once more a free republic.

We have forgiven ourselves the mistake we made in 1917. If, knowing we have nothing to gain and everything to lose, we go into this one, what excuse shall we give the next generation?

Some of us think that, for once, England has muffed her cards. In the effort to suppress Germany are they not playing into the hands of a more powerful menace? This war would not be going on if it had not been encouraged by the Communist dictator. He is growing rich upon it, waiting, apparently, until England, France, and Germany are too weak to resist anybody. He has organizers in all the countries, including the United States, stirring up strikes and discontent, working toward a world revolution. If the German dictator is a wart upon the nose, the Communist dictator is a cancer upon the liver.

In the debate upon neutrality it was obvious that most thoughtful Congressmen felt that the best interest of Americans is to keep out of this war. Yet the thought seemed to haunt them that again, as in 1917, the people at home would become so worked up, the pressure of public opinion to help one side would become so great, that Congressmen would feel forced to vote for war.

For that reason I think that the American frontier is not on the Rhine but upon your own doorstep.

It is dangerous to leave public opinion to be created by the beaters of tom-toms. Be careful not to say to your neighbor "We can't stay out. We're sure to get into it." As if American citizens have no more control over our destinies than turkeys at Thanksgiving time—not that I care when we celebrate Thanksgiving so long as we can still count liberty and peace among our blessings.

Try saying instead, "We must remain at peace. We have malice toward none. We have sympathy for all, even for those who are misled."

At great cost of blood and money we have already proved in 1917 that we cannot force democracy upon any foreign country nor force them to remain at peace. If we refuse to become slaves to European hates, refuse to become war horses rushing into harness every time a European bugle toots, refuse to become skeletons in the dance of death, which has occurred periodically in Europe ever since the beginning of European history, we shall still have a chance, by reviving and repairing our form of government, to prove that it is best not only for English, French, German, and people of all creeds and races who live together peacefully here in America but for all who live together anywhere.

The road of peace for America will not be an easy road. It is not the path of least resistance. We may look cowardly, stingy, and cruel as we struggle along it. But it is the road you and I must take if we wish to promote the cause of peace and democracy for the children of men and women here and all over the world.

Lindbergh's Appeal for Isolation

OF

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered over the radio by Col. Charles A. Lindbergh:

[From the New York Times of September 16, 1939]

LINDBERGH'S APPEAL FOR ISOLATION

WASHINGTON, September 15.—Following is the text of the radio speech by Colonel Lindbergh:

"In times of great emergency men of the same belief must gather together for mutual counsel and action. If they fail to do this, all that they stand for will be lost. I speak tonight to those people in the United States of America who feel that the destiny of this country does not call for our involvement in European wars.

"We must band together to prevent the loss of more American lives in these internal struggles of Europe. We must keep foreign propaganda from pushing our country blindly into another war. Modern war, with all its consequences, is too tragic and too devastating to be approached from anything but a purely American standpoint. We should never enter a war unless it is absolutely essential to the future welfare of our Nation.

"This country was colonized by men and women from Europe. The hatreds, the persecutions, the intrigues they left behind gave them courage to cross the Atlantic Ocean to a new land. They preferred the wilderness and the Indians to the problems of Europe. They weighed the cost of freedom from those problems, and they paid the price. In this country they eventually found a means of living peacefully together—the same nationalities that are fighting abroad today.

POINTS TO MONROE DOCTRINE

"The quarrels of Europe faded out from American life as generations passed. Instead of wars between the English, French, and Germans, it became a struggle of the New World for freedom from the old—a struggle for the right of America to find her own destiny. The colonization of this country grew from European troubles and our freedom sprang from European war, for we won independence from England while she was fighting France.

"No one foresaw the danger ahead of us more clearly than George Washington. He solemnly warned the people of America against becoming entangled in European alliances. For over 100 years his advice was followed. We established the Monroe Doctrine for America. We let other nations fight among themselves. Then in 1917 we entered a European war. This time we were on England's side, and so were France and Russia. Friends and enemies reverse as decades pass—as political doctrines rise and fall.

RECALLS WORLD WAR LOSSES

"The Great War ended before our full force had reached the field. We escaped with the loss of relatively few soldiers. We measured our dead in thousands. Europe measured hers in millions. Europe has not yet recovered from the effects of that war, and she has already enacted another. A generation has passed since the armistice of 1918, but even in America we are still paying for our part in that victory, and we will continue to pay for another generation. European countries were both unable and unwilling to pay their debts to us.

"Now that war has broken out again, we in America have a decision to make on which the destiny of our Nation depends. We must decide whether or not we intend to become forever involved in this age-old struggle between the nations of Europe.

"Let us not delude ourselves. If we enter the quarrels of Europe during war, we must stay in them in time of peace as well. It is madness to send our soldiers to be killed as we did in the last war if we turn the course of peace over to the greed, the fear, and the intrigue of European nations. We must either keep out of European wars entirely or stay in European affairs permanently.

WOULD PUT ASIDE PITY

"In making our decision, this point should be clear: These wars in Europe are not wars in which our civilization is defending itself against some Asiatic intruder. There is no Genghis Khan nor Xerxes marching against our western nations. This is not a question of banding together to defend the white race against foreign invasion. This is simply one more of those age-old quarrels within our own family of nations—a quarrel arising from the errors of the last war—from the failure of the victors of that war to follow a consistent policy either of fairness or of force.

"Arbitrary boundaries can be maintained only by strength of arms. The Treaty of Versailles either had to be revised as time passed or England and France, to be successful, had to keep Germany weak by force. Neither policy was followed—Europe wavered back and forth between the two. As a result, another war has begun—a war which is likely to be far more prostrating than the last; a war which will again kill off the best youth of Europe; a war which may even lead to the end of our western civilization.

"We must not permit our sentiment, our pity, or our personal feelings of sympathy to obscure the issue, to affect our children's lives. We must be as impersonal as a surgeon with his knife. Let us make no mistake about the cost of entering this war. If we take part successfully, we must throw the resources of our entire Nation into the conflict. Munitions alone will not be enough.

LITTLE TO GAIN HE SAYS

"We cannot count on victory merely by shipping abroad several thousand airplanes and cannon. We are likely to lose a million men, possibly several million—the best of American youth. We will be staggering under the burden of recovery during the rest of our lives. And our children will be fortunate if they see the end in their lives, even if, by some unlikely chance, we do not pass on another Polish Corridor to them. Democracy itself may not survive. If we enter fighting for democracy abroad, we may end by losing it at home.

"America has little to gain by taking part in another European war. We must not be misguided by this foreign propaganda to the effect that our frontiers lie in Europe. One need only glance at a map to see where our true frontiers lie. What more could we ask than the Atlantic Ocean on the east and the Pacific on the west? No; our interests in Europe need not be from the standpoint of defense. Our own natural frontiers are enough for that. If we extend them to the center of Europe, we might as well extend them around the earth. An ocean is a formidable barrier, even for modern aircraft.

"Our safety does not lie in fighting European wars. It lies in our own internal strength, in the character of the American people and of American institutions. As long as we maintain an Army, a Navy, and an air force worthy of the name, as long as America does not decay within, we need fear no invasion of this country.

ASSERTS MUCH NEWS IS COLORED

"Again, I address those among you who agree with this stand. Our future and our children's future depend upon the action we take. It is essential to think clearly and to act quickly in the days which are to come. We will be deluged with propaganda, both foreign and domestic—some obvious, some insidious. Much of our news is already colored. Every incident and every accident will be seized upon to influence us. And in a modern war there are bound to be plenty of both. We must learn to look behind every article we read and every speech we hear. We must not only inquire about the writer and the speaker—about his personal interests and his nationality—but we must ask who owns and who influences the newspaper, the news picture, and the radio station. If our people know the truth, if they are fully and accurately informed, if they are not misled by propaganda, this country is not likely to enter the war now going on in Europe.

"And if Europe is again prostrated by war, as she has been so often in the past, then the greatest hope for our western civilization lies in America. By staying out of war ourselves we may even bring peace to Europe more quickly.

"Let us look to our own defense and to our own character. If we attend to them, we have no need to fear what happens elsewhere. If we do not attend to them, nothing can save us.

"If war brings more dark ages to Europe, we can better preserve those things which we love and which we mourn the passing of in Europe today by preserving them here, by strengthening them here, rather than by hurling ourselves thoughtlessly to their defense over there and thus destroying all in the conflagration. The German genius for science and organization, the English genius for government and commerce, the French genius for living and understanding of life—they must not go down here as well as on the other side. Here in America they can be blended to form the greatest genius of all.

"The gift of civilized life must still be carried on. It is more important than the sympathies, the friendships, the desires of any single generation. This is the test before America now. This is the challenge—to carry on western civilization."

One Reason Why the Neutrality Law Should Not Be Repealed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 25, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert herein an editorial published in the New York Herald Tribune of September 24, 1939:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of September 24, 1939]

THE DEMOCRATIC WAY

This hour, when the whole world is adrift and the unpredictable is the probable, calls above all else for candor. The old accepted bases of civilization have been engulfed in the totalitarian tide. What should America do to cope with this terrifying unknown?

As our readers know, we have been and are strongly supporting President Roosevelt in his plea for restoring the so-called Neutrality Act to the historic bases of true neutrality. That way, in our judgment, lies not only the sound American system of government but also the best chance of peace for America. The present unneutral law not only holds an incidental threat to the potential allies of this Nation in the Americas and in the Pacific but, more important, establishes a fundamentally unsound basis for the long pull.

We think it highly important, however, that this amendment of the Neutrality Act should be made with complete understanding of all the realities of this situation. We urge it as part of the normal democratic way of handling an emergency under the American system. As part of that system, confronted by the present crisis, we deem it equally important to insist that Congress remain in session during this period of stress. With his usual clearheadedness Mr. Landon has done a great public service in insisting upon this point. He has also focused attention upon the personal factor which strengthens the urgency of this demand by his plea to the President to renounce a third term. The stanch Americanism of Mr. Landon shows in this plea as well as his intimate understanding of American politics.

It must be conceded, in all candor, that one of the strongest motives behind the hesitation of Congress to yield to the President's demand for modification of the Neutrality Act is distrust of Mr. Roosevelt's qualifications to direct the Nation in its present crisis. We do not question his motives, as does a considerable part of Congress. We do question his poise, his restraint, his judgment of events, his steadiness of purpose. His whole career as President has shown a flightiness, an impulsiveness, which render him, however patriotic may be his motives, singularly unfitted to guide the Nation through troubled waters.

We think this fact must be openly considered and frankly accepted by Congress in reaching a decision as to the Neutrality Act. The more candidly it is faced, the better. Mr. Roosevelt's sensational announcement of submarines at our gates was a particularly dramatic climax to a long series of emotional episodes in which Mr. Roosevelt has shown an inability either to hold his tongue or to keep his head. Submarines on the high seas off our coast are nothing new. They have no immediate significance, and the President displayed a dangerous war-mongering tendency in dramatizing them as he did.

There will be more such episodes. The country will not be easy in its mind, in our judgment, until either Mr. Roosevelt announces his rejection of a third term, as Mr. Landon urges, or he is succeeded in office by a President temperamentally fitted to guide the Nation in taut, racking hours.

The answer is not, however, to continue the present absurd unneutrality act. It is that Congress shall remain in session so long as the present emergency lasts. It has the power of debate. It has the power of investigation. It is the one effective democratic answer to an excitable President unable to restrain his tongue or his actions. After amending the Embargo Act to accord with the American system and provide adequate freedom of action for an unpredictable future, Congress should in all calmness remain in session. The lift to American hearts which this common-sense procedure would achieve would in itself count for much in maintaining the Nation's steadiness and will to peace.

United States Neutrality

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, since this special session of Congress was called for the sole purpose of revising our neutrality laws, it becomes very important to consider this subject thoroughly. When the fires of war are burning furiously in Europe and Asia and the Western Hemisphere seems the only place where peace seems secure, the matter of our own conduct in the eyes of other nations becomes material to the maintenance of peace in this hemisphere.

With respect to our neutrality, there are certain facts which this Congress is aware of, and these are material to any just action we may finally take. These facts are:

First. Ninety-five percent of the people in the United States do not want this country to engage in any war across the seas; most of these will fight to the finish if any nation should bring war to our shores; but it is also certain that should this Congress declare war against any foreign power and attempt to send our forces overseas there would be widespread disorders in this country and probably open rebellion against such an act of Congress.

IS THIS COUNTRY READY FOR WAR OF ANY KIND?

Second. Is this country ready for war of any kind? It is well understood in military circles that for every man on the front line under arms three civilians are necessary behind the lines to keep the materials of war coming up to the front. With an army of 5,000,000, it would require 15,000,000 more to bring up the fuel of war. This whole organization must be united in purpose and nothing could bring this about except public opinion. When we have fully one-half of our population in some form of distress, with millions thrown out of their homes to become wanderers along the highways and streets, no such public opinion would or could be formed in this country. Our duty now is, if we desire to prepare for a war of defense, to adopt a policy which will enable honest men to retain their homes and care for their families. If the process of foreclosure and ejectment continues unabated as it has since 1929, the time will soon come, if it is not here now, when the great majority in this country will be homeless and a few will own the soil—the source of all life. Within the last 10 days we have seen examples of how those who are homeless react to this situation when they have a chance. In Poland, when the red Army of Russia occupied the eastern two-thirds of the territory, those who owned homes were rounded up and shot. Thousands hid away when the "red" Army came in, but they were soon found out. The Russians organized the poor of Poland into squads to bring in the landowners and when they did the landowners' property was confiscated and divided up among those who had no land. It was the Poles themselves who took the leading part in this murder and confiscation. This would never have happened if in Poland more consideration had been given to the homeless and the destitute.

What happened in Poland can happen here—it can happen anywhere. If the opportunity should come in the United States where the homeless could take united action, there is absolutely no doubt but what those in this country who have too much wealth would be hunted down by our own citizens and shot and their property distributed among those who were homeless. All property would be confiscated by the state, and most of the owners executed. This Congress should concern itself with the welfare of those in distress in this country and determine the cause of that distress and forcefully correct the situation. When we have the great majority of the people in this country enjoying the privileges of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, I will predict that there is no nation or combination of nations on earth that could send any force against us which we could not stop.

Third. Since we all say there shall be no war as far as the United States is concerned, the next thing is to know what to do about our present neutrality law. As a preliminary statement, I think the whole matter of concocting a neutrality law was a mistake and that this country would have been more secure now under international law. We must either work under that law or change the law.

In examining the proposed changes the President wants a repeal of the embargo in the present law and a further provision that our ships and citizens keep out of foreign war zones. The provision to keep our ships and citizens out of foreign war zones, it seems to me, is the very best possible improvement we could make to the present law. If ships and citizens violated that law and were sent to the bottom of the sea, this country's duty to protect them or demand satisfaction could not be called up, for the reason that nowhere do we attempt to protect our citizens who are engaged in the violation of our own laws. The Germans could sink as many of our ships found carrying contraband of war as they could locate, and this country would make no protest except if the act were done in manifest disregard to all principles of humanity.

Fourth. I do not know anything about the sentiment in other States, but in North Dakota it would appear that fully 75 percent of the people do not want the embargo removed. They believe that will keep us out of war. I do not know what the foundation for this belief is unless it be that since we are not now in any war or close to any war in this country that that fact is attributed to the present ban on shipping munitions to warring nations. Whatever the foundation, the fact remains that the people of North Dakota now believe that if we repealed the arms embargo that we would be headed for war.

No one is smart enough to predict just what will happen. If we do not repeal the arms embargo, does anyone in this country think munitions will not be sent to England and France? If the sentiment of the American people favors England and France, the munitions will go forward just as they did in the World War. We became directly involved in the war with Germany because she sank the Lusitania. Germany said the Lusitania was carrying a cargo of munitions for England. This Government said no—it was not carrying munitions. Senator La Follette said the Lusitania was carrying munitions, and for that statement came near to being impeached by the Senate of the United States. After the war the facts came out that La Follette was right. Germany was right, and she had the right to destroy munitions carried in neutral ships.

Should some shipowner, sympathizing with England and France or Germany, decide to smuggle munitions across the sea—and smugglers do not usually tell the Government what they have on board, except to show their manifests—and such a ship is stopped by an enemy submarine, examined, searched, and sunk, what will be the difference between that situation and the sinking of the Lusitania? Will public sentiment demand action against a nation that sinks one of our ships en route on a peaceful mission—no one but the searchers will know the ship is carrying munitions—and carrying innocent citizens of this country?

THE MOST IMPORTANT QUESTION WE CAN TAKE IS TO PROHIBIT OUR SHIPS AND CITIZENS FROM ENTERING ANY WAR ZONE

It seems to me the most important action we can take is not to concern ourselves with the question of whether we repeal or keep the ban on munitions, but to prohibit our ships and citizens from entering any war zone. If both will stay at home, there can be no possibility of going to war on their account.

If we keep the ban on munitions, those who make munitions will go somewhere else to make them. Not only will they go there, but they have already started making munitions outside of the United States for the use of belligerents.

No one can read about the complete destruction of Poland without wishing, hoping, and praying that he could prevent such an occurrence. But there are many such catastrophes taking place and have taken place within the past few months which are equally as abhorrent to an American citizen. We cannot police the world. Our duty, rather than to work out too far, is to work here at home and preserve civilization on the Westeren Hemisphere. If we do that, we will have to make more sacrifices than we are now aware of.

IT IS OF FAR GREATER IMPORTANCE TO CIVILIZATION FOR US TO FIGHT FOR AMERICA

I think it is of far greater importance to civilization for us to fight for America and save at least one spot on the surface of the globe where men may live at peace in their own homes and worship God in their own way.

Lest we forget what it cost to make the world safe for democracy in 1917–18, let me say that the total cost in money up to 1934 was $41,765,000,000, and to this should be added the amounts we have paid for the Veterans' Administration for war claims and interest on war debts for the years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938.

We find for 1935 that the total cost was	$659,348,870
For 1936	3,663,057,044

When we add these total costs together, to date we find the staggering sum of $47,247,286,344. And we are still not through, because we must add to this the money and credit we advanced to the Allies during and after the war, which today, with interest, if no cancelations had been made, would have amounted to $22,000,000,000; therefore, the grand total would be $69,247,286,244, and still we do not have the beginning of the cost to us in the last World War. The real cost can be found in the following figures: The total forces mobilized were 4,355,000; killed and died, 126,000; wounded casualties, 234,000; prisoners and missing, 4,500; total casualties, 350,000. And it is to be remembered that we made this staggering sacrifice to make the world safe for democracy, and when we observe what is going on in Europe now we can realize how well we did the job in 1917–18. If there is a democracy left in Europe when the present war ends, it will be a surprise to everyone.

If we will now spend one-third of what it cost us in 1917–18 to make the world safe for democracy, and spend it for the rehabilitation of America, we will have built upon this continent a Government which will preserve for the world an impenetrable bulwark of civilization. If civilization is to disappear from the earth, let us hope that its last banner will be torn down on the soil of the United States.

ARTICLE BY HON. CHARLES EDISON, ACTING SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems appropriate during these critical times to call to the attention of the Congress facts concerning our own national defense.

This is the reason I am inserting in the record the following remarkable, clearly written, and valuable article by the Honorable Charles Edison, Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The name Edison is a household word in America. Charles Edison is carrying on the best tradition of that name and giving to his country, as the head of our Navy, that fine, unselfish, and splendid service that has caught the grateful attention of the Nation, and one that would make his famous father so justly proud if he were alive today.

Likeable, lovable, brainy Charlie Edison goes about his tremendous task quietly, simply, and efficiently to make our defenses impregnable against the world, and thereby has won his way into the hearts and minds of the American people.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From Liberty for September 30, 1939]

THE AMERICAN MAGINOT LINE—HERE IS AMERICA'S PROBLEM: OUR NAVY IS THE FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE—IS IT STRONG ENOUGH?

(By Hon. Charles Edison, Acting Secretary of the Navy)

Along the thousands of miles of boundary between the United States and its neighbors no men crouch in cement-lined burrows grimly and ceaselessly watching the borders above the alert muzzles of guns. Our public parks are not scarred with trenches for emergency refuge against air raids, and in no city do basement doors proclaim shelter from poison gas. So live—at this writing—the peoples of Europe. In England and France, Italy and Germany, men and women and children have had to adjust their routine of normal living to include a constant awareness of danger from invasion.

Americans are free from such constant reminders of danger, yet the danger from war in Europe extends to the Americas, and the broad oceans which still are a natural bulwark against foreign aggression are also avenues for an enemy, avenues made into a speedway by the development of aviation.

The same combination of wings, motors, brains, and daring which makes it possible to carry tons of freight and passengers across the oceans makes possible the transportation of tons of explosives. The menace of perverted human ingenuity which can leap over the sea on wings is matched by submarines darting under the sea. Airplane carriers, for that matter, can, if not completely opposed, bring hundreds of bombers to cripple industries and communications far inland. Altogether, we now have to string a few strands of barbed wire along the tops of our natural barriers. The United States must have a Maginot line of impenetrable defense. It is being built!

Our essential task is to make it impossible for an invader to obtain a foothold on this side of the earth. Those who might attack us must, unless they come determined to die after doing as much damage as they can inflict, maintain an uninterrupted flow of supplies from their homeland. To defend ourselves successfully, we Americans must make this end of the sea lanes a dead-end street, so that no enemy can get over, under, around, or through to bomb the mainlands or—biggest defense problem of all—destroy the Panama Canal and thereby leave either coast without naval defense.

Given a rim of coastal defenses capable, in conjunction with the fleet, of stopping a direct assault upon the continent, the safety and peace of Americans are secured. Denied this safety belt, a navy twice the size of our eventual strength would be as handicapped as a heavyweight champion with both eyes blackened and closed.

This year the Navy Department has begun to fill the gaps in the existing rim of defenses, to provide the three coasts of the United States with overlapping areas of protection. It is a program integrated with the War Department's expansion of the Panama Canal's armed security to make that life line unbreakable. By direction of President Roosevelt, after his July conferences with Admiral William D. Leahy, retiring Chief of Naval Operations, and other high ranking officers, about $20,000,000 is being immediately invested to begin building and correlating new air bases and strengthening existing ones.

When the full program is eventually completed, at a cost several times that of the money available this year, the continental United States will be surrounded by a belt of invisible chain mail. Every approach to the United States or its neighbors by sea or air will be under surveillance. Scouting airplanes will exist in force to detect an enemy's approach. Combat airplanes and bombers will be ready to harry and delay the invaders while the main force of the Navy and the Army mobilize for action. Submarines and mine layers will go to work from all the bases within the zone of probable combat when the alarm is given.

Every portal to the northern half of this hemisphere is going to be equipped, so to speak, with "electric eyes" to slam the door and give warning of intrusion.

To most persons, and especially to those who live in the interior, the Navy Department is imagined to concern itself wholly with warships; and that, of course, is the Department's main business. But battleships, cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and airplanes are no stronger than their bases. With the growth in importance of airplanes as offensive and defensive weapons, the importance of dry land to naval operations has multiplied. So, too, has the importance of the submarine increased as a defense against attacks by air, for one of the jobs we rely upon the underwater craft to perform is to evade the defenses of airplane carriers and, by sinking them, to render the invading airplanes homeless and consequently total losses.

Of course, the Department's first task was to provide the United States with an adequate fleet of fighting ships. We have building or under contract 8 battleships, which will include some of the largest ever launched, 2 aircraft carriers, and 5 cruisers. About one-fourth of our 20 new submarines are completed, and more than a third of our 42 new destroyers. Besides these, the Navy is in process of acquiring 24 vessels of other categories, such as tenders and tugs, and half a dozen of the exceedingly swift little motor torpedo boats. Most of the job of giving the United States a fleet second to none is well begun. Now we are entering upon the task of backing up the fleet with the bases it will need, and that we expect to have finished before the new fighting ships are all afloat.

Spaced around the United States, from New London, Conn., to Sitka, Alaska, the Navy already has more than a score of such bases. Some are all-purpose establishments, some for submarines only, others for airplanes or destroyers, or for the several combinations of these three. Not included in this figure are the Hawaiian bases, which are in a class by themselves.

We are adding immediately a new air base at Jacksonville, Fla., and aviation-submarine bases at San Juan, P. R., and Kodiak, Alaska. Eventually we expect to build air and submarine bases at Quonsett, R. I., Corpus Christi, Tex., and Unalaska. That will give us, with the fleet at sea, our Maginot line of overlapping chain-mail defense—the greatest guarantor of peaceful security we have ever had or can have without going to jittery extremes.

If I have emphasized the potential duties of aircraft, submarines, and destroyers operating from this augmented girdle of defenses, it has been to explain what we are preventing. We are not getting ready for a war. We are making an attack upon the United States and its neighborhood so unlikely to succeed that nobody is going to try it. I interrupt this theme, which I hope the readers of Liberty will accept as an informal and untechnical report to the American people, emphatically to declare that we are not getting ready to fight anybody.

We are getting ready so nobody will try to fight us, or to dispossess our neighbors by force as a prelude to knocking us down.

If the key to American safety is the Panama Canal, then the keyhole is the Caribbean Sea. Most of us think of the United States as having two seacoasts, the Atlantic and the Pacific. We tend to forget the third, and southern, coast. The pretzel-shaped body of water formed by the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico is now considered to be the most likely focus of attack upon us. Consequently, this area is getting the concentrated attention of the builders of our defenses. The hitherto almost defenseless West Indies, taking as a whole the arc of islands stretching from Florida to Venezuela, might provide a maze of shelters for raiding submarines or easy stepping stones for invading aircraft.

Remember, it is only 1,620 miles across the Atlantic to South America, and 2,530 overseas-miles to the heart of the West Indies, with tail winds all the way. By that route the core of continental United States and the Mississippi Valley is bared. The Navy is plugging this gap, not with ships particularly but with air and submarine bases, of which Puerto Rico is the most important.

As at the Panama Canal, the Puerto Rico defenses are a synchronization of the Army and Navy, with emphasis on aviation. The importance of the work there is made graphic by President Roosevelt's appointment of Admiral Leahy to be Governor of the Territory immediately upon his retirement as Chief of Naval Operations. Principally the Army's interest will be in a sizable force of long-range bombing planes to destroy any hostile concentrations in the islands or the mainland south.

The Navy will maintain a diversified aviation force and submarine fleet, for both of which Isla Grande, in San Juan Harbor, is being taken over by the Department. When completed, there will be facilities for one airplane carrier and auxiliary vessels and for two patrol-plane squadrons, each capable of being doubled immediately. Berthing for the carriers and a strategic number of submarines is being provided by extensive filling in and construction of a breakwater at the harbor entrance. Of course, large provision must be made on shore for fuel and ammunition stores, machine shops, hospitals, living quarters, and the like.

At St. Thomas, V. I., a step to the eastward, the existing limited aviation facilities are being expanded and modernized to accommodate a full marine squadron of 18 airplanes, a tender vessel, and personnel.

Consider that up to now the territory was bare of defenses. In fact, the West Indies and the southeast coast of the United States had only the naval base at Guantanamo Bay, leased from Cuba, as its protection.

Now the American West Indies will become to the United States all that Gibraltar has been to Great Britain.

Guantanamo Bay's most important use is for fleet operations. It is here that our larger fighting ships may concentrate in the event of a threat against the Atlantic side. Whether in war or at maneuvers, the concentration of ships makes large-scale operation of seaplanes difficult and usually dangerous. We are constructing a landing field for small airplanes to serve as an intermediate station between the outer bases at Puerto Rico and St. Thomas and the mainland, to which we now turn our attention.

At Key West, on Florida's tip, is a naval station, now closed, but which is to be rehabilitated for instant use when needed, as a base for submarines particularly. Florida is witnessing a great deal of onshore naval activity. The aviation training station at Pensacola will eventually be expanded to increase its capacity by half, and we propose sometime to duplicate that establishment on the opposite side of the Gulf at Corpus Christi, Tex.

Meanwhile we are going ahead to build at Jacksonville, Fla., a naval aviation base even stronger than the one in Puerto Rico. It will be the home of two carrier groups and three patrol squadrons, yet roomy enough to accommodate twice as many ships and airplanes in an emergency. Two utility squadrons of naval aircraft will also be based at Jacksonville, besides the necessary shops for overhaul and repair and other buildings.

Jumping now to the Pacific side of our defense problem, we find that while Nature was not so kind as to provide a screen of islands for our vulnerable spots, she did give us the protection of the widest stretch of waters on the globe. Coco Solo, in the Canal Zone, is the base for approximately 100 naval airplanes, which are computed as an integral part of the fleet defending this vital artery. At Balboa, on the Pacific side of the Isthmus, is a potential submarine base; but the recently established naval station there is principally an administrative set-up, a branch office of the Navy Department, let us say.

From the Canal Zone to San Diego, in southern California, is the longest break in our chain-mail belt of defenses. Between these points lie Mexico and the five northern republics of Central America.

But from the Mexican border to the tip of Alaska our overlapping zones of defenses are, or shortly will be, without a chink, while the outposts of the Hawaiian Islands make that territory the equivalent of an unsinkable fleet a third of the distance across the Pacific.

Very often the demand is voiced in Congress or from the public, that the United States acquire, by purchase or as debt retirement, strategic territory such as the British or French West Indies or the islands in the Pacific owned by Mexico, Costa Rica, and Ecuador. That, of course, is none of the Navy's business. I mention it because I anticipate the reader's question. The Navy's job is to do the best it can with what is available. Territorial expansion is something for Congress, the State Department, and the President to consider, and to attempt to negotiate if deemed wise.

Without expressing an opinion on the subject, I can say that when the present program of defensive bases is completed, and the ships, the airplanes, the men and matériel are available, the United States and its neighborhood will breathe easier and will have done a good job of canceling any threat from any quarter.

For that security we are indebted to the foresight of President Roosevelt and the devotion of the late Secretary of the Navy, Claude A. Swanson, who stuck to his job through its most critical period despite a desperate and eventually fatal illness, like a sorely wounded captain refusing to leave the deck of his ship.

Our new ships and bases, as the Navy's estimate goes, are the best guaranties of our peace and security in a troubled world. It is the Navy's hope that they will never be engaged in hostile action—the Navy's conviction that, if war is forced upon us, we are now equipped for victory at the least cost of wealth, life, and time.

Keep America Out of Foreign Wars

OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1939

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech delivered by me over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network, on Saturday evening, September 23, 1939:

I have to ask the radio audience for their indulgence this evening, owing to a bad cold.

I have just returned from a 6-week trip to Europe, where I visited 12 countries, and 3 more if you count Wales, Austria, and Danzig. This is the first of a series of speeches on keeping out of war. I will speak again next Tuesday, and discuss more in detail the neutrality bill and proposed amendments.

The President has called the Congress into special session in an attempt to scrap the arms embargo and to substitute either a cash-and-carry system or to return to the principles of international law, under which we went to war in 1917 and would again if we adhered to such a policy.

The President made an appeal for national unity and a nonpartisan attitude toward foreign policies. I am quite sure that the Republican Party will be glad to join with the President for national unity on any program to keep the United States out of war. That is the single greatest issue before the American people. It transcends all party lines and affiliations and must not be confused or sidetracked over academic disputes and debates involving the advantages and disadvantages of various types of cash-and-carry, arms embargoes, or return to international law.

The paramount issue before the country is to prevent America from being eased into war by the internationalists in our midst and the propagandists from abroad. I warn the American people that no stone will be left unturned by these internationalists, interventionists, and war mongers to build up public sentiment in order to drag us into European wars.

The campaign is already on in full fury. Every leader for strict neutrality and keeping out of war will be denounced by such smear artists and purveyors of hate as Dorothy Thompson, Jay Franklin, and a host of others of the same ilk. Every spokesman for peace, such as Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, will have his motives defiled and his name dragged into the mud if he dares to publicly proclaim his views in favor of strict neutrality and peace.

This campaign of hysteria, emotionalism, hatred, untruth, and poisonous propaganda has only just started, and it has for its sole purpose sending American youth to the battlefields of Europe. The campaign is financed by almost unlimited funds from abroad, as it was in the last war, and men and women of every walk of life will be on its pay roll. Every avenue of news and propaganda will be put to work to influence American public opinion to enter the European war.

I do not believe that this inspired and vicious propaganda will succeed in fooling the American people again, as they have been burned once. As Lincoln said, you can fool some of the people some of the time but you cannot fool all the people all of the time.

But it must be remembered that those in back of this campaign for war will stop at nothing to attain their ends, and they believe that they will succeed within 6 months. I warn the American people that they must discount the ridicule, abuse, and vilification of the motives and acts of every spokesman for peace in America. Half truths and plain ordinary lies will be the order of the day for these propagandists, paid and otherwise.

Only a few days ago I was ridiculed and denounced by those well-known smearers, Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, in their syndicated column, The Washington Merry-Go-Round, under date of September 21, for having proposed a 30-day armistice on war at the Oslo Conference. Messrs. Pearson and Allen stated that I had been taken to task by my colleague, DANIEL A. REED, of New York, which is an utterly false statement and typical of the propaganda that one may expect from now on. DAN REED supported and spoke for my resolution for a 30-day armistice on war and left a proxy with me to vote for it.

I consider it the soundest and most important proposal I have ever made during my 20 years in public life; and if the British had not objected, it would have been adopted overwhelmingly as written, instead of in diluted form. It might have postponed the war and opened the way for peaceful settlement of the disputes between England, France, Germany, and Italy, and saved Poland from being crucified by invasion and war.

The president of the French delegation made a speech before the council and said his delegation would support it in its original form if it came up for a vote, but I replied that I would not press it if the British were against it, as it would be a futile gesture.

The following is a quotation from my speech before the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Oslo, Norway, on August 17, which I admit I am more proud of than any speech I ever made:

"I regret deeply to state that I believe that a European war is more imminent today than at any time since last September. If the Danzig and Polish agitation continues, the slightest spark may start a world conflagration.

"As one who served in the World War, and for the most of the time in the Fourth French Army, under General Gouraud, I hate and loathe war and do not offer any apologies for raising my voice in behalf of peace. I refuse to admit that the door of peace is closed or to yield to the defeatist talk that apparently covers Europe.

"A 30-day armistice or moratorium on war is of vital importance, if the people of Europe are to be spared the most disastrous scourge in the last 100 years. If this conference can contribute its part in a democratic manner to the preservation of world peace, it will deserve the grateful thanks and prayers of millions of peace-loving and Christian people throughout all of Europe.

"Modern warfare is a crime against humanity and civilization. The human loss is monstrous. No nation wins; even the victor loses and comes out a bankrupt and disorganized country, the prey to communism and anarchy.

"I ask this Conference to rise above the deadlock in which Europe is engulfed into the daylight of peace and humanity. Hatred and revenge must be subordinated to the nobler principles of arbitration and peace."

I am inserting the entire speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and will be glad to send copies, free of charge, to any of the radio audience, as well as a copy of my radio remarks this evening, on receipt of a request addressed to me, HAMILTON FISH, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I am an isolationist from war, but not an isolationist from arbitration, mediation, and peaceful methods of settling international disputes.

While I was in Europe I was bitterly attacked editorially by the New York World-Telegram, of the Scripps-Howard syndicate, as an alarmist and scaremonger for predicting that war would break out soon after August 20 and for urging a 30-day armistice on war. The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof, but I have not noticed any editorial apology by these international-minded newspapers now urging the repeal of the arms embargo.

I have referred to these personal attacks on me not because I care one bit about condemnation from such biased sources—which in this fight is the highest possible commendation—but I feel that I should make the record clear to those peace-loving Americans who cooperated with me through the National Committee to Keep America Out of Foreign Wars.

If I were alone concerned, I would not dignify these contemptible distortions of fact with any reply. However, as the issue is far greater than any individual, group, or party, I feel it is only fair to expose publicly such misrepresentations in the cause of peace and keeping America out of foreign wars.

The mail and telegrams from my district average more than 10 to 1 in favor of retaining the arms embargo, but for the first time in almost 20 years I have been receiving threatening letters from internationalist fanatics who want America to fight Europe's battles and to police the world with American blood and treasure.

I am convinced, however, that if we should be forced into war we would become a dictatorship immediately and might never regain the freedom and liberty that the American people have always enjoyed.

I have led the fight during the last 10 years against subversive and un-American activities, such as fascism, nazi-ism, and communism, in America and yield to no one in my devotion to our free institutions, republican form of government, and to American traditions and ideals.

I shall ask for no quarter nor give any in trying to keep America out of war, and I am confident that there will be millions and tens of millions of American citizens who will stand shoulder to shoulder with those of us in Congress who are working in the interest of peace and against war.

I am not concerned with my own political future in this crisis or with threats that I may be digging my political grave. I am, however, very much concerned in not doing anything to weaken the neutrality laws by permitting the sale of arms and ammunition for blood money and war profits and making the United States the potential slaughterhouse of the world. I am not interested in blood-smeared dollars that may drag us into war.

I am only concerned in not having American soldiers follow the traffic in arms to European battlefields, as they did in 1917. I shall never by my vote put America into war, unless we are attacked, and help dig the graves of our American youth in foreign lands.

I am at a loss to know what groups in America asked for a special session of Congress to repeal the arms embargo. The American Federation of Labor, the National Grange, the veterans' organizations, the church and peace-loving elements, and millions of American fathers and mothers who love peace and loath war believe that the repeal of the arms embargo is the first step toward war, to be followed by the sacrifice of their sons' lives in foreign lands.

If the American people are sufficiently aroused to their own responsibilities and make known their views to their elected representatives in Congress there will be no repeal and we will stay out of war.

I am convinced that any substantial change in our neutrality law in time of war is an unneutral act and so regarded in international law. It is like changing the rules after the kick-off in a football game.

I cannot get much excited over the argument that we are helping England and France by repealing the arms embargo, as neither nation needs our arms and ammunition, each having an abundant supply. It would not make any sense if they bought arms from us when they can supply themselves much cheaper.

It is my contention that the arms embargo does not affect the war economy of either England or France, because they have erected huge modern munitions factories in recent years.

There is a great deal of misunderstanding of the neutrality law. The fact is that under the existing law England and France can buy everything they want in America except arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Under the Vorys amendment to the Bloom bill, adopted by the House of Representatives 3 months ago, implements of war were omitted, thus enabling any belligerent nation to buy airplanes.

I would like to see the Bloom bill with the Vorys arms-embargo proposal amended to provide that American merchant ships enter the war zones at their own risk. If that were done there would be no need for the cash-and-carry plan.

I have not referred to President Roosevelt and have refrained from any partisan references. I appeal to all Americans to consider the proposed changes in the neutrality bill in a calm and dispassionate manner. I believe the existing neutrality law, which is by no means perfect, can be modified to the satisfaction of most of our people.

I believe in freedom of speech, and have no quarrel with those who may differ with my views on modification of the neutrality law. However, I appeal to all factions and elements of the people to be united in opposition to the insidious propaganda that war is inevitable and urge them to stand steadfast in helping to keep America out of war. There can be no compromise on this issue affecting the lives and liberties of our people.

Hitler Could Not Stop

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 25, 1939

ARTICLE BY HERMANN RAUSCHNING

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, the following article entitled "Hitler Could Not Stop," by Hermann Rauschning, appears in the October 1939 issue of the publication Foreign Affairs, an American quarterly review. It is vitally important that the Members of Congress and the people we represent learn everything possible that bears upon the affairs of the world today in order to exercise proper judgment in our future course of action and for this reason I have asked and obtained unanimous consent to insert this important article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Hermann Rauschning, as is learned from Time magazine of September 18, 1939, the son of a Prussian officer, was trained in a military school and is an East Prussian Junker who joined the Nazis in 1931 because he could see no other way out for Germany's desperation. He became President of the Danzig Senate, Hitler's go-between in his off-stage talks with Poland's late President Pilsudski. But when the Führer ordered Rauschning to persecute Danzig Jews and Catholics, he quit the Nazis and took refuge in Poland.

The article follows:

[From Foreign Affairs for October 1939]

HITLER COULD NOT STOP

(By Hermann Rauschning)

Some people believed that Hitler could be induced by certain limited concessions, made dependent on his fulfillment of certain specified conditions, to change his methods of procedure and limit his aims. Germany would then cease to figure as a troublemaker in the world and would fit into a new international equilibrium. The view was based on a number of sound assumptions and was justified by the example of the movement for German unification between 1864 and 1870. Bismarck often expressed the idea. He said that once the unified Reich had been constituted one of his main concerns would be to create general confidence in its pacific intentions. After rectifying the injuria temporum (the Bismarckian phrase), German policy would set itself the task of becoming a force for peace in Europe. Bismarck's national policy was based exclusively on force and was eminently practical. But its objectives were always limited. At the given moment it saw the necessity of fixing its own limits, and never overstepped them.

Sharply in contrast with Bismarck's art of the possible stands the hazy, impulsive policy of William II. At a critical moment during the latter's reign, the Morocco crisis of 1905, Sir Arthur Nicolson remarked that the German foreign office did not itself know what it wanted; and he went on to say that the real danger in German policy was not so much its expansionist outlook as its vagueness. That was entirely true. It was impossible to work out a policy of harmonious collaboration with a person who did not know what he wanted. William II based his foreign policy on surprises and sudden impulses; and that fact, much more than Germany's striving for world power, led directly to the World War.

Hitler's policy at first differed strikingly from the policy of William II. It differed also from the policy of the Weimar Republic, which was also—though for different reasons, chiefly the Republic's inherent weakness—wavering and uncertain. Hitler's policy was outspoken and showed that it was clearly conscious of its goals. Frankly nationalistic, setting out to revise the Versailles Treaty and rectify an obvious injuria temporum, it moved along lines noticeably similar to Bismarck's. It began, then, as the continuation of a policy which, in the previous century, after achieving its aims, resulted in over 40 years of peace for Europe.

In the beginning, Hitler's policy was strictly and exclusively national. Its one aim seemed to be to transform the little Germany that Bismarck had founded into the greater Germany that still lived in the thoughts of all German patriots. This was to be achieved by revision of the territorial provisions in the peace treaty, which in the long run would have proved unendurable anyway. Germany possessed many friends among her sometime war opponents. These would probably have approved of such a reasonable policy if certain revolutionary features attending its application, along with its terroristic methods, had not chilled good will abroad and intensified foreign hesitations. Even so, however, one still could argue that the extravagant features of the new German policy were superficial and would automatically correct themselves in due course.

Objectively, however, the policy of the Third Reich could be considered constructive only so long as it had a definite and limited scope. In other words, only if National Socialist foreign policy aimed specifically at uniting actually German territories in an enlarged German state could it expect that other states would tolerate the gradual reorganization of Europe under German leadership.

During the early years of the National Socialist regime, therefore, foreign criticism took the form mainly of moralistic disapproval of certain of its domestic methods. There was little disapproval of its aims as such. Indeed, some authoritative interpreters abroad exerted themselves to put even the domestic procedures of national socialism in a better light, thereby strengthening a natural inclination on the part of many persons to ignore certain repulsive revolutionary aspects of the movement as being strictly the private concern of the German people, explicable probably on the basis of the delight which they habitually take in discipline and "order." The austere forms which the German national regimentation adopted were calculated in many ways to beguile foreign criticism. The advantages of authoritarian methods became apparent in the ease with which Germany overcame many surface symptoms of her social and economic crisis. The country seemed to be on the road to order and recovery; hence (it was assumed), once a transitional period of unrest had passed, on the road to peace.

The domestic opponents of national socialism among the former ruling classes of Germany reached a similar view. During a first short period they grossly underestimated the strength of the new regime. There followed a second short period when the dominant feeling was one of shock and resentment at its brutal methods. Then finally the educated and patriotic middle classes settled down in the persuasion that the various outrages of national socialism were ephemeral, revolutionary manifestations that must needs be borne with for the time being.

In non-Nazi circles in those days, among the army leaders, the bureaucracy, and in business, the word was passed to allow the revolutionary outburst to wear itself out. The movement, it was said, would clean itself up. The wise course was felt to be to enter the party so as gradually to reshape it from within. Many important holders of public office felt, of course, that it was impossible to reconcile the party's unscrupulous conduct with their individual consciences, and that it was their duty to resign. They were reminded that to do so would only strengthen the new movement and intensify its extremist character. They were told that rather it was their duty to hold their positions as long as possible, in order gradually to weed out the catastrophe makers, or, at the worst, to serve as brakes on the plunge into catastrophe. Reasoning of this sort had a certain semblance of soundness, and it appealed, among others, to men such as Baron von Neurath, in foreign affairs; to Count Schwerin-Krosigk, in finance; and to Eltz Rübenach, in commerce. They decided not to break with national socialism but to work with it, to retard and moderate it, and to prevent another lapse into bloody revolution.

These motives were intelligible enough, but they were none the less mistaken. The National Socialist movement could not be reformed. It was obeying an inner iron-bound law of its own being. It was following the relentless urge toward extremism to which every revolutionary movement is destined. The collaboration of conservative and competent officials and men of affairs strengthened the regime; but they could not change it. They wore themselves out, and the movement went on regardless. An adjustment of the nature of a civil war was avoided; but in the end the price was the total capitulation of the restorative elements in the ruling and educated classes and of the liberal and democratic elements in business and labor.

The question now arises whether, in following the sometimes temporizing and sometimes frankly pro-Nazi policy, the western democracies did not make the same mistake in the foreign field which inside the Reich led to the capitulation and enslavement of the German citizenry as a whole. The policy of domestic collaboration avoided civil war within Germany; the conduct of the democracies in compromising with Germany aimed to avoid a European war. To be sure, there would be solid grounds for reasoning the other way round—that the disposition of the democracies to yield, without setting any clearly discernible limits on what they would yield, was what first made war a real danger. However that may be, there can be no doubt that pressure upon Germany from abroad might very well have led to the fall of the National Socialist regime. But would that have led to any lasting adjustment for Europe as a whole? Perhaps the overthrow of national socialism would have set a genuinely revolutionary development in motion. A period of anarchy might then have ensued. Or a strictly Prussian and militaristic solution might have been found, compared with which even the National Socialist regime might have seemed the lesser evil.

How such a gross misreading of national socialism could have held sway for so long in the world is hard indeed to comprehend. The lack of critical sense and foresight shown by German business leaders doubtless contributed. They merely noticed with satisfaction the temporary relief brought them through currency control and the new methods of dealing with labor problems, and they paid no attention to the disturbing revolutionary disintegration of all the elements composing what is called public order. They were simply obsessed by the idea that national socialism's energetic methods offered the chance of at least temporarily escaping from the general world depression.

There was another reason in addition to the apparent cessation of the depression in Germany which contributed substantially to the foreign inclination to view the course of events there with a certain amount of optimism. German unemployment was closely interrelated with a number of problems which, generally speaking, could be solved only by the cooperation of all countries; but above all it was related to the problem of raw materials. Now Germany's difficulty in securing raw materials would probably not have arisen under conditions of peaceful international commerce. But international commerce had been upset by the depression. It seemed only natural, therefore, to seek economic remedies for the critical situation in Germany which was driving her to adopt a policy of political expansion. If certain territories were handed over to Germany to be exploited, and if her need for raw materials were met, would not her menacing revolutionary trend be eliminated or diverted? An economically satisfied Germany, it was argued, would dissipate its explosive energies in peaceful labor.

Plausible as these considerations are, they fail to explain why, in spite of progressive surrenders to national socialist demands from year to year and in one area after another, the desired peaceful results were not achieved, but, on the contrary, German demands constantly grew.

The fact is, of course, that the whole form of reasoning outlined above rested on false assumptions. It grossly exaggerated the importance of economic considerations in the German situation and overlooked its irrational or nonrational motivations. Many observers were led astray by the patriotic impulses which the national socialist movement satisfied and failed to notice its disintegrating revolutionary tendencies. What especially was overlooked was the movement's antimoral background, which was what gave it its peculiar destructive power.

It is important to realize that Germany adopted the goal of economic autarchy not for economic or social reasons but for reasons having to do with national power, or, more exactly, national defense. We find the germ of this policy as far back as the time of Bismarck, whose economic protectionism was closely related to military policy. Then came Germany's decisive experience during the World War. Germany's geographical situation always puts her in danger of being cut off from world markets, and this fact, given her inadequate raw-material resources, forces her to plan either to enlarge those resources by technical devices or to obtain a supply of them through territorial expansion.

The dilemma is plain. But the full effect of it in National Socialist thought has by no means been realized abroad. The Nazi thesis runs as follows:

Numerically the German Nation is, next to Russia, the largest in Europe. But her inadequate territory bars her from full sovereignty as a world people. In peaceful times Germany, of course, could easily cover her raw-material requirements. But in time of war her dependence on the world market makes her fatally weak. With the enormous development that has taken place in technical instruments of warfare, she no longer can prosecute a war on several fronts with any prospect of success. Her ability to employ her great technical and military capacities breaks down on the single circumstance that she is dependent economically on foreign nations. Attainment of her full status as a world people seems thus to be denied to Germany for all time, and she is condemned to play second fiddle to a numerically smaller nation like Great Britain and even to France, who has a colonial empire and free access to the open sea.

The distinctive trait of a world people, continues the Nazi argument, is its complete freedom of political action. The United States has this freedom. So have the British Empire, Russia, and (though to a somewhat lesser extent) France. If Germany wants to keep company with those powers and not rest satisfied in a secondary position, she has to adjust herself in terms of power to the present-day significance of economic space. To describe her resulting effort as part of a contest between "haves" and "have nots," between wealthy nations and proletarian nations, is to misrepresent it. That formulation of the situation is merely a psychological weapon in the war of opinion. The fact is that the largest and technically most advanced nation in Europe has been kept from playing more than a secondary role in the world. For Germany to accept the situation would have required either stern resignation or a resolve to seek a solution otherwise than through the assertion of power. Germany has felt herself too young and virile a nation to accept the former course; as for the latter, the World War left her without the requisite atmosphere of friendly collaboration.

Economic autarchy is an artificial instrument which must be used temporarily in the diplomatic and economic fields in order to achieve natural independence. It is not a permanent solution, the Nazis grant, and has never been thought of as such. It runs against the nature of things and is therefore foredoomed to failure. But for the time being it has afforded Germany the brief period of independence required for her to obtain, by diplomatic or military means as the case may be, her real goal—full sovereignty as a world people.

"Lebensraum," the space required by a nation for living, is not, in Nazi terminology, the mere space sufficient for subsistence under a system of free exchange of goods. It means a domain sufficiently comprehensive to provide Germany with absolute freedom of action. The limits of that domain expands automatically as the requirements of modern warfare expand. What would have been adequate in the year 1880 to make Germany self-sufficient and sovereign had become wholly inadequate by the end of the World War. To become truly sovereign under postwar conditions Germany must now expand the domain under her control eastward as far as the Caucasus and including the Ukraine, and westward as far as the open sea. She must have the oil of the Caucasus, the minerals of the Ukraine, and the grain of Hungary and Rumania; also she must have the steel of northern France, control of the shore line of Belgium, Holland, and northern France, and the colonial domains at present belonging to those countries. In this policy the law of the minimum controls; for the soundness of the policy varies with that factor, not with the maximum.

Such are the ideas of national socialism. The fundamental thing which emerges is the impossibility that olive branches and concessions in this or that particular could ever serve any purpose. Either it is full sovereignty for Germany or it is nothing.

Hitler's foreign policy, therefore, allowed him no freedom of choice. His particular aims all stood in a fixed and necessary relation to his comprehensive aim, full sovereignty for Germany as a world people. Germany will be satisfied only when she controls a completely self-sufficient territory. In the perspective of that policy, all projects for a return to a purely economic organization of the world necessarily remained uninteresting. The dependence of parts of the world on the whole, and the interdependence of all the parts, are the very things which must be rectified, abolished, and this not on doctrinaire grounds but because of the plain requirements of practical politics. Thus there were but two alternatives: Germany's complete surrender, her renunciation of all hope of becoming a world people; or an uncompromising struggle to attain the complete goal. The goal can be attained only by German control over all Europe. Only when European hegemony has been won can national socialism accept a system of international exchange of commodities as not any longer disturbing to German sovereignty. In view of this, the effort to make National Socialist imperialism believe that it would do well to go back to a system of free international exchange, and to explain to National Socialist chieftains that other countries are only too anxious to help them satisfy Germany's economic needs, were perfectly fatuous.

Other facts fortified the National Socialist determination never to abandon their full aims in the foreign field. Of great importance, for instance, was the National Socialist conviction that Germany's eagerness for world dominion corresponded to a real change in the power relationships of the nations. In this view, German foreign policy merely recognized an actual state of fact hitherto obscured by the antiquated manner in which the world's territory was distributed. In Nazi eyes England is a paper power, whose strategic position is in full disintegration. France is a dying nation, biologically unable any longer to play the part of a world power, much less a world people. The United States is no longer a young nation. It is, moreover, a hodgepodge of peoples and so can never attain a stable political form. It is not ambitious—hence, by a definition, not a world people. The proper sort of touch from the outside at the right moment would send it reeling into revolution.

The complacency of National Socialists who thus interpreted the realities of the world scene was not very much upset by the changes of the last half year. Reorganization in France and rearmament in Great Britain were regarded as mere show, specious bustle. The National Socialists considered that the democracies lacked one thing which is basic and essential—namely, the unshakable resolve to assert themselves in terms of power.

Hitler himself has commented on the sort of aggressive foreign policy described above. His opinion of the results of making concessions in diplomacy is particularly important. In a characteristic passage in "Mein Kampf" he writes:

"The shrewd victor will, when possible, present his demands to the conquered piecemeal. He can be sure that a people without character—and such will be any people that voluntarily submits—will see no sufficient reason for again going to war over any one of his separate encroachments. The more extortions of this kind are docilely accepted the more unjustified will it seem to people finally to go to war over a new act of oppression, ostensibly isolated, but really recurring; especially since they all in all have already put up with so much more and greater abuses in patient silence."

We come now to the central question as to the real nature of national socialism. Is it actually a national movement? Here we shall do well to consider not so much its political theories as its tactics. In his tactics, Hitler carries over into the general field of politics, and especially into the fields of foreign policy and military strategy, certain modern doctrines of the coup d'état and of civil war. His policy is one of permanent conspiracy. It is warfare by psychological pressure in accordance with methods of conspiracy and revolutionary disintegration. His policy is one of world revolution. But world revolution is not conceived of as the ultimate goal (as Lenin conceived it), but as a permanent activity aiming at the progressive decomposition of all elements of order. Hitler has absorbed and set logically in his mind the theories of the coup d'état developed by Trotzky and Malaparte. From them he derived the characteristic resort of his policy, the crippling of the will of his antagonist by bewildering it and splitting it. Combining threats and promises, his strategy aims to procure the voluntary submission of his opponent. He hopes to make the surrender easier by parceling out his demands and encroachments in small doses, so that no one of them will seem important enough by itself to fight over rather than to compromise. Hitler maneuvers his antagonist into the position held by the old regime in the typical revolution. He thinks the western democracies in the great world revolution now in full course are in the position of the old regimes and former elites which have capitulated and abdicated in the lesser revolutions of the past.

Actual experience convinced Hitler of the soundness of his judgment and of the practicability of his revolutionary system. And from that experience he drew the conclusion that his personal significance in history lies in his having perceived how hollow was the strength of the old states and that his personal mission was to liquidate them from their antiquated positions in the hierarchy of power. His confidence naturally was in no wise shaken by the fact that the risks which he supposedly had been running in his many foolhardy adventures proved in the result to have been no real risks at all. The seemingly impossible turned out unfailingly to be quite feasible. The old regimes, with all their enormously superior resources, time and again capitulated before the revolutionary squads of National Socialist Germany.

From this standpoint could concessions and offers of peace from an antagonist seem anything but symptoms of his readiness to capitulate? No; they merely sharpened the eagerness for attack. A mistaken psychology on the part of the powers of western Europe proved to be what brought on the very war which they had tried to prevent by being reasonable and conciliatory. In essence the war was being fought all along. It was stupid, then, to try to prevent its breaking out. The proper program would have been to try to put an end to it without a ruinous shedding of blood. This could have been done only by compelling Hitler to abandon his methods of conspiracy, and the only effective means to that end would have been prompt, continuous, and unequivocal assertions of principle backed by evidence of an unflinching determination and ability to maintain the position taken.

But the diplomatic situation was far from requiring Hitler to do anything of that sort. Rather, it supplied him with more and more opportunities for his psychological victories. To grasp the real significance of this fact it must be realized that, according to Hitler's doctrine of strategy, war in the old-fashioned military sense is secondary. In his conception of war, the bloody military action in the field has merely the function that pursuit after a victory has in ordinary military strategy. The really decisive action is supposed to take place before the outbreak of war. It consists in a demoralization of the enemy. In his plan the resort to weapons merely completes, by a last extreme act of force, the defeat which has already been determined by the methods of diplomatic conspiracy.

In recent months Hitler found himself fighting the early and what he imagined would be the decisive phases of a war. Strategic retreats now and then seemed necessary. But the first stages, to his way of thinking, offered very bright prospects. Why should he, then, bring the war to a halt? He was convinced that the total mobilization of the German people could be indefinitely endured, for National Socialist discipline had deliberately trained them to withstand hardships; whereas the democracies would find a state of continuous mobilization for war utterly foreign and inevitably provocative of fatal social unrest. So, too, the liberal economic system, in spite of its incomparably stronger position in actual wealth, would collapse sooner than the planned war economy of national socialism, despite its far smaller economic reserves. True, the western powers were making rapid progress in rearmament; but time, in Hitler's view, was nonetheless working in the long run for national socialism.

How then, with Hitler viewing things in this way, could he have been induced to abandon his political objectives and voluntarily fall in with a new and far-reaching world adjustment on a basis of international collaboration and peace? One thing was certain. He would never be brought to do so by concessions. Hitler began with motives of patriotism. But whether forced by the inner logic of his policies, or perhaps guided from the start by his doctrine of the psychological war, he went on and on, until he had become the leader of a world revolution at the end of which loomed a new partitioning of the earth.

This idea of a new division, an offspring of Marxian ideas, but with the class war within nations worked over into a class war among nations, was most attractive to the dynamic Powers since it allowed them to extend their fronts in their psychological war more and more widely, until finally the moment arrived to assert their leadership and control over the whole earth.

One last consideration, national socialism was also compelled to go forward by conditions at home. Its one chance of keeping in power in Germany was to continue the revolutionary movement and to intensify it. It could not give up any of its instruments of control. It could not dismantle the economic structure which was one of its main sources of power. It could not go back to freer social and legal forms of organization without surrendering all along the line. It might for a time agree to limit its armaments, for what it needed, it had decided, was psychological superiority no less than military preponderance. In any case, though, there were specific things which clearly it could not do: It could not establish a state of law. It could not grant a constitution universally applicable to all individuals and classes. It could not relax its terroristic rule.

Under these conditions, any real political or economic cooperation with other countries was unthinkable, i. e., there was no possibility of a return to normal commercial intercourse, a normal credit policy, or a free exchange. While all the elements of a system of law and even the barest outlines of a system of public audit were completely lacking, could anyone seriously imagine that new billions of credit would ever be made available for Germany?

Any regime that has limited aims can compromise, can dispense with the complete attainment of every one of its objectives. Not so national socialism. Compromise, for national socialism, is death. The alternatives facing it were and are total success or total capitulation. One or the other. Any retreat abroad would at once create difficulties at home that would lead to the regime's collapse. From it, then, one could and can expect nothing but an unwavering advance along the road on which it set out—the road to hegemony over Europe and to world revolution.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK SUN

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Sun of September 4, 1939:

[From the New York Sun of September 4, 1939]

HE IS AN AMERICAN

He is an American.

He hears an airplane overhead, and if he looks up at all does so in curiosity, neither in fear nor in the hope of seeing a projector.

His wife goes marketing, and her purchases are limited by her needs, her tastes, her budget, but not by decree.

He comes home of an evening through streets which are well lighted, not dimly in blue.

He reads his newspaper and knows that what it says is not concocted by a bureau, but an honest, untrammeled effort to present the truth.

He has never had a gas mask on.

He has never been in a bombproof shelter.

His military training, an R. O. T. C. course in college, he took because it excused him from the gym course, and it was not compulsory.

He belongs to such fraternal organizations and clubs as he wishes.

He adheres to a political party to the extent that he desires—the dominant one, if that be his choice, but with the distinct reservation that he may criticize any of its policies with all the vigor which to him seems proper—any other, as his convictions dictate, even, if it be his decision, one which holds that the theory of government of the country is wrong and should be scrapped.

He does not believe, if his party is out of power, that the only way in which it can come into power is through a bloody revolution.

He converses with friends, even with chance acquaintances, expressing freely his opinion on any subject, without fear.

He does not expect his mail to be opened between posting and receipt, nor his telephone to be tapped.

He changes his place of dwelling, and does not report so doing to the police.

He has not registered with the police.

He carries an identification card only in case he should be the victim of a traffic accident.

He thinks of his neighbors across international borders; of those to the north as though they were across a State line, rather than as foreigners; of those to the south more as strangers, since they speak a language different from his, and with the knowledge that there are now matters of difference between his Government and theirs, but of neither with an expectancy of war.

He worships God in the fashion of his choice, without let.

His children are with him in his home, neither removed to a place of greater safety, if young, nor, if older, ordered ready to serve the state with sacrifice of limb or life.

He has his problems, his troubles, his uncertainties, but all others are not overshadowed by the imminence of battle and sudden death.

He should struggle to preserve his Americanism with its priceless privileges.

He is a fortunate man.

He is an American.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 25, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRED BRADLEY, OF MICHIGAN, SEPTEMBER 8, 1939

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Harold L. Young Post of the American Legion at Rogers City, Mich., on September 8, 1939:

Mr. Chairman and my friends and neighbors of Rogers City, I am very pleased indeed to have this opportunity to meet with you here this evening to discuss with you the most important subject nearest to our minds and dearest to our hearts in this Nation today—Americanism.

It is most important that in these hours of conflict abroad, the ultimate magnitude of which none can at present determine—I repeat, it is of the utmost importance that we in America soberly, impassionately, with freedom from prejudice, and in a spirit of tolerance toward all peoples, all races, all creeds, take stock of ourselves. It is time that we soberly consider the international bedlam, that we carefully weigh in our minds some of the probable problems of the future, and that we realize the possible consequences of events that lie ahead of us in the future, and we carefully review and counsel with ourselves over many of the unfortunate events of the past.

I am one of those who sincerely believed that the heads of the various European nations would be able to settle their difficulties without international conflict. But that conflict has come. From all indications it will be a long, bloody, horrible catastrophe. The question of whether or not the United States will become involved in this unfortunate conflict in the near future, or any time in the future, is as vital to you as it is to any group of our people. If we should go to war, many of you will be required to fight and perhaps die for America.

I say that I want you all to live for America, and we all must keep that thought uppermost in our minds. It is your right to demand of your officials in Washington that you shall not be required to spill your blood unnecessarily in a false cause or in a foreign conflict. It is your right to demand that America preserve that peace which is dearer to her than all else, save liberty itself.

So far as I am concerned America shall remain at peace, and remain absolutely neutral and friendly to all powers on the face of the earth.

Why is it that through the years America has been a symbol of hope to which the peoples of all the world have come with renewed courage and faith in the future? What was it they sought in the New World that they had never found in the Old? Freedom and opportunity? Yes. But they sought more—a refuge, a haven of peace. They fled from war-torn Europe to a land where men might live in peace with one another, that together they might build a better world. They fought wars whenever necessary to defend their ideals; but they built a great Nation, not because of the wars they had fought, but in spite of them. They were able to advance because of the years of peace which they enjoyed. Without peace there can be no liberty. Without peace there can be no progress.

For over a century and a half every war in Europe and Asia—and they have been almost constant—has brought a flood of refugees to American shores. We have always welcomed those refugees. We always shall welcome them, providing that when they come to these shores they have a very definite determination, and maintain that determination, to live according to American ideals and under the American form of government. When any of these refugees have in their hearts or in their minds a preference for European ideals and traditions, let them go back to Europe and never return to these shores; and I say to you that those in America today who are resorting to what we call un-American activities or subversive influences—I say to all those—let the American people give them warning here and now that it is time for them to return to their Europe, to return to their foreign ideals and idealisms, the opportunity is here for them now to shed their blood in an outward manner if they so choose, but they must and shall refrain from further subversive activities in this country.

Now let me stress just a bit of tolerance on the part of all of us. Let us be most tolerant of the thoughts and words and actions of all of us in these trying days ahead. Remember we were all aliens in this land at some time in our past family history. That makes us none the less loyal Americans, but it does cause many of us to have a natural sympathy, a leaning toward one side or another in all international conflicts. Millions more recently arrived in this land than others have left relatives or dear friends back in the homeland over the seas.

That makes them nonetheless loyal Americans, but on the other hand it is bound to cause them to have a natural sympathy for the fortunes of their homeland—for the fortunes and fates which might befall those loved ones left behind. It is but natural that at times this leads to outward partisan expressions of words, actions, and deeds. Let us be tolerant; let us all respect those sympathies; let not that tolerance cause any of us to do or say anything which might cause this Nation to be brought into a conflict with which we should have absolutely no national concern. That tolerance, that self-control, my friends, will be one of the hardest problems for us as individuals, for us as a nation.

I have mentioned Europe's constant distress so now let us consider some of Europe's history. The Napoleonic wars which followed the French Revolution kept Europe in a turmoil for half a generation. There were revolutions which shook most of the continent in 1830 and again in 1848. In 1853, England and France supported Turkey in the Crimean War against Russia. In 1870 began the Franco-Prussian War. In 1877, Russia and Turkey again were engaged in combat. In 1894 came the Chinese-Japanese war, and in 1897, a war between Turkey and Greece. In 1904 came the Russian-Japanese conflict and in 1912 occurred the Balkan War. This was soon followed by the outbreak of the World War in 1914. And, in addition, when not engaged in fighting one another, the great European powers waged wars of colonial conquest, subjugating the peoples of small, backward nations. There are two moving causes of all wars: Greed, the desire for power, the desire to secure that which someone else has; secondly, defense, the desire to hold what one has. The American people have no international desire predicated on greed. We desire only to maintain peaceful relations with the entire world. It has been quoted to me recently that Adolph Hitler made the statement some months ago that having built up his army to wartime strength, he now thought it might be time to bleed the army. The American Nation has no desire to bleed itself—nor anyone else.

Until a fateful day in 1917 America remained aloof from all these European wars. By refusing to become involved in the numerous struggles of Europe, she was able to hold up to the world the example of the blessings of peace and self-government. She was able to provide a refuge for those who fled from the fury of foreign conflicts.

Then, in 1917, what happened? We were persuaded that this war was to be different. Propaganda succeeded in deluding us into the idea that this was the war to end all wars. We were told that through it the world was to be made safe for democracy.

There were many issues, economic and military, but we got into the World War primarily because we worked ourselves into an emotional jag. We got drunk on what we thought was idealism. We went Holy Roller. We mistook shouting and singing for religion, and the result—disillusionment. We gave our own manhood, our wealth, our resources; yes, we went into the war inspired by idealism, but we soon discovered that our Allies had no such ideals. General Pershing himself writes of an interview with a leading statesman of a foreign nation. In effect, he said this to General Pershing: "We have the highest regard for the ideals of your President Wilson. The slogans, 'The war to end all wars' and 'The war to make the world safe for democracy' were fine slogans with which to entice your people into this war. But we of the Allies have no such ideals. We have very definite reasons for being in this conflict. We in England are concerned principally with one thing—the freedom of the seas (of course, under English domination), so that we may maintain our trade with our colonies. Those in France have another aim, and one solely, namely, to make it impossible for Germany to ever again attack France and overrun France as it had in 1870." They were, of course, glad to have American manpower and American resources in the struggle; but what happened at the end of that struggle? At the end we saw the causes of the next war written into the Treaty of Versailles. Since that day the break-down of representative government and the rise of dictatorships have followed in nation after nation.

It may be that some day men will learn that war can settle nothing; that war can only destroy. It may be that some day we will learn that the horrors of war are followed by desolation and despair which drive peoples to desperate remedies. What happened to the 14 points when they fell into the hands of the power politicians in Europe? What happened to the League of Nations? What happened to the story of the war debts and of Big-Hearted Otis turned into Uncle Shylock in the propaganda of those for whom we had gone to bat.

No; we did not save the world for democracy; we did not save democracy for the world. We just burned our fingers to the bone, poking into a fire of European intrigue which had been smoldering for centuries.

Now let's benefit from our experience. If we can't do that, then it's nobody's fault but our own.

As to where our sympathies run, that's clear. Insofar as we can help without becoming involved, that may be O. K. But let's judge every action by whether what we do is in the interests of the United States of America. Let us remember that the greatest service we as a nation can do is to keep our health and our poise against the time when we may be called upon to help bind up the wounds of a world now once more torn by war.

We in America are still paying the price of that last war. Not only is the money which we lent to foreign nations irrevocably lost, but we are still deep in the depression which followed, as, indeed, depressions have followed every war since the dawn of time. Discouraged and disillusioned, we seemed to have lost the undaunted faith in ourselves, in our ability to solve our own problems which beset us, and we seemed to have lost faith in the future—a faith which has always been the greatest strength of the American people.

Now, let us consider how are we going to keep ourselves out of this war. In the last session of Congress we did not change the Neutrality Act. Consequently, the President, following the Neutrality Act still in effect, has declared that a state of war exists abroad and under the terms of the act has issued an embargo on the shipment of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war to the belligerent nations. According to the terms of the neutrality law now in effect, that shipment of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war to neutral nations for reshipment to the belligerent is likewise prohibited. Naturally, we expect that Congress will be called in session in the near future. Congress must be called in session soon.

The immediate problem before Congress will, of course, be to deal with Neutrality Act changes; equally to be high-lighted will be defense measures for the United States.

Furthermore, in my opinion, not the least of the responsibility of Congress shall be to insure the majority of the American people from suffering caused by profiteering by a selfish minority. Already we have heard of rapidly mounting prices of food supplies and other essentials and we have heard over the radio and read in the press stories of an acute shortage in certain essential commodities. Bunk! Pure bunk!

Throughout these last 8 months we wrestled with the then all-important problems of surplus commodities; we appropriated two hundred and thirty millions for subsidies to the southern cotton grower, to the western wheat grower, to the tobacco planter, to the corn grower—yes; and we had letter on letter, demand upon demand, from the domestic sugar interests for curbs upon the importation of Cuban and other island sugars in order that they might be permitted to supply a greater proportion of the domestic demand. Now, don't tell me that all these surpluses disappeared overnight. Let no one tell me there is any just reason—save selfish greed on the part of a few—for any of these drastic increases in prices. Yes, my friends, indeed, the first and most important business of Congress must be to save the interests of all people in this Nation—of the vast majority of those who pay the bills. It must be our duty to insure them against the unjust profiteering of a self-seeking, selfish, penny-grabbing minority.

It is virtually certain that if war continues the Congress will sit "from now on"—that is, from the time it is called into special session until the end of this war is in sight. The President has pretty well decided to call the Congress, and he awaits only a clarification of issues to be laid before it. Moreover, you can expect a dozen of the top leaders from both parties to be called in right away for a pre-session conference. The President should have unified support in Congress and from the country, and hence will seek to lay the groundwork for that in an astute political and patriotic move.

Look for the Nation's economy to be more and more rapidly geared to war needs and to such domestic shifts as may become necessary with Europe in conflict. Many steps have been taken in this direction and others are in progress, but the whole program will be speeded by developments of the last few days. All pressure is being used to hasten the acquisition of strategic materials. Industrial-mobilization plans have been completed. Panama Canal defenses are being strengthened.

Spending of the $10,000,000 appropriated by Congress for war material purchases this year will be actually under way shortly. Specifications from the Treasury Procurement Division for the purchases are due in a few days and bids are to be requested shortly thereafter. Among the first materials to be purchased are: Manganese ore, chromium ore, tungsten ore, tin, quinine, quartz crystals, and manila fiber. Expansion of the list will be quickened by war developments.

Industry and agriculture here probably will be benefited greatly by war abroad—for the short pull. This is so despite the existing Neutrality Act which bars shipments of many commodities to belligerents in spite of the Johnson Act which bars credits and loans to governments in debt default to the United States.

Despite a strong bloc in Congress which will oppose Neutrality Act repeal on the grounds that it would lead us into war, the odds are overwhelmingly for some change in the law to permit commodity sales abroad. Your Congressman will oppose repeal. Pressure by the administration plus that exerted by farmers visioning higher prices and big demand for their products, manufacturers who will be bombarded with orders, and even from labor which would welcome the reduction in unemployment, will be so strong that Congress can hardly resist.

Significant, too, that top administration figures have already conferred on advisability of repeal of the Johnson Act. They agree that popular sentiment would be stronger against this than against neutrality repeal but latest thinking is that by proper interpretations of the Johnson Act all necessary steps can be taken to facilitate credit for foreign purchases.

Conferences the past week between the President and Jesse Jones, of the Federal Lending Agency, were on this subject; note that Jones said that R. F. C. and export-import banks are not covered by the Johnson Act. This simply means that these agencies can extend credits for foreign purchases here.

As pointed out in Washington last week, by the very nature of things trade with South American countries will grow during a European conflict. President Pierson, of the Export-Import Bank, has already cultivated trade relations there and in China, and has recently been in Europe. Not only will South America turn to the United States for commodities (especially manufactured articles) now obtained from Britain, France, Germany, and Italy but American manufacturers will now direct their trade efforts southward. Don't overlook the possibility of funds from European belligerents which will flow into South America for essential food and war commodities coming to the United States for purchases in turn by South America. This may be particularly true of aircraft.

Nothing in view this week indicates any necessity or possibility that the S. E. C. will close American stock markets. Despite wild gyrations of stock prices and the eventual unloading of vast amounts of foreign-owned American securities in behalf of European governments to provide cash and credit for purchases here, the machinery to do this has been so perfected that no undue strain is anticipated.

Among preparations for a full-fledged defense basis is the creation of a general advisory committee on banking as announced by George L. Harrison, of the New York Federal Reserve Bank. Representatives of banks, the stock exchange, and insurance companies are to comprise the committee. Among problems likely to come before it is that of liquidating securities of foreign nationals in this country.

Shipping will be broadly affected by war developments. Both merchant marine and naval shipbuilding will be accelerated, a survey of facilities already having been made so that full use of all yards can be made. Shifts in production schedules would include construction of vessels especially needed to provide well-rounded fleets. In case of actual war, older shipyards would be used for navy vessels while new and small yards would be devoted to tankers and cargo ships. The Maritime Commission's current shipbuilding program involves more than 80 vessels and a total cost in excess of $190,000,000.

Holding up of the Bremen's departure, along with that of the Normandie and two British ships, is indicative of care to be taken from now on. As a matter of fact, the Customs Service has been instructed to examine carefully all ships in foreign trade before they issue clearance papers. They are watching for unmanifested cargoes, ships stores, and possible armaments.

But now to return to the subject of our keeping out of this war—let me say this:

If the head of the Government and the Congress are determined to keep us out of war, they can do so and there is not the slightest doubt about it. If we get into this war, it will be because either the President or the Congress has weakened in the will to keep us out.

Consider this, the most hideous, most enticing of all games in this world is international relations. Playing the game upon that vast and troublesome chess board overcomes the imaginations of strong men. Let a man sit in at that table once and it will be a difficult thing to get him away from the game. Now, there are some in Washington, as everyone knows, who are obsessed with an itch to meddle into that power-politics game of Europe and to meddle very definitely on the side of one of the combatants. The great problem ahead of us in keeping out of war is in checking the activities of those individuals in our Government in keeping these activities within bounds and in Congress exercising some sort of supervision over them.

No power in this country can do that save Congress and public opinion. The suggestion has been made that if and when Congress is summoned, all elements in both Houses which are determined to keep this country out of war ought to form an organization—a steering committee aside from regular party committees. It should be bipartisan and have but a single objective—to keep a ceaselessly vigilant eye upon the State Department, the Navy, and the executive department of the Government. It should keep the country fully and fearlessly informed of what is going on in Washington and to marshal the strength of the antiwar groups in all parties in Congress.

The aim of this committee should be to keep Congress in continuous session as long as the war lasts. Such a committee should agree upon a policy at the very outset and follow its program logically. With its access to the ear of the Nation it should make the fullest use of its resources to place before the people the facts about the struggle and our relation to it. If we are going to offset the vicious effects of foreign propaganda which is bound to descend upon us and indeed is with us today; if we are bound to offset the effects of that propaganda we must see to it that plain, unvarnished truth is given to the people of this Nation. Such a course as has been suggested is, perhaps, the only one which can protect us from an administration which apparently has now gotten around to this singular idea, as expressed by one of its most intimate of the inner-circle personages, that America should be a knight-errant righting the wrongs of the world.

Yes; we must look forward to all sorts of subversive propaganda and we must recognize such, in order that we may maintain a strict neutrality. We must remember that there are those in this Nation who for selfish reasons will insist upon the shipment of munitions to the warring nations. The provisions for an arms embargo, giving aid to neither side, is neutrality. The elimination of an arms embargo and the substitution of any cash-and-carry plan, or similar subterfuge, is the power to be unneutral—it is not neutrality. We are told by some that an embargo on arms and munitions would be unneutral because it would act unfavorably upon England and France. Neutrality, according to such a conception, apparently consists of assuring that both sides in a war are equally armed for the struggle. With England and France controlling the seas, a theoretical provision permitting the sales of arms, implements of war, and ammunitions to all belligerents is simply in effect an alinement—an economic alinement, if you please—with England and France. It is in effect an alliance in the power balances of Europe. It will be the first step in American participation in the war before it is ended.

Europe has always had alliances in an attempt to maintain a balance of power. They are the history of her politics and her diplomacy. There was the triple alliance of Great Britain, Russia, and Austria in 1795. In 1813 Austria, Russia, and Prussia were allied in a drive to "stop Napoleon." In 1815 these same countries formed the so-called Holy Alliance, which was joined by England and France in 1818. In 1883 Germany, Italy, and Austria formed the Triple Alliance, which was renewed in 1887, 1891, and again in 1896. But just as America has steadfastly refused to become involved in the wars of Europe, so she has always declined to have any part in the intrigue of the power politics of Europe. She knew that to be drawn into European alliances would be to be dragged into European conflicts.

The American people believe that they can have their own peace, as they have in the past, though the peoples of other nations are engaged in a suicidal struggle. They are determined to maintain that peace as the only way of prosperity and progress, as the only hope of the future.

In the name of self-preservation they must not allow themselves to be led by vicious propaganda or false idealism into a struggle which all military experts agree will be the most devastating in the history of the world and from which many fear civilization itself will not emerge.

It is not self-interest alone which dictates such a course. America can best serve the world—as she has in years past—by not being dragged down into the conflicts of others, but, instead, by preserving her peace and by becoming once more a challenge and an inspiration to the world.

America can best serve humanity by refusing to give way to a campaign which, by arousing the vicious passions of intolerance and hatred, would persuade them to deal death and destruction to those whom propagandists would convince them are their enemies. To be humane is to be humane to all men.

America can best serve the ideals of democracy by assuring that the ideal is kept alive at home. We must beware that it is not extinguished by the military dictatorship which would immediately assume control of our national life upon a declaration of war. Let those who think this is too strong a statement read carefully the industrial mobilization plan which is now on the statute books and provides for the complete control of all wealth, the confiscation of all property, and the conscription of labor the day America goes to war.

America can best serve the cause of progress by assuring that when other nations have exhausted themselves in combat she will be able to lead the way along the path of peace and prosperity as she has in years gone by.

Will the history of the future record that we of today nobly advanced or meanly lost all that America has meant to countless millions for over a century and a half? Or will history relate that America continued as a beacon of light and a hope to the war weary and the oppressed peoples of all the world, or will the chapter of our day be entitled "The Twilight of the American Way of Life"?

The answer rests with us. It will take all the tolerance, all the courage, and all the vision of which we are capable. But, inspired by the spirit of those who have gone before us, of those who lost their lives in the last World War, we will not fail to pass on to future generations an America prosperous and at peace—an America that is the hope of the world.

Neutrology and Neutrality

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. T. V. SMITH, OF ILLINOIS, AT WASHINGTON, D. C., SEPTEMBER 23, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address made by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System on September 23, 1939, as follows:

My fellow countrymen:

"He who knows not and knows not that he knows not is a fool—shun him.

"He who knows and knows not that he knows is asleep—wake him.

"He who knows not and knows that he knows not is a learner—teach him.

"He who knows and knows that he knows is wise—follow him."

I. THE CIVIC DANGER OF MORAL CONFUSION

No greater danger can beset a moral nation than deep confusion about its duty. Such confusion divides us without our seeing why we are divided. We are divided from one another because we are, each of us, divided against himself. We want to do right, but we Americans hesitate to damage others and call it duty. That's what war does; it deflates duty from the best to below second best. When warring nations go out deliberately to do each other dirt, peaceful nations can do nothing that does not damage somebody. We must learn quickly, therefore, that as between evils it is as much our duty to choose the lesser evil as it is our duty between goods to choose the greater good. Unfortunately for pacifism, whether economic or military pacifism, not to choose is still to do somebody damage. If we do not choose or choose too late, we miss the boat of even the second best and find ourselves forced to take a third or fourth best.

What we require for peace is a line of duty that will get itself done as well as get said. This we have lacked since the World War; and, lacking such a lead, we have wobbled all over the international lot, confusing others because we ourselves are confused. Keep this up and we'll not unlikely wobble right into war. We said we fought before—and I for one believe it—to make the world safe for democracy. But we did not make the world safe for anything, even though we "won" the war. One reason we lost our cause while winning our case was that we changed the conception of our duty, midstream, before we'd finished our job. The Treaty of Versailles has proved the mother of war, partly because we conscientiously, as usual, withdrew cooperation from the method we ourselves had proposed to make that peace flexible against the desperate days. Moral ambition must be made of stuff sterner than palpitating fear, tired liberalism, or vacillating sentimentalism.

Our continuing confusion is written large in the daily mail of every Congressman. Our anguished citizens cry with one voice, "Keep us out of war." And from congressional offices goes up one mighty chorus of "Amen." But this same mail makes clear that our people do not themselves know how to get what they want. If for us to know how were as easy as for them to know what, the troubles of us Representatives would be settled by merely opening our mail. The letters, however, but propose peace; they expect us to dispose of war through something called "neutrality." But how are we to get neutrality when we don't agree upon what it is? And how are we to maintain it when its going to hurt some nations more than others? The letters rightly say that "we" can stay out of war if we will; but how is that little word "we" to be made to mean us—all of us American people? "We," when deeply divided, becomes but a wee little word of two puny letters; only a united "we" can work the wonders expected. But we are now so divided in counsel that each tends to think that any neutrality save his own brand will get us into war. Our confusion is indeed so deep as to lead many to argue that the best way to stay out is simply to stay put. So argued the ostrich before them. They want us to stay where we are without really knowing where we are. Heroic hiding will help but little in the storm of worlds now thundering; nor will any amount of picturesque arguing from "hell to breakfast," as in the nursery rhyme of certain Senators, increase by one tittle our actual safety on the winding stairway of confusion. Behold, as in another nursery rhyme.—(A. A. Milne, "When We Were Very Young.")

"Halfway down the stairs
Is a stair
Where I sit.
There isn't any Other stair
Quite like
It.
I'm not at the bottom,
I'm not at the top;
So this is the stair
Where I always Stop.

"Halfway up the stairs
Isn't up
And it isn't down.
It isn't in the nursery
It isn't in the town.
And all sorts of funny thoughts
Run round my head:
'It isn't really Anywhere!
It's somewhere else
Instead!' "

Leaving nursery rhymes to our moral Minniver Cheevys, we must begin by confessing our confusion, and then set ourselves to cure it if we can. It's surely safer for us politicians to know what we don't know than to think that we know what we don't. And what about you, my fellow countrymen?

The help I think I can bring is modest enough: It is to clear up this notion of duty and thus help make the little word "we" mean all of us. A moral nation must get its conscience clear. That is certainly the first step to endurance in peace, if peace prove possible, and to effectiveness in war, if war prove inexorable. It is, then, to this simple end of clarity that I now address myself.

II. DEPENDABLE DUTY IS BASED ON RIGHTS

To define our national duty apart from our rights is to subject us to every form of fanaticism. And to define our rights without consulting others is to imitate bullies, whom we despise. If we can discover a body of rights already allowed us by others, then we can claim them for ourselves with a good conscience. A sense of duty founded upon that solid substance of social fact might prove durable enough to support consistent action in the trying days ahead. Nothing else will do so. Now, this is the meaning of those who keep talking to us of international law. Fortunately for moral nations, which do not ask or wish to determine their rights without consultation, there has grown up through the centuries of civilized time a fairly well-defined and generally agreed-upon body of privileges that obtain even in wartime for those not engaged at war. This clearly is such a touchstone as is required by conscience, and fortunately it is at hand. Secretary Hull has already served notice that we reserve all our rights under international law. He could ask no less. He need ask no more. That's language that all the world understands, understands largely alike; and in that joint understanding lies our greatest safety. I do not say complete safety; for international law is no more a panacea than is anything else in wartime. But to accept these rights as the bounds of our duty is to call the sober opinion of mankind to witness that we ask no more for ourselves than others ask for themselves and that we demand no more than we are willing to grant. It was never too early for us to do this sane thing; it is not now too late. This, then, is what the appeal to international law really means: A simple return to rights that are ours and that others cannot justly complain of. This is the way for us to submit our consciences for the candid confirmation of civilized men. Such action furnishes us a home base of principle to save us from splurges into sentimentalism, from forays into fanaticism, and from a constant and fearful snatching at the straws of mere expediency. This principle firmly established, we may more safely resort to expediency itself when and as we must.

III. ECCENTRIC CONCEPTIONS OF DUTY

Without this home base we are continuously in danger of reaction from an overdose of eccentric idealism self-administered. Let me make this very clear, for I regard it as the greatest weakness in our national character, the largest danger for us to face down if we are to keep safe through a long war. Have we not all learned, indeed, from our New Year resolutions in childhood, if not from camp-meeting conversions in adolescence, that the more cautious our commitments, the more likely we are to deliver to ourselves? It is the same with our Nation. The backsliding of idealists is as dangerous as it is easy in wartime. We start, you see, with the generous impulse not to hurt anybody. We'll forego trade with warring nations. We'll make no money out of misery. We'll tighten our belts around the girth of our purity and keep ourselves unspotted from the wicked world. This is the familiar and beautiful principle of self-sacrifice applied to our Nation, and it leaves us feeling good from our decision to share some part of the sufferings of the war-torn world.

This high principle is expressed concretely in the present neutrality provisions that require us to forego completely the wickedest part of international trade—that is, the trade in arms. The cash-and-carry provision, now lapsed in law but much alive in discussion, represents a Yankee admixture of self-interest with self-sacrifice. It enables us to sacrifice with safety, saving our souls, as it were, with 5 percent returns on our investment.

This attitude of self-sacrifice is very beautiful, indeed, and not without its undertow on all our hearts. The main thing lacking is that it does not wear well. It requires us to be moral heroes, and most of us are not moral heroes save while all dressed up for the part. We'd rather praise heroes than to practice heroism. As in regard to the famous "purple cow":

"We often long for heroes high,
And some day yet may see 'em;
But this we'll tell you here and now:
'We'd rather see than be 'em.'"

Such imputation of saintliness may hold of Gandhi and of his spiritual descendants. We may indeed be sincerely regretful that it does not hold of us. Beautiful as such heroism is, we know, as grown men and women, that it is the part of both wisdom and prudence to make certain that we can stand in the wear and tear of life and not to tax our moral resources beyond what the credit of our characters will continue to bear. All checks are equally good, of course, until it comes time to cash them. But this is just the kind of check which has always bounced back when America has tried to cash it. If Jefferson could rise from the dead, he'd tell us a few things about the capacity of our idealism to stand the gaff of an embargo that sacrifices our commerce. If Wilson could come from the grave, he would warn us of the awful cost of moral fatigue; and even Warren Harding could tell us of the infinite relief with which we Americans can accept easy normalcy after a season amid the snows of self-sacrifice. Having overdone our capacity for heroism, we easily overindulge our capacity for relaxation. The resulting moral lumbago boots neither us nor mankind. So let us beware, as we'd beware the "Ides of Destiny," the day when idealists get all fed up on their own idealism. The self-knowledge of what our rights are, and where they are, is better protection against war than is any panicky fear of war. It is the rabbit who runs, you know, that gets chased by the hounds. This, then, is our main conclusion: Duties independent of rights—who knows where they lead? Duties founded on rights objectively agreed to—these furnish the safest and most substantial clues for national sanity.

IV. EXPEDIENCY FOLLOWING AND FULFILLING DUTY

If through this self-knowledge of duty we can thus clear a path for our consciences, we may then use our minds to deal with problems of expediency as they arise. Arise they will—and galore! Against that day we must know our rights, but on that day we do not have to insist upon all our rights. Which ones we shall forego as a matter of prudent safety and which ones we shall allow violated as a matter of forbearance—these are problems to be compromised as we go along. We will not lose our way in the wilderness of crass expediency if we remember this home base of principle.

Moreover, such previous knowledge will keep us from the self-righteousness that easily arises out of our thinking that we're sacrificing more than we are. And yet to make the sacrifices required by expediency will help fulfill the feeling in all of us that unless we suffer we are somehow not doing our duty. We have, for example, the right not only to trade but to trade in our own ships. I would myself, as a matter of concession, gladly forego that right as a costly but justifiable insurance against the risk arising from a too rigid insistence upon what is ours. I can understand those who in the name of expediency would also go further and sell arms or even food for cash alone. All such expedient considerations are in order, but safely in order only after we have yoked our duty to our rights. Echoing Lincoln, let us have faith, faith that rights are also right, and in that faith let us dare to do our duty.

V. NEUTROLOGY AND NEUTRALITY DISTINGUISHED

We have now only to summarize these two main notions of national duty, giving to each its proper name. There is, first, I remind you, the beautiful doctrine of almost pure self-sacrifice for the sake of peace. Then, short of this economic pacifism, there is a qualified doctrine of self-sacrifice which appeals to the more worldly of the high-minded. This would embargo arms, but would continue to sell things like cotton, where a little more imagination is required to smell the blood on our hands from gun cotton exploding. The policy which combines this whole-hearted and this half-hearted sacrifice is not rightly called neutrality. Let us call it neutrology, for, like astrology, if not numerology, its appeal is to the stars for guidance.

Nobody has shown, I mean, that the sacrifice of any or all of our trade will keep us out of war. Yet it is surely the business of eminent neutrologists to show this, not merely to assert it; for they are asking us to begin by damaging ourselves. Sincerity here is not enough, not though it be as high-minded as Lindbergh's, even as lofty as VANDENBERG'S. Political preachers may, but statesmen must not, merely carry coals to Newcastle by proclaiming to the galleries of the Nation a conviction that all of us already fervently believe and applaud, that we must stay out of war. If that's all such men have to offer, their will to preserve our peace is likely to prove as shoddy as Senator BORAH'S poor wit to conjure the war away with cocksure prediction; for they are, one and all, veritably playing a hunch which, since it begins by sacrificing our rights, may well end by sacrificing our sons. It's not in the stars of such neutrology but in our own stamina that genuine neutrality seeks and may find strength to save us from war.

Neutrality, then—as universally rather than eccentrically defined—has three advantages in our present predicament:

1. By giving us a solid and consistent sense of duty, neutrality becomes our most likely path to peace.

2. Neutrality impairs neither our will to peace nor yet our capacity to provide arms, to provide them quickly, to provide them immensely—to provide them against the recurring fate of nations not ready for war when peace simply plays out on them.

3. I myself cannot but count it also an advantage of neutrality—neutrality as distinguished from our Chinese and Spanish adventures into neutrology—that it will help the friends of our cause. It is by a grace not to be spurned that we can thus accidentally prosper a course for which, geography alone failing us, we ourselves would now be fighting. I say this fearfully, even though advisedly.

I say it because America is united on the merits of the conflict now raging. It is not our war; but it is a war which involves a cause so completely ours that only distance separates us from the defense of our own. Mere physical distance at that; for all psychic distance is gone since the radio makes us near neighbor to every ideological nuisance in Europe and Asia. We do not have to name the aggressors. They take pride in naming themselves, and in boasting of their outrages against a cause that vibrates as our own through every fiber of our honest being. Shall we, then, grieve that our neutrality works against those who boastfully name themselves by short wave and ugly deed as destroyers of all that we have labored to save at home and have prayed to see built in the world? Shall we fail to stand up for our rights merely because friends of our way of life are helped thereby? Not if we are sons of the fathers who fought to bequeath to us this American way of life.

Beyond all doubt, we Americans are too civilized to want to fight. We may even be too proud to fight for many things others would fight for. We are fortunately too lucky now to have to fight. But we are not afraid to fight; for we do not fear to do our duty in defense of our inalienable rights. It is important for our safety that others do not misunderstand our prudence and particularly that they do not despise what I hope will be our forthcoming forbearance. This constitutes the high utility of proceeding mainly by principle and of making clear now what that principle is. Fear of war does not pass as principle, we must sadly remark, to those who, on principle, war upon their neighbors.

No; we Americans do not want to fight, nor will we fight if it can be avoided through a wise neutrality; but, I repeat, we are not afraid to fight, not we Americans. We have indeed from the days of our first fathers already engaged ourselves to defend in our homeland, and later in our neighborland of the Americas, the cause for which civilized men fight elsewhere today; the cause of law and order, of gentility and progress, of forbearance and freedom.

VI. CALM REASONABLENESS REASSERTED

Nothing in this speech, I assure you, arises from a mood born since fighting began in Europe. That this is so I certify by closing now with some paragraphs from my radio debate on this subject months ago with Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, himself though Republican wisely in favor of embargo repeal. (A debate now published in "Foundations of Democracy.")

"We might stay out of a raging war; we're certain to stay out of a nonexistent war. Prevention is so infinitely the better bet for us to avoid war that nobody who cares will spare any effort at prevention.

"If our most heroic effort fails to prevent the war, God grant it fail not through irresponsible criticism of the President here at home during these days of waiting and hoping. * * * If this effort at prevention fail, then we shall unite ourselves in a drive for the wisest possible neutrality. I join Mr. TAFT at this point in a hope as firm as it is desperate. There is no fate that foredooms us to war, even if war comes to Europe. Our best chance seized and lost—the chance to prevent, then we'll hug our last chance—the chance to avoid.

"But that chance will prove the less if we make neutrality mean isolation. * * * The trouble with us Americans is that we aren't used to having to choose between two evils. * * * We get all fussed up at the thought of death rained from the air on women and children, of cities razed, and cruelty enthroned. There is no isolation of ideas. Our sympathies undo us.

"Moreover, economic isolation would so dislocate our whole national life that nobody, I fear, but a philosopher who lives on humor and high thinking would stand the gaff. * * * We must say, in general, with an ancient sage, that isolation is for gods and brutes alone. Alas, we Americans are not gods, and God grant that we be not brutes.

"Our neutrality cannot mean isolation. It must mean self-defense. * * * What kind of neutrality can a country have that has already undertaken to defend two whole continents, in an age of radios and airplanes? It must mean a very spacious self-defense.

"It must be a bold neutrality. Only that kind is open to us. * * * It will not be bullied into restricting its trade, but will do so only out of prudence and from a sense of caution. It will arm itself adequately and will keep its powder dry. A bold neutrality will harm friends as little as possible and will help its friends' enemies as little as possible. But most of all and best of all * * * neutrality will be and remain a strenuous struggle for peace through every peaceful means that's humanly possible."

We Can Stay Out of This War

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS CASE, OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to place in the RECORD the remarks I made over radio station KOBH in Rapid City, Tuesday, September 19, 1939, just prior to coming here for this special session of the Seventy-sixth Congress:

To the people of the Second Congressional District of South Dakota: The Congress of the United States will assemble in Washington, Thursday, the day after tomorrow, to consider questions arising out of the war now unhappily consuming Europe. I shall leave this afternoon to be present for the opening session. I have been in the State a month since the regular session adjourned, and, during that time, have talked with as many people as possible at various gatherings throughout the district. Unfortunately I have been unable to see all of you; this is especially true in those sections which I had expected to visit later during the fall.

The questions that will come before the Congress in the special session are so far reaching and of such intimate concern to every one of you, however, that I take this means of talking things over with you and of urging you to write me freely as the days go by.

EMBARGO WAS TWICE PASSED AND SIGNED

The primary question that will come before us will be a proposal to repeal the arms-embargo section of the Neutrality Act.

This act was first adopted by the Congress and signed by the President in 1935.

Two years later, in 1937, the act was supplemented by a temporary Neutrality Act designed to meet the situation in Spain, and then the act of 1935 was overhauled by the Foreign Affairs Committees of the House and Senate, extensively debated, passed by the Congress, and signed by the President.

COMMODITY RESTRICTIONS HAVE EXPIRED

The principal amendment of 1937 was the addition of a commodity embargo which would have prevented the shipment of general supplies and commodities to warring nations. This section, however, was placed on a 2-year trial basis and expired May 1 of this year, 1939.

Consequently, the principal features of existing legislation on the subject are these:

1. A requirement that whenever the President finds a state of war to exist among two or more nations, or a state of civil war within a nation, he shall proclaim the fact and name the nations involved.

2. That thereupon it shall be unlawful to ship arms and munitions of war to nations named in the proclamations.

3. That citizens of the United States shall not travel in ships of the nations at war.

4. That American ships shall not carry arms or implements of war to warring nations. They may, however, carry commodities and supplies.

All this is backed up by the Johnson Act, which prevents loans and credits to nations that have defaulted in payments on their loans made in the last World War.

ARMS EMBARGO NOT A HASTY LAW

Today discussion centers on the arms embargo. In 1935 and again in 1937 the congressional leaders definitely and repeatedly declared that this was the heart of neutrality legislation; that the embargo on arms was not a hasty or ill-considered proposition; that it not only would go far in keeping the United States out of war but would deter other nations from going to war.

It was recognized that the essence of neutrality was to announce our position in advance and to treat all nations alike. "Neutrality," we were told, "means that you must announce the rules in advance and not change them after the game starts."

The time to act, it was further argued, is in time of peace, when the nation is free from war hysteria.

F. O. B., U. S. A., AND C. O. D.

There were advocates then of a cash-and-carry policy. Personally, I recall that in 1934 I made speeches suggesting that if we sold munitions we should adopt the alphabetical description and "sell them only f. o. b., U. S. A., and c. o. d." That was cash and carry—come and get it, pay for it, take it away in your own ships, and take your own risks on the high seas.

This is no time, however, for pride of opinion, or for approaching this question from the standpoint of personal or political profit. There is only one basis for decision; that is, What is to the best interest of the people of the United States? This is no time to be pro-German or pro-British or pro-French, but only pro-American.

QUESTIONS PEOPLE ARE ASKING

Assuming that the people of the United States would prefer to see their Allies in the last World War win, but also assuming that the United States does not desire to get into war again, here are the questions that thoughtful people are asking:

1. Can we change the Neutrality Act now, amending it so as to favor one side rather than the other, and avoid retaliation that will plunge us into the war? Retaliation, also, that may endanger the Monroe Doctrine?

2. If the maintenance of the present Neutrality Act should cripple England and France and they should be on the point of defeat, would public opinion in the United States permit their destruction without sending them not only arms and munitions, but also money and men?

3. And that leads to the question, Would we be more likely to escape the need for sending men if we supplied arms and munitions now?

4. And that leads back to the first question in a practical form: If we undertake now to sell arms and munitions when 2 years ago and 4 years ago we said we would not, will the nations who are damaged attempt to blow up our factories and attack boats in our harbors on the ground that we have violated international law?

Or, to put it in the words of Senator VANDENBERG, "Can we be the arsenal for one side and not be the target for the other?"

OPPOSED TO FIGHTING EUROPE'S WARS AGAIN

I have no hesitancy in saying that if we were starting from scratch, if we could change our policy without being unneutral, I could vote for a cash-and-carry plan, but if a change means a declaration of war, I cannot go along, for I am opposed to sending our sons to fight Europe's wars again.

If we could recover the independence of a cash-and-carry plan and be given guaranties of its impartial administration, supported by a policy of international reconciliation and nonmeddling in European affairs, with assurances that we could take that position without becoming involved in Europe's war, I would certainly work and vote to that end.

The difficulty, however, is that our decision in these matters is likely not to be an open-and-shut question. Votes will be cast on propositions that are not all black and not all white. Many of them will be gray, and it will be difficult to tell what is the wisest course. That is why I have taken this means of talking with you and of venturing to suggest that a more important question is involved than that of the arms embargo.

That question is the future of the United States.

LET US PLACE AMERICA FIRST

Last spring, during the debate on revision of the Neutrality Act, I said that our ability to contribute soundly to solving world problems depended upon our ability to keep from becoming a partisan in quarrels that were not our primary concern. Pointing out that the Monroe Doctrine was the cornerstone of sound American foreign policy—no extension of foreign footholds in this hemisphere—I asked the question: How can we tell European nations to stay out of here if we insist on mixing in over there?

Our sympathies will be aroused—they are aroused by the unhappy plight of the people in Poland today. They will be aroused again and again if this scourge goes on. But at this time, in deepest conscience, may I plead with you that we reserve our deepest sympathies for the future of the United States. And by that I mean the true destiny of the American people.

MEN WERE TO BE FREE HERE

When our fathers came to America to establish homes they came with the hope that here they might establish a race of free men, free to worship as they pleased; yes, free to plan their own lives, too. They wanted to be free from the philosophy that has gripped Europe that men's minds are the property of the state and that their bodies are but pawns for governments to toss on the scales in a balancing of power against power, and then to hurl into war when war comes.

And war comes in Europe. Take Poland, for example.

War came to Poland in 1618, carved out East Prussia, and created the Polish corridor 300 years ago.

War came to Poland in the rise of Frederick the Great of Prussia in 1740, 200 years ago.

A generation later war came to Poland in 1772 and brought the first partition. The corridor became West Prussia.

Twenty years later war came to Poland in 1793 and gave west Poland to Prussia and east Poland to Russia. That was the second partition.

In 1795, the third partition gave Warsaw to German Prussia and south Poland to Austria.

Ten years later war came again with Napoleon. Then England fought France on the sea and supplied gold for Prussia to fight France on land. Poland was the soil of the tramping armies.

By 1812, Napoleon had made a buffer state of Warsaw, but 3 years later German princes took eastern Poland and the Czar of Russia proclaimed himself King of Poland.

By 1830, another crop of boys had grown up and civil war came when Warsaw revolted and threw out the Russians. A year later, the Czar returned, crushed the revolt and made Poland part of the Russian Empire.

Thirty-three years later—in 1863—war came again. Another revolt that was crushed and the Polish language was banished from the schools.

War came again in 1914—the World War that made Poland first the battleground on the eastern front, and finally the buffer state when peace was written at Versailles. Poland fought until 1923, taking considerable territory from Russia. Two days ago Russia invaded and recaptured that territory in the twelfth major conflict that has swept over Poland in 200 years.

A WAR FOR EVERY CROP OF SOLDIERS IN EUROPE

That is the story of life in Europe—a new war—a war of revenge with every new crop of soldiers. A war every generation. A war every 20 years.

The people of the United States again are asked to accept the false philosophy that we can end Europe's round of wars. History gives us no grounds to believe that we can do any such thing.

In 1917, Woodrow Wilson asked the question: "Is the present war a struggle for a just and secure peace, or only a new balance of power?"

Persuaded that the struggle was for a lasting peace, a war to end war, the United States went into that war. Today, the cycle of revenge has spun around again. A new crop of cannon fodder has matured and Europe is again at war. Indeed, Europe has not had peace for a dozen years.

Shall we now, with our unselfish effort of 1917 so clearly proved in vain, be fooled again?

Shall we, in this hemisphere, abandon the belief that man is entitled to plan his own life? Shall we condemn our children and their children's children to the Old World philosophy that balances power against power and makes people only pawns in the game of international politics?

Or shall our sons and our daughters have the right to dream dreams and build their homes free from the threat of war planned by governments in which they have no voice, wars brought on by the forces of greed, ambition, and jealousy—those forces and whims of European politics which we can never control?

Those are the questions involved in the decisions that we will be making these days. Parents are coming to me, as my parents went to their Representative 20 years ago, and are asking, "What does this mean as far as my boy is concerned? Can we stay out of this?"

WE CAN STAY OUT OF THIS WAR

Let me say here what I have said to many in the last few weeks: The United States can stay out of this war if we are determined to stay out of it; and, as far as I am concerned, every effort will be made to stay out of it.

We can stay out of it if people will read their history books again. If we are to decide rightly in this crisis, we need the sound judgment that comes from lessons of the past. We are being bombarded by propaganda from all sides, presented with a skill and by methods unknown to any previous generation.

YOUR PRIVILEGE TO HAVE A VOICE

I am told that a recent visitor from Washington to a South Dakota audience ridiculed the idea that any Congressman who had been "only a country newspaper editor" should venture to question the wisdom of the President on any policy of foreign affairs.

May I say to you that remark utterly missed the true meaning of America. For here we have had the idea that men were not chattels to be shoved about by those at the head of the Government. And it is not only the duty and the privilege of your Representative, but it is your duty and privilege as private citizens to have a voice in those affairs that affect your destiny.

READ HISTORY AGAIN

Let me urge, therefore, that you reread your history books.

Read again the story of modern Europe; the story of Poland, which I sketched today.

And reread your American history, too. Reread the great state papers of America—the Declaration of Independence, George Washington's Farewell Address, the Monroe Doctrine, Lincoln's second inaugural.

And if you want to read something current, get the September number of Harpers Magazine, given over to foreign affairs, with a special article by the historian Charles A. Beard, entitled "Giddy Minds and Foreign Quarrels."

If every citizen were to read this group of documents, we would have a revival of true Americanism. We would cease to worry about Europe and would set ourselves to solving our own problems.

We need in these days a rekindled vision of the true mission of the United States. America has been the hope of humanity, a hope that a government might be created by the people and for the people, and that in it people might control their own destinies and not be condemned, before they are born, to taking part in wars which they had no voice in making.

Maude Royden, brilliant English woman, visiting the United States 3 years ago, in Washington, said, "When the next war comes in Europe you will be told that it is your duty to get in again. Don't do it. When the war is over the world will need you."

INTERVENTION CAN MAKE IT WORSE—NEVER BETTER

Professor Borchard, of Yale, is regarded as one of the leading authorities on neutrality and international law in this country. In his book, Neutrality for the United States, Borchard says, "A strong neutral is the trustee for civilization in a shell-shocked world. * * * By intervention in European quarrels we can make the situation worse, but never better. * * * Europe must work out its own problems; it understands them better than we ever can."

THERE IS A BETTER FUTURE THAN THAT

There is a better future for the United States than trying again the role of savior for Europe.

That better future means building the United States into a power that can protect itself against aggression—and I will do my part to that end.

That better future means devoting to the solution of our domestic problems the energy and the expense that ambitious leaders in other nations give to the expansion of their frontiers—and to that we can all dedicate ourselves. We must show that constitutional democracy works.

That better future means cultivating good will with the other nations of this hemisphere so that the balance-of-power theory can never find foothold here. This may cost something, but it will cost far less than a foreign war, and in the end it means an America far greater than can be created on the battlefields of Europe, for it means an America fulfilling her own mission in the world.

May I close with a personal word? You, the people of western South Dakota have sustained me with your counsel in the days that have gone. Please continue to do so, for I shall need your counsel and your prayers as the American people move through these critical days and as I try to do my part as your representative in the Congress of the United States.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN

OF OHIO

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege granted the Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD, I have concluded to add my mite to the contributions that will undoubtedly be forthcoming from many of those who feel impelled to give expression to their feelings anent the issue which is the subject of this special session of the Congress.

My purpose in offering what follows herein is to accord my colleagues the benefit of what I received responsive to a request addressed to the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress.

When I noted the disposition of our President to ridicule the present neutrality law and thereby endeavor to avoid responsibility for its enactment, I decided to verify the belief that the now so-called neutrality law was conceived and laboriously delivered as the boasted progeny of the New Deal.

In his recent message to the Congress the President alludes to the present neutrality law as the "so-called Neutrality Act of 1935," and then solemnly confesses:

> I regret that the Congress passed the act. I regret equally that I signed that act.

When I heard the utterance just quoted, I recalled that in the Presidential campaign of 1936 the President and the administration spokesmen pointed with pride to what is now termed a "so-called Neutrality Act" as one of the grand and glorious accomplishments of the New Deal.

For instance, I remembered the now famous Chautauqua speech of the President, delivered as an opening campaign broadside, on August 14, 1936, at Chautauqua, N. Y.

Could anything be more convincing that the child now so ruthlessly spurned belongs to him than the assertion—an exultant confession, then—which I quote:

> The Congress of the United States has given me certain authority to provide safeguards of American neutrality in case of war.
> The President of the United States, who, under our Constitution, is vested with primary authority to conduct our international relations, thus has been given new weapons with which to maintain our neutrality.
> Nevertheless—and I speak from long experience—the effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State.

* * * If war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

In the light of what the President said above, is it not a startling revelation to all of you that he now resorts to the mercenary and sordid by suggesting that we take advantage of the present opportunity to now manufacture, sell, and export arms, ammunitions, and implements of death and destruction?

Supplementing the famous Chautauqua speech of the President was an adddress of the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, before the Good Neighbor League of New York City on September 15, 1936, on the subject entitled "Our Foreign Relations and Our Foreign Policy." This speech was radio broadcast over a Nation-wide network, ostensibly for informative purposes, but incidentally for political purposes.

I quote in part:

In trade interchange baleful elements enter particularly the trade of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. This trade is at present mainly incidental to the preparation for war. However, in some times and circumstances it may itself be an element in stimulating or provoking war.

* * * We must squarely face the fact that to stay clear of a widespread major war will require great vigilance, poise, and careful judgment in dealing with such interferences with our peaceful rights and activities as may take place.

Legislation recently passed provides some of the main essentials in a wise anticapatory policy. I have in mind the resolutions of Congress in 1935 and 1936, which, in addition to providing for the licensing of all imports and exports of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, prohibit their shipment to belligerent nations.

Another member of the State Department evidently thought well of the neutrality legislation, and I quote from a press release issued by the Honorable Sumner Welles, Assistant Secretary of State, on behalf of the State Department, on October 15, 1936, the same being part of an address by him before the Foreign Policy Association, New York City, on October 19, 1936:

Neutrality legislation has been devised by the Congress intended to minimize the danger of the United States being drawn into wars in whose origins it had had no part.

All of you will doubtless recall the results of the election of 1936 and that all but two States of the Union cast their electoral votes for Franklin Delano Roosevelt to succeed himself as President of the United States of America. Exulting over the glorious victory, the aforesaid Secretary of State released to the press for publication on November 7, 1936, the following unrestrained exuberance:

Democracy never in all history functioned on a more impressive scale than when over 45,000,000 American citizens went to the ballot boxes yesterday and recorded their views upon men and measures. No administration has ever received an endorsement so nearly universal and so nearly unanimous as that which the American people, in the free exercise of their suffrage, have given this administration.

Not the least of our record upon which favorable judgment was pronounced were our foreign policies and foreign relations during the past 4 years. The central policy has been that of the good neighbor, the most outstanding objective of which has been the promotion of conditions of permanent peace. These high aims and purposes in time of peace and strict neutrality in time of war have been the cornerstone of American foreign policy.

The unequivocal endorsement by the American people of these and other foreign policies is a matter of both gratification and genuine encouragement. We shall go forward with this program in the same earnest, persistent, careful, and cautious manner in which we have heretofore sought to advance this great undertaking.

We can well overlook the inaccuracies of the above statement of Mr. Hull to ask the question: Is the President willing to risk defeat of the New Deal administration for a third term by a complete reversal of foreign policy which Mr. Hull says elected him in 1936?

Not only was the Neutrality Act passed during the regime of the New Deal, but the original enactment was by a Congress that was noted for its subserviency to the President. It is, therefore, all the more difficult to understand how the President can now blandly satirize the legislation and thereby leave the inference that he had nothing to do with it other than to sign it.

He did sign it on August 31, 1935, and the statement he issued in connection reads as follows:

I have given my approval to Senate Joint Resolution 173—the neutrality legislation which passed the Congress last week.

I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The purpose is wholly excellent, and this joint resolution will to a considerable degree serve that end.

Within a few days after the President approved the Neutrality Act of 1935 war broke out between Italy and Ethiopia, and the President applied the provisions of the law to the strife between these two nations. In doing so the President went further than the act required of him and made the following statement:

In these specific circumstances I desire it to be understood that any of our people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk.

Supplementing the statement of the President, Secretary Hull made the following remarks at a press conference when asked for elaboration of the President's statement of October 5 regarding transactions with belligerents:

As I said to you gentlemen heretofore, the language of the President's statement has thoroughly well-defined meaning, and every person should be able to grasp its meaning and its implications. Technically, of course, there is no legal prohibition—apart from the proclamation governing the export of arms—against our people entering into transactions with the belligerents or either of them. The warning given by the President in his proclamation concerning travel on belligerent ships and his general warning that during the war any of our people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk were based upon the policy and purpose of keeping this country out of war—keeping it from being drawn into war. It certainly was not intended to encourage transactions with the belligerents.

Our people might well realize that the universal state of business uncertainty and suspense on account of the war is seriously handicapping business between all countries, and that the sooner the war is terminated the sooner the restoration and stabilization of business in all parts of the world, which, infinitely more important than trade with the belligerants, will be brought about.

This speedy restoration of more full and stable trade conditions and relationships among the nations is by far the most profitable objective for our people to visualize, in contrast with such risky and temporary trade as they might maintain with belligerent nations.

I repeat that our objective is to keep this country out of war.

Again, on October 30, 1935, the following statement came from the President:

In dealing with the conflict between Ethiopia and Italy, I have carried into effect the will and intent of the neutrality resolution recently enacted by Congress. We have prohibited all shipments of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to the belligerent governments. By my public statement of October 5, which was emphasized by the Secretary of State on October 10, we have warned American citizens against transactions of any character with either of the belligerent nations except at their own risk.

This Government is determined not to become involved in the controversy and is anxious for the restoration and maintenance of peace.

However, in the course of war, tempting trade opportunities may be offered to our people to supply materials which would prolong the war. I do not believe that the American people will wish for abnormally increased profits that temporarily might be secured by greatly extending our trade in such materials; nor would they wish the struggles on the battlefield to be prolonged because of profits accruing to a camparatively small number of American citizens.

And to this statement the Secretary of State appended the following:

It is my opinion that our citizens will not be disposed to insist upon transactions to derive war profits at the expense of human lives and human misery. In this connection I again repeat that an early peace, with the restoration of normal business and normal business profits, is far sounder and far preferable to temporary and risky war profits.

By the time Congress met on January 4, 1936, the President was so pleased with his neutrality legislation that he stated in his annual message the following:

As a consistent part of a clear policy the United States is following a twofold neutrality toward any and all nations which engage in wars not of immediate concern to the Americas: First, we decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States; second, we seek to discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports to them in time of peace.

Perhaps I should state at this point that when the original Embargo Act was passed in August 1935 it was the understanding that it would expire by March 1, 1936. That is the reason why the President, in his message to the Congress in January 1936, stressed the importance of passing neutrality legislation. Thereupon the act of August 1935 was amended and strengthened, and on February 29, 1936, the President, in approving this new legislation, stated the following:

By the resolution approved August 31, 1935, a definite step was taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations. It provided that in the event of the Executive proclaiming the existence of such a war thereupon an embargo would attach to the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war destined to any belligerent country. It also authorized the Executive to warn citizens of this country against traveling as passengers on the vessels of any belligerent except at their own risk.

By the resolution I have just signed the operation of the August resolution is extended and strengthened until May 1, 1937. A new and definite step is taken by providing in substance that when an embargo becomes effective obligations of any belligerent government issued after the date of the proclamation shall not be purchased or sold in this country, and no loan or credit extended to such government; but with authority the Executive, if our interests require, to except from the prohibition commercial credits and short-time loans in aid of legal transactions. * * *

The policies announced by the Secretary of State and myself at the time of and subsequent to the issuance of the original proclamation—Italy and Ethiopia—will be maintained in effect. It is true that the high moral duty I have urged on our people of restricting their exports of essential war materials to either belligerent to approximately the normal peacetime basis has not been the subject of legislation. Nevertheless, it is clear to me that greatly to exceed that basis, with the result of earning profits not possible during peace, and especially with the result of giving actual assistance to the carrying on of war, would serve to magnify the very evil of war which we seek to prevent. This being my view, I renew the appeal made last October to the American people that they so conduct their trade with belligerent nations that it cannot be said that they are seizing new opportunities for profit or that by changing their peacetime trade they give aid to the continuation of war.

Many more illuminating utterances of the President, of Secretary of State Hull, and of others in the State Department could be quoted as positive proof of a fixed policy of the Government relating to foreign affairs that now is ruthlessly reversed and repudiated. However, they would merely be repetitions and reiterations of what I have quoted.

I have but one question to ask and one comment to make:

Are we to have a foreign policy that is universal in its scope and applies to all governments alike or will our action toward belligerents be determined by whose ox is being gored?

My comment is: It may be safe for the administration to subject its domestic policies to constant change, but it is not safe for our Nation to change international policies that directly affect nations engaged in major warfare.

As the President would say, this is the crux of the whole thing.

Another Speechless, Rubber-Stamp Congress

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, when Congress adjourned on August 5 it left, unfinished, amendments to the Wage-Hour Act, which were imperatively demanded by a large number, if not the majority, of our citizens. It had failed to amend the National Labor Relations Act, commonly known as the Wagner law, although correction of that monstrosity, reliable public polls showed, was demanded by more than 70 percent of our people. It had refused after lengthy debate and deliberate consideration to repeal the neutrality law.

Calling Congress back because of the European war, the President now demands that it repeal the Neutrality Act and, in addition, that it overlook the widespread demand for remedial legislation through amendments to the Wage-Hour and the National Labor Relations Acts. In addition, he has issued his command that Congress shall not consider legislation other than the repeal of the Neutrality Act.

On top of this demand that Congress shall not do anything to solve our domestic problems he has laid down the decree that Congressmen, for the present at least, shall not even discuss in the House neutrality legislation.

Why talk about and get excited over the actions of foreign dictators when the President himself denies to the elected representatives of the people the right of free speech in the Halls of Congress?

Long the President demanded and had a rubber-stamp Congress, but even the rubber-stamp Congress was permitted on occasion to talk. Now the order has gone out that Congress shall meet for a few minutes, adjourn for 3 days—the longest period permitted by law—then meet and again adjourn until the President has corralled sufficient votes to repeal the Neutrality Act.

The rubber-stamp Congress was an independent, militant body compared with the docile, speechless, sheeplike gathering that assembled here in Washington last Thursday.

Just how do you like it when the men sent to Congress are told they will not be permitted on the floor of Congress to present your views to their fellow Members? Under such a policy, how long will it be before the President will demand, and a few men will agree, that Congress shall be adjourned indefinitely? Under such circumstances, how long do you think it will be before a Hitlerlike decree will be issued, telling us that we have no domestic problems and that the question of foreign policy and of foreign war will be decided by the President and his decision acquiesced in by a few so-called leaders?

Why talk about American rights on the high seas or abroad when here at home John L. Lewis tells you when you can work and the President muzzles the people's representatives?

For the sake of harmony, I will consent to 3-day adjournments, but I will not consent that on the days we are permitted to meet Congress be denied its constitutional right of free speech.

If we are to have war—and I can find no justifiable reason for entering this war—or if we are to make additional preparations for national defense on land and sea—and overpreparedness is a virtue rather than a fault—it is imperative that we now and without delay enact legislation which will prevent the paralyzing of industries which are essential in time of war or of preparation for war.

No one has forgotten how the sit-down strikes and the strikes which have followed; how industrial disputes between labor organizations, the activities of communistic organizers and agitators in the ranks of labor, utterly destroyed production in the mining, motor, and steel industries.

It is futile to appropriate billions for national defense, to take measures to meet foreign aggression, and leave here at home in the very center of our country those Communists, those radicals who have long advocated the overthrow of our Government by force. The issue cannot be obscured; it cannot be hidden by arguing that labor organizers shall be free to exercise control over the production of those things which are essential to create and maintain an adequate national defense.

The greater the danger from foreign war, the greater the necessity for peace between labor and industry.

Time and time again in the last session of Congress, on the floor of this House, I called to your attention the fact, which could not be successfully disputed, that the National Labor Relations Act, as administered by the National Labor Relations Board, utterly destroyed the right given employees by section 7 to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

Last Friday, September 22, two members of that Board handed down a decision which, according to a third member of the Board, William M. Leiserson—

> Not only disregards the collective-bargaining history * * * but it also sets aside the current contract * * * which excludes the Crystal City plant.

He further said:

> What the federation (C. I. O. union) could not itself secure by collective bargaining when the contract was negotiated is given to it by the Board in a finding as to the appropriate bargaining unit.

When I argued here on the floor of this House that labor, that employees, were being denied by the Board the very rights given them by the act, that the Board was depriving employers of free speech, the Democratic majority laughed in derision and refused to act.

You stayed your hand while John L. Lewis and his communistic allies carried on their warfare against industry. Now, when our Nation is threatened with war, will you sit idly here, refuse to end the official life of this Board, repeal or amend the law which will enable Lewis and those Communists who have long preached the destruction of our Government by force, to, by strikes, sabotage, and their undermining methods, betray us from within to the foreign foe threatening from without?

Just a few days ago, in the public press, I noticed that plans had already been made for the next draft. Under those plans, first to be drafted will be the young men in what are termed the non-essential industries. Naturally, in this group will be included the professional men, the clerks; in many instances, the white-collar workers. Next will come the farm boys who are not absolutely needed for the production of food and the number needed for that purpose will be greatly reduced by the use of improved farm machinery. Then, and last among the ablebodied to be called, will be the workers from the factories.

Under the system as proposed, the workers in the steel mills, in the motor industry, in all of those factories which produce munitions of war, the packing-house workers, will be the last to be taken. Where John L. Lewis and his C. I. O. and its communistic allies are strongest men will be left here at home.

If you drain the country of the young, able-bodied, independent men who have refused to submit to Lewis' demands, and leave at home all those that the Communists, the C. I. O. and Lewis have forced into their organizations, after the war is over who will control this country?

Could any better plan be devised to deliver us into the hands of the Communists, into the power of Stalin and Hitler who have joined hands to destroy free government?

By draft, strip this country and send abroad millions of those who are best fitted physically and mentally to defend us; those who are loyal and patriotic, to a land where they will be killed, maimed, or crippled, and leave here at home those who deny the right of free speech, refuse to let women or men work until they have submitted to the rule of a labor dictator, and, the war over, victory won, it will be an empty one.

Of what avail to win a war, to make the world safe for democracy, and, our soldiers returning home, find their country and its Government under the control and in the hands of a man who can declare strikes, invade cities and States with his armed goon squads, and, like a slave master of old, say who shall work and where and at what task and at what wage and for how long the American citizen shall earn his daily bread?

Some think it is our duty to save the whole wide world. I believe in the teachings of old: "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye," and, following that admonition, I beseech you to first make this country safe for democracy. Protect and preserve these United States for ourselves and for our children.

EDITORIAL FROM THE TITAN NEWS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I submit herewith the following editorial from the April 1939 issue of the Titan News monthly publication of the Titan Metal Co., of Bellefonte, Pa.

The Titan Metal Co. is one of the largest manufacturers in my district and manufactures bronze and brass products.

The views of the company as expressed in the editorial portray the deep consciousness of the management in the preservation of the peace and security of America.

[From the Titan News, Bellefonte, Pa., for April 1939]

YOU—WAR—TITAN

The propaganda machine is well oiled and running wild. War talk is on the lips of millions of Americans, from the President on down the line. Almost daily we are confronted with street and plant talk such as, "Well, it won't be long now until you have lots of orders." "Why?" we ask, and the inevitable answer is "War."

It is true that brass is an indispensable product in time of war, and it is true that America's entry would provide a great amount of work. True, also, is the fact that war is inflation in its most hideous form, and inflation to a businessman means compounded troubles when the effects of the hysteria-producing "shot in the arm" wears off.

It has truthfully been said that taxes are paid with the sweat of every man that toils, and it is likewise true that wars are won or lost by the same people. Perhaps our problem of 12,000,000 unemployed can be temporarily solved by leading them to the altar of war. Such a solution must be an admission of our inability to solve a domestic problem.

Our brass products should be going into plumbing fixtures and building hardware for new homes for the working people to live in at low rentals.

Our brass products should be used to create better transportation facilities at low cost—automobile, subway, railway, airplane.

Our brass products should help mold the greatest navy in the world—twice the size of any existing navy if necessary—to protect our shores from attack under leadership of such mad dogs as Hitler and Mussolini and the smooth-talking diplomats of all the rest of Europe.

Our brass products should be utilized in the creation of low-cost electric products—washing machines, ironers, clocks, radios, television, telephones, oil burners, air condition units, refrigeration, pumps, gas appliances, bottling equipment, etc.

For nearly 10 years we have been trying to get out of depression by increasing costs of every item a workingman buys. Contrary to our past experience as an industrial nation, we have failed to recognize that millions of Americans are crying out for the opportunity to purchase low-cost products of industry.

War would again inflate all American industry. Expansion, expansion, expansion, financed by Uncle Sam. What happens when the war ends? Market diminishes for war products; only outlet is for peacetime products; result is a glutted market, overproduction, and unemployment. Is that a solution? Are we to start out again on a road that 22 years ago took us nowhere; a great country crying out for jobs and products at low cost, burdened with experimental legislative measures which have failed, increased taxation, twenty billions more debt, same number of unemployed that we had before the billions were spent; this same great Nation can find no lasting peace, prosperity, and happiness in war.

Our greatest need is to recognize and correct our mistakes and adopt a leadership which can heal the wounds inflicted on our productive enterprises by recognizing the necessity of close cooperation between labor, management, and capital.

If a company in a basic industry such as Titan can increase employment from an average of 136 in 1929 to over four times that number, surely there is a chance to provide jobs for all who want a job if industry as a whole gains confidence. It is possible for you to have a job because, as a part of a small, closely knit organization, capital was invested to build up and modernize the company. Large corporations are not so flexible. Confidence is lacking and the stock-market actions reflected by war scare is not helping the situation.

If war was hell when Sherman made his famous statement, what is it now? Murder from the sky will take its toll of women, children, the unborn, and the aged. Tom Chikouras, in the March 8 issue of the Chicago Daily Tribune, expresses the thoughts of the Titan News as follows:

SHALL IT HAPPEN AGAIN?

"The months before and twisting pain of birth
Were hers, but Mary thought the coin was small
To pay for Jim, the finest son on earth.
And John, his dad, forgot the miles of hall
Next day, and grinned, and passed out good cigars;
And bought a policy to school his heir—
With college most as far away as Mars.
Jim grew, with ills and much expense and wear
On Mary and his dad, became a Scout,
Played basketball, took high school in his stride,
And higher learning, too. The shabby stout
Old pair who called him son near choked with pride.
Then overseas they got into a brawl;
Jim's country sent him there—and that was all."

Can the American People Be Fooled Again?

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in discussing peace, war, and neutrality, we must remember that of the three war alone is adaptable to regulation by law. War is premeditated; neutrality is elective, and peace is desirable.

A nation is neutral when its government observes international law, and this was clearly demonstrated during the World War, for many nations in combat zones remained neutral during that whole period.

The United States, which is 2,500 miles removed from Europe, became involved in that conflict for one reason alone: Our Government was not and did not remain neutral. I recall our absolute indifference to that war in 1914, and I further remember that there was no desire by our people to participate in that war in 1916. Yet 1 year after the election we became partners with England in that conflict.

The daily papers then, as now, were engaged in misrepresentation of actual conditions in Europe so as to mold public opinion favorable to the Triple Entente. In this, the papers were successful because public hatreds were gradually directed toward the Triple Alliance. The daily papers were not interested in publishing facts. They were instead directed by their owners, the invisible government. It was the international financiers that wanted war, and it is the same group, including a few new ones, that want us to take sides in this war, and if we do, we are fools.

I shall now quote from Senate Document 346, which I believe may be illuminating to those who are interested in not becoming involved in the present conflict.

WHO ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WORLD WAR?

The fixing of the responsibility for causing the World War is not an easy task. One of the remarkable features of that war is that, thus far, nobody and no nation has admitted the responsibility for causing it. The emperors, kings, and ministers of the warring nations, as if conspired to mislead the world, pointed their accusing fingers upon one another and, parrot-like, repeated, "You did it; you did it." The Germans accused the English and the French Governments. The English and French politicians accused the German Kaiser. Everybody vied with everybody else in disowning and repudiating the paternity of the monstrous child, the World War.

During and after the World War Europe has failed to produce one single courageous statesman who would dare to fix upon the proper parties the responsibility for causing the World War. The statesmen and diplomats of the principal warring countries know, or ought to know, who caused the World War. There must be plenty of available and seriously incriminating documents in the archives of the English, French, and German Governments. It is childish and condemnable on the part of the statesmen and diplomats of those countries to hide the truth from the world. The truth is coming to light and the inexorable rays of the history of Europe point out the culprits.

Of all the statesmen of the warring countries, Lloyd George, the now ex-Premier of England, has done some service in aiding mankind in finding the parties responsible for the World War. It may fairly be assumed that Lloyd George knows the facts, but thus far he has failed, with the rest of his colleagues, to show a moral courage to state the whole truth. On one occasion he apologized for all the statesmen of all the warring countries by saying that nobody "quite meant war." That apology was made when he was the Prime Minister of England. When out of the ministry, however, he gives more or less concrete information. Thus, on December 23, 1920, speaking to the Empire Parliamentary Association, Lloyd George said:

"The more one reads memoirs and books written in the various countries of what happened before August 1914 the more one realizes that no one at the head of affairs quite meant war. It was something into which they glided or rather staggered and stumbled." (Issues of Today, January 14, 1922.)

In a syndicated article on January 6, 1923, Lloyd George became more communicative, and, instead of an apology, he offered a positive statement. He now calls the rulers of the "attacking empires" as the "nominal rulers" and "terror-stricken dummies." Furthermore, he definitely fixes the responsibility for the war upon the military organizations of Germany, France, and Russia. Lloyd George said:

"The more one examines the events of July 1914, the more one is impressed with the shrinking of the nominal rulers of the attacking empires and with the relentless driving onward of the military organizations behind these terror-stricken dummies."

Then, in carefully veiled language, leaving a good deal to be read between the lines, Lloyd George said:

"No one ever believed it (the cause of the war) was the assassination of the royal archduke [of Austria]. Were it not that the German Army was more perfect and more potent than either the French or Russian Army, were it not that every German officer was convinced that the German military machine was superior to all its rivals, there would have been no war, whatever emperors, diplomatists, or statesmen said, thought, or intended." (See Cleveland Press, January 6, 1923.)

This is only a part of the whole truth, but, nevertheless, it is truth. "No one at the head of affairs quite meant war." The "nominal rulers," those "terror-stricken dummies," could not of their own will make war. Emperors, diplomatists, and statesmen were unable to prevent war. "The relentless driving onward of the military organizations behind these terror-stricken dummies" forced the war ahead. Lloyd George is correct; the history of Europe upholds his contention. The military organizations of Europe were the instrumentalities by which the World War was started.

While the statements of Lloyd George cover only a part of the whole truth, yet they contain the most staggering admission of the appallingly emasculated condition of each and every civil government of each and every country in Europe. This staggering admission should challenge the attention of every thinking man and woman. Humanity believed that the crowned or elected rulers in Europe were the real rulers and that the duly constituted governments of the European countries were the real governing instrumentalities in the respective countries. On paper they made war, and on paper they attempted to make peace. But now Lloyd George admits that the rulers—and why not the governments?—were merely "nominal" and "terror-stricken dummies." "Whatever emperors, diplomatists, or statesmen said, thought, or intended," the World War had to come. The World War was made outside of the duly constituted governmental circles of Europe.

In addition to the statements of Lloyd George, we now have the statements and admissions of certain heads of the military organizations of England, France, and even of the United States of America. In these statements and admissions we see that while the Emperors, Kings, Presidents, diplomatists, and statesmen may have been thoroughly ignorant of the gigantic preparation for the World War, certain leaders of the military organizations were alert and ready for the conflict.

Marshal Foch, of France, in a letter at a banquet given after Easter, 1919, by the members of the English House of Parliament in honor of Sir Henry Wilson, chief of imperial staff (England), said:

"Long before the war, General Wilson (England) and I (France) worked together to prepare for the struggle." (See New York Tribune, April 9, 1919.)

Lord Haldane, former Minister of War of England, testifying before the coal commission, said: "Everything had been prepared long before" the war. (Quoted in issues of Today, January 14, 1922.)

Lord French, the British field marshal, says in his book (1919):

"It was not within the knowledge of all that the general staff of Great Britain and France had for a long time held conferences and that a complete mutual understanding as to combined action in certain eventualities existed." (Quoted ibid.)

Admiral Sims, of the United States Navy, has also come forward with his confessional statement. He says:

"In December 1910 [4 years before the war broke out] I submitted a secret report to the admiral of my fleet. I explained that it had been typewritten by me and that no other human eye had seen it. I stated that the concensus of opinion among the British officers and officials of European nations with whom I had conferred was that war could not be delayed more than 4 years. I said this in that report and added that Britain and France would be in that war and that we would be in that war and that we would enter shortly thereafter." (Quoted ibid.)

The situation, then, was that the duly constituted governments in European countries did know that Europe was getting dangerously near a terrible war, while the military organizations were preparing feverishly for that very war. In this country we were blissfully lingering in the chimerical hope that we would not get into the war. We sent Woodrow Wilson back to the White House with an unprecedented majority in the belief that "he kept us out of war." Yet Admiral Sims, of the United States Navy, knew in 1910—4 years before the war broke out—that the war was coming and "we would enter shortly thereafter." Admiral Sims knew that England and France "would be in that war." And, as if to confirm Admiral Sims, Vice President Marshall, in a letter to E. G. Hoffman, secretary of the Democratic National Committee, at Fort Wayne, Ind., said:

"We were in the war from the very moment of its European beginning." (Quoted in Issues of Today, January 14, 1922.)

It is interesting to note that while the foregoing information was in the possession of some of the military leaders of this country, and same being during the Presidency of Woodrow Wilson, on October 26, 1916—6 years after Admiral Sims made his secret report—Woodrow Wilson made the following confession of ignorance concerning the war:

"Have you ever heard what started the present war? If you have, I wish you would publish it, because nobody else has. So far as I can gather, nothing in particular started it, but everything in general." (Speech in Cincinnati, October 26, 1916.)

It is evident to any open and unprejudiced mind that no people of no particular country wanted, caused, or started the World War. It is clear that the "nominal rulers," the "terror-stricken dummies," the emasculated diplomatists, and statesmen were unable to prevent the outbreak of the World War. It has been seen that the military organizations of all the warring countries were active in preparing for the World War, "whatever emperors, kings, diplomatists, or statesmen said, thought, or intended." But the military organizations were merely instrumentalities, effective tools in the hands of some heretofore unmentioned and unseen power. If, therefore, we can throw back the curtains, we shall find the culprit hiding behind the scene, and the hideous monster will come into full light.

We now summon to our aid the history of Europe. What the statesmen refused to disclose the history of Europe will reveal.

The Congress of Vienna in 1815 had divided Europe and bartered millions of human beings to the crowned and absolute monarchs of Europe. A storm of bitter protest was heard in every corner of Europe. It took about 50 years for the peoples of Europe, and after much privation, starvation, and bloodshed, to correct the evils committed by the Congress of Vienna. Germany was consolidated and Italy was unified. The industries of Germany were booming, and the territory of Germany became too small to absorb her own industrial products. An outside market was sought. In her quest for an outside market Germany found England disputing every inch of ground traveled by Germany. Thus a bloodless "trade war" was started.

Germany's only entrance into the Atlantic Ocean was through the English Channel. Passage of German ships through the channel was possible only by the consent of England. This being clear enough, England and Germany began to build battleships in theretofore unheard-of proportions. But it was soon discovered that battleships will not secure to Germany the freedom of the seas and the free and unmolested movement of German international trade. Therefore, Germany conceived the plan of building the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad, leading from Berlin to Austria-Hungary, across the Balkans, into Turkey, through Turkey, and ending at Baghdad, Asia. Through this railroad Germany could reach the largest portion of the world's population and transact most of the international commerce of the world without the interference of England. That is to say, whoever would have controlled the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad would have controlled the greatest bulk of the international commerce of the world.

But the control and successful operation of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad necessitated the control of the territories through which it passed. Therefore the plan of "Mittel Europa" was conceived. Germany, Austria-Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey were to be controlled by the owners of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad. The "Pan German movement" and the shibboleth of "Deutschland Ueber Alles" and all other idiotic utterances were the offshoot of this plan. The "integrity" of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy was indispensable, and therefore Hungary was forced into the absolute control of the Austrian Empire.

While the plan of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad was being made, a strong Russian movement got on foot. On paper it was called the "Pan Slavic movement." What it was will appear presently.

Russia, a great, big, and very rich country, had no ice-free outlet to high seas. The Baltic Sea is frozen during the greater part of the year. The Black Sea is an inland water and its only outlet to the Mediterranean Sea is at Constantinople. To secure this outlet, Russia would have to control Constantinople, the Dardanelles, and a part of the Balkans. In 1877 Russia made an effort to obtain control of this outlet and declared war upon Turkey under the still popular pretext that the Turks had "mistreated the Christians" in the Balkans. Turkey was defeated, the "Christians" were forgotten; but Constantinople was seized by Russia. England, however, interfered (the British Government always like the "Christians") and, in unison with Germany and Austria, blocked the Russian plan of obtaining an ice-free outlet into the high seas. This act caused Russia to become the sworn enemy of Germany, Austria, and England. By way of parentheses it might be stated that at the time of this writing (January 19, 1923) the "Near East Conference" is still grappling with the question of the control of Constantinople and of the Dardanelles, and this not because of any special love for the "Christians" either. At this time that sublime love is for oil. England was facing the plan of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad and also the Russian plan to reach the high seas. That is to say, England was in grave danger of losing her control of the international commerce of the world. If, however, Germany could be "isolated," the danger would pass away, at least for the time being. England was the master of building "coalitions" and had the money to act as "pay mistress of her allies." But at that time she had no particular friend in Europe. France was not in love with her and Russia hated her. But her differences with France were patched up and the two countries, in 1904, entered into the Entente Cordiale. But Germany also formed the Triple Alliance, consisting of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy. To this combination the Entente Cordiale was no match. Therefore, England induced Russia to join the Entente Cordiale and thus the Triple Entente was formed, composed of England, France, and Russia.

Russia's entry into the Triple Entente was obtained by reason of the fact that the plan of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad crossed the Russian plan of reaching an outlet to the Mediterranean Sea. The Berlin-Baghdad Railroad was to cross the Turkish channels at Constantinople, where Russia planned to reach the Mediterranean Sea. Thus, with the help of Russia, England could effectively block the development and completion of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad.

Here we have a complete picture of the European situation. If you take a map of Europe and draw a line from the Black Sea, in the middle of the Turkish channels at Constantinople, into the Mediterranean Sea, and indicate across that line the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad, you will find, at the intersection of the two lines, the very spot for the control of which millions of human beings have been slaughtered and, finally, Europe was wrecked. It is around that little point that the supreme love of the English Government for the "Christians" is even now centered. It is that little spot for which our own Wall Street has an unbounded love and affection.

From 1907 and 1914 Europe was divided into two powerful camps, the Triple Entente, guarding the interests of England, and the Triple Alliance, guarding the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad project. Both camps armed themselves to the teeth. The poisoned pen was put to work and a virulent propaganda, creating a bitter international hatred, was put into operation. England, France, Germany, and Russia were alike in this respect The minds of their people were poisoned and saturated in the virulent poison of international hatred.

While the subsidized press of each of these countries were feeding their poison of international hatred to their readers, while the uniformed imbeciles and paid propagandists of these countries were shouting for war, two rulers, the Emperor of Germany and the Czar of Russia, quietly sat down at a lunch table at Potsdam in November 1910 and earnestly discussed the ways and means to avert war. There, at the lunch table, undisturbed by the howlings of the war maniacs, those two rulers worked out among themselves a just basis for a peaceful existence of both countries. Germany was to acknowledge a controlling position of Russia in Persia and therewith an outlet for Russia to the high seas through Persia; and Russia was to withdraw her opposition to the German plan of building the Berlin-Baghdad Railway. (See E. R. Turner's Europe Since 1870, p. 409.)

This is history, and this incident is of great historical import. Civilized mankind might ponder over it with great moral benefit. If two rulers, who, by the consent of their people, are the accepted and acknowledged rulers of two great countries, can settle a vexatious international question in a peaceful hour at a simple lunch table—if this can be done, why fight a terrible war which accomplishes nothing; why kill millions of human beings without any visible benefit to any people on this earth; why hurl the world into chaos and millions of people into untold sufferings?

But a friendly relation between Germany and Russia, the completion of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad, and Russia's control of Persia would have sounded the doom of England as the undisputed master of international commerce. Therefore the agreement of the Emperor of Germany and of the Czar of Russia not to fight and not to commit suicide was frustrated. In France a well-planned propaganda of "a revival of courage and assurance and great rebirth of national feeling" was started. In Great Britain "there was each year more vivid apprehension of possible danger from the greatness of the German Empire, resolution to be under perpetual guard, and determination under no circumstances ever again to let France alone confront German aggression or suffer her to be crushed." (See Turner's Europe Since 1870, p. 410.) How the English people at once became enamored with the French people!

Not so much in order to give full evidence of England's love for France but to precipitate a general European war, the "Morroco crisis" was trumped up. This was in 1911; we are getting close to the fateful hour.

The "Morocco crisis" was this: In 1906 England, France, and Germany signed an agreement wherein France and Spain were authorized jointly to preserve order in Morocco. France was permitted to occupy certain towns to maintain order. That was an international agreement, and it was supposed to be respected by France and Spain. But, international agreement or no agreement, "under the pretext of policing the distracted country," France pushed an armed force farther and farther into Morocco, so that it became evident that Morocco would be reduced to a French possession. That act was committed in order to afford Germany a bait to start a rumpus. Germany took the bait. On July 1, 1911, "without preliminary warning, it was announced that the German commercial interests in Morocco were being threatened, and that hence a German warship had been sent to the harbor of Agadir, on the Atlantic coast of Morocco, to protect them" (Turner's Europe Since 1870, p. 411).

The challenge was accepted by Germany. It looked as if the war had come. But the people of France and England did not want war yet. The "opportune time for war" had not arrived. But the invisible power (we shall discover it presently) tried its luck. "All the French Fleet was concentrated in the Mediterranean Sea, and Britain's great fleet was ready in the channel and in the North Sea" (ibid., p. 413).

The military organizations of all these three countries were ready to fight. The invisible power was ready to sacrifice the lives of millions of human beings. But the people refused to fight. Therefore, it was decreed that the "present opportunity for war" was "unfavorable." And, accordingly, there was no war.

This master stroke was not done by the crowned rulers, diplomatists, or statesmen of those countries, nor was it done by the military organizations of those countries. They were ready to fight. This is what happened, and it was as simply done as it is written here:

Germany by that time had worked up an immense home industry and also international commerce. She had carried on a vast amount of import and export trade. All these were built upon borrowed capital supplied mostly by French and English international financiers. That is to say, about 90 percent of Germany's business was done on credit given by French and English international financiers. (See G. R. Usher's Pan Germanism, p. 162; also Turner's Europe Since 1870, p. 415.)

In order to fight a war there had to be people who wanted war, an army and navy which were to do the fighting, and, finally, money which was to keep up the war. France and England had the army, navy, and the money, but no people who wanted war. Germany had all the requirements. But the English and French international financiers began their "financial mobilization," in that they quietly began recalling their loans from Germany. And the German financiers just as quietly began to ship their gold to France and to England. When the German Kaiser called together the German financiers and announced to them that there was to be a war and asked them to prepare Germany's finances for war, the German financiers gently informed the Kaiser that there could be no war, because the German gold was shipped to France and England. That settled the question of war.

It is here, then, where the curtain is rolled back and for the first time the international financiers are discovered in their true role. They did not recognize the "opportunity" for war to be "favorable," and there was no war. The German Emperor, the navy of England, the navy of France, and the statesmen and diplomats of those countries were ready for war. The reasonable conclusion, therefore, is that the question of war or no war depended upon and was decided by the international financiers.

The inevitable outbreak of war was, however, merely deferred to a more "favorable opportunity." The agitation for war in every country continued with increased vehemence. Serbia was made a hotbed of virulent propaganda. The Triple Entente, through Russia, was pouring money lavishly into Serbia for propaganda purposes. The Serbian propagandists invaded Austria and Hungary and created disturbances there. The lives and property of Hungarian officials were endangered. International hatred was worked up to the highest pitch. War was in the air. War had to come. Only a good pretext for war had to be found.

In 1912–13 another attempt was made to "feel out" the people and to test the time as to whether it was "favorable" for war. The Balkan War broke out. Russia and Austria mobilized. But the opportunity was "not favorable" for a general European war, and there was no general European war.

But the agitation for war was still continued. Each nation armed itself to the teeth. The people of every country were groaning under the weight of the heavy armament. The invisible power continued with renewed energy the preparation of the mind of the people for war. This propaganda assumed such an enormous proportion that Lord Welby, formerly the head of the English Treasury, alarmingly exclaimed: "We are in the hands of an organization of crooks. These are politicians, generals, manufacturers of armaments, and journalists." (Quoted in F. Neilson's How Diplomats Make War, p. 328.)

The drive to create the pretext for war was now concentrated in Serbia. The foci of trouble were recognized again at the intersection of the German and Russian plans. The war had to be fought, if not in the Balkans, around the Balkans and near the foci of England's infectious point, the crossing of the Turkish channels by the Germans. To force the issue, Hungary was terrorized by the Serbian propagandists who were in the employ of Russia and indirectly in the employ of the Triple Entente. Finally, the directors of the propaganda resorted to plain murder. Two demented Serbian young students were carefully trained by Serbian officials and supplied with weapons of murder from the arsenals of Serbia and then sent out on their murderous journey. On June 28, 1914, these two young imbeciles assassinated the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, together with his wife at his side. Thus, by a carefully planned murder, the fuze was lit and the great conflagration was started. A pretext for war was created.

The plan of murder was so hatched in Serbia. The authors of the murder, it is so claimed by John Bull, were paid from London in the sum of £2,000 and £200 for expenses. The payment was made directly by the secret service attached to the Serbian Legation stationed at London. In proof of this statement, John Bull, an English publication, printed a letter written on the official sheet of the Serbian Legation at London, which, decoded, dated April 5, 1914, is as follows:

"For the elimination of F. F. (Francis Ferdinand) the sum of £2,000 sterling, paid as follows: £1,000 on your arrival in Belgrade (capital of Serbia) by the hands of Mr. G. and the rest of £1,000 on finishing the work paid as above. The sum of £200 for expenses and to pay agents, etc. (See John Bull, July 11, 1914. Reproduced in the American Monthly, June 1922.)

The fuze was lit. The international financiers did not start their "financial mobilization" to avert the war. The "favorable opportunity" for war had arrived. The German Emperor frantically sent his telegrams after telegrams to the Russian Czar asking that he should avert war.

The Russian Czar just as frantically replied and asked that the Germany Kaiser should block the war. The English and French statesmen kept the wires hot, appealing to all concerned to avert the war. But the war had to come. As Lloyd George has said, the "terror stricken dummies" could not stop the war. "Whatever emperors, kings, diplomatists, or statesmen said, thought, or intended," there had to be a war. The uncrowned and invisible rulers of Europe decreed that there should be war and there was war.

We repeat, and respectfully submit, that in view of the foregoing facts, it is clearly established that Hungary did not cause and did not bring about the last World War. The responsibility for the last World War rests solely upon the shoulders of international financiers. It is they upon whose head the blood of millions of dead and millions of dying rests.

THE PURPOSES IN THE WORLD WAR

We have seen that the underlying cause of the last World War was the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad. Closely connected to that railroad was the danger of the international financiers, under the protection of the Triple Entente, losing control of Europe's international commerce and finance. It follows, therefore, that the main purpose in the war was to prevent the completion of the Berlin-Baghdad Railroad. The other purposes were to make money. There appears not one single purpose throughout that whole war to make the world "safe for democracy."

The Treaty of London, entered into by the Entente Powers on April 26, 1915, shows definitely the main purpose of the World War. In that treaty Europe and a part of Asia were divided and distributed among England, France, Italy, Rumania, Russia, Serbia, and Montenegro, as follows:

England was to receive: (1) The neutral zones of Persia; (2) southern Mesopotamia and Baghdad; (3) Haifa and Akka in Suria; (4) a portion of the German colonies.

France was to receive: (1) Syria; (2) the vilayet of Adna and other extended territories in Asia Minor, including a part of the Armenian border, where are the oil fields of Mosul; (3) Alsace-Lorraine and the Saar Valley, with all the mining district and the whole of the old dutchy of Lorraine; (4) temporary occupation of the left bank of the Rhine, with permission to make a buffer state and fix such boundaries as she pleased; (5) a part of the German colonies.

Italy was to receive: (1) The Trentino; (2) the county of Corizia and Gradisca; (3) Triest and Istria; (4) a generous share of the Dalmatian coasts; (5) the island of the Istrians and Dalmation coasts; (6) Valona and its neighborhood; (7) the islands of the Dodecanese; (8) Smyrna and its hinterland (later this was changed to Adalian and a part of Asia Minor); (9) new colonial territories in compensation for the German colonies which Great Britain and France should receive.

Rumania was to receive from the territory of Hungary: (1) Transylvania up to the River Tisza; (2) the Banat of Temesvar; (3) the Bukovina.

Russia was to receive: (1) Constantinople and nearly the whole of Turkey in Europe; (2) the Bosporus, the Dardanelles, and the Sea of Marmora; (3) the islands of Imbors and Tenedos in the Aegean, at the mouth of the Dardanelles; (4) full liberty of action in Persia, including Ispahan and Yezd; (5) Trebizond, Erzerum, Van Bitlis, and other territories in Asia Minor; (6) a free hand in making the Russian western boundaries.

Serbia and Montenegro were to receive: (1) The south coasts of Dalmatia; (2) Spalato, Ragusa, Cattaro, and St. John of Medusa in Albania; (3) the eventual annexation of North Albania. (See J. J. Bass' The Peace Tangle, pp. 13–14.)

This wholesale distribution of countries and peoples was kept secretly away from the knowledge of the peoples of the Entente. Even Woodrow Wilson claimed that when he proclaimed that the American people were fighting to make the world "safe for democracy" he did not know the existence of the secret treaty of London and the distribution of Europe and a part of Asia. But, while the peoples of the Triple Entente were kept ignorant of this secret distribution and war aim, the language of that treaty was smuggled to the peoples of the Triple Alliance and there published broadcast to stir up the fighting spirit of the Germans and their allies.

"Carefully hidden from the peoples of the Entente, the secret treaties were published and discussed far and wide in the Central Empire. They were used by Pan Germans and militarists to revive the energy of the people in the hours of depression. Whenever the peace party in Germany seemed to be gaining ground, or whenever the people showed lassitude, the militarists brandished these treaties and with them rallied the public opinion to their support. They could use the secret treaties to show with apparent finality that they were fighting a war of self-defense against the imperialists who desired the dismemberment and destruction of Germany and her allies." (Bass' The Peace Tangle, pp. 21–22.)

Were there only one single purpose in the World War, namely, the defeat of Germany, the division of Europe and a part of Asia, and to secure for the Entente financiers the absolute control of international commerce and finance, the war could not and would not have lasted longer than 6 months. But the invisible power wanted more. It wanted to make money—even at the sacrifice of millions of lives and even at the risk of throwing civilization into economic and moral bankruptcy.

The question of the duration of the World War hinged upon the ability of Germany to obtain sufficient iron ore from which ammunition was manufactured. In May 1915, in a confidential report, the six great industrial and agricultural associations of Germany, Chancelor Bethman-Hollweg was advised that "if the production of the Lorraine ore was disturbed, the war would be practically lost." Engerand, a member of the French House of Deputies, says that the German metallurgists had frequently declared that if the German ore mines were attacked by the French Army "the war would have been finished in 6 months with the defeat of Germany." (See C. K. Streit's Where Iron Is, There Is the Fatherland, pp. 4 and 33.)

In a heated debate in the French House of Deputies, after an investigation conducted by that lawmaking body, it came out that the duration of the war was in the control of a few international families. These families controlled most of the raw materials used in the manufacture of ammunition. They controlled most of the factories manufacturing ammunition. It appears further that they controlled both the civil governments and the military organizations of at least Germany and France. Some of the most notable of these families are the Vendel family, the Thyssen family, the Krupp family, and, above them all, the famous international family of the Rothschilds, who are Jews by religion and barons of England, Germany, France, and Austria by business. These ubiquitous families are so interspersed in the various countries that in some of the countries they have native-born citizens; in other countries they have naturalized citizens. Some of these citizens were found to be members of the governments of some of the warring countries.

The principal iron mines, smelters, and coal mines of Germany and France were immediately on both sides of the pre-war political boundary line separating the two countries in the Lorraine section. On the French side there is a very extensive iron-ore land, known as the basin of Briey. In the same region there is an extensive coal field, known as the basin of Bruay. These iron fields, iron mines, smelters, and coal mines were before and during the World War the property of a few international families and a few international corporations. The De Vendel family owned in one property about 25,000 acres of iron land, one half of which was in German territory and the other half in French territory. In another property, in the French basin, the De Vendel family, with the Creusot interest—the Krupps of France—owned 8 blast furnaces and also iron mines producing 1,000,000 tons of iron yearly. On the German side the De Vendel family owned mining concessions at Meyeurre and Hayange, producing 3,000,000 tons of iron yearly, also blast furnaces and smelters near these mines. In all, the De Vendel family controlled about 200,000 acres of iron land in that section. The Germans owned 18 mineral concessions in the Briey and Lonway Basin and a few more in Normandy. The Thyssens controlled the mines of Bailly, Jouville, and Souligny. The mines of Moutiers were controlled by an international group, the stocks being divided as follows: French, 100; German, 70; and Belgian, 10. The German "Phonix" group—Hasper and Koesch—controlled the French mines at Jarny and Saucy. The Gelsenkirchner owned in France the mines of St. Pierrmont, Sevey, Hout-Lay, St. Jean, Sainte-Barbe, Crusone, and Vallerupt. Other German ironmasters owned the mines of Murville and Valleroy. All of these concessions were in the basin of Briey, with the exception of Saucy, Crusno, and Vallerupt. (See C. K. Streit's Where Iron Is, There Is the Fatherland, pp. 4, 9, 10.)

One day before the war was declared the German Army proceeded to and did seize the French basin of Briey. The French Government immediately ordered the French troops to withdraw 8 miles from that section. Thus the Germans occupied that important iron territory without any resistance (ibid., p. 35).

The front at the basin of Briey was quiet during the war. It is said that not one single man was killed there until the American Army began its drive against the Germans (ibid., p. 1).

The reason for this is obvious. In the basin of Briey, about 25 miles behind the front, was the most important iron field from which the Germans mined a very large proportion of the iron used by them during the war. The German smelters were there, working at full blast day and night, preparing iron for ammunition destined to kill the French soldiers and other enemies. In the basin of Bruay, about 15 miles behind the front, were the most important French coal mines, which were worked day and night, so that the French may have enough coal to treat their iron, from which ammunition was manufactured to kill the Germans and other foes. In the French section of the basin of Briey alone, according to the statement made on the floor of the French Chamber of Deputies by Mr. Laucheur, a French munition maker, minister of munitions, and minister of industrial reorganization, the Germans mined 14,000,000 tons of iron during the war (ibid., p. 4). At the same time the French mined 28,000 tons of coal daily in the basin of Bruay in the Department of Pas-de-Calais, only 10 to 12 miles behind the Briey front (ibid., p. 42). How could the Germans mine their 14,000,000 tons of iron 25 miles behind the front, and how could the Krupps manufacture ammunition from that iron with which the French soldiers were killed by the millions if the French had bombarded those mines and disturbed the peaceful operation of same as well as the peaceful operation of the smelters? Likewise, how could the French mine their 28,000 tons of coal per day if the Germans had recklessly and discourteously bombarded those mines 10 to 12 miles behind the French line?

The principal business of the international owners of these mines was to make money during the war. If the Germans had been dislodged from the iron fields in the basin of Briey, according to the German metallurgists, "the war would have been finished in 6 months with the defeat of Germany" (ibid., p. 33). But if the war had come to a conclusion so suddenly, those international interests could not make their millions, the Krupps could not manufacture so much ammunition, and there would have been left a few millions of men alive. During the war, however, business was business. Both the German, French, English, and Belgian international families and international corporations were bent upon making money. What did they care about life, liberty, and happiness? They wanted money, and the war had to go on. And it did—without the bombardment of the precious holdings of iron and coal.

The enormity of this situation was pointed out by Gustav Tery, the editor of L'Ouevre, of Paris, on May 22, 1917. He declared that in the minutes of the general meeting held on March 14, 1916, by the blast furnace and steel mill corporation of Caen, which minutes were originally published in the financial L'Information, March 18, 1916, "it is specified that the Thyssen (German branch of the family) interests are carefully preserved in the new organization. It is understood that a part of the profits realized by this company in the making of war munitions (for France) will be put aside for the Thyssen (German) group, and that after the war automatically and legally the Messrs. Thyssen will receive this large sum. And it is certain that those same Thyssens work also for war in Germany. These interesting metallurgists receive their profits, then, with both hands; that is, from both sides of the frontier, from furnishing material to Germany and France. If money has no odor, steel has no fatherland" (ibid., p. 19).

In the Briey investigation conducted by the French Chamber of Deputies it was revealed that at the time the war broke out the iron mines, coal mines, and steel mills of both France and Germany in the Briey Basin were controlled by powerful trusts and interlocking directorates, the Germans owning mines in France and the French owning mineral properties in Germany, "the industrial magnates working in more or less close harmony" (ibid., pp. 13 and 26).

The industrial magnates were well represented in the French war Government. Francois de Vendel was a Deputy in the Chamber of Deputies. His brother, Humbert de Vendel, a member of the committee of forges (Steel Trust of France), was the single purchasing agent at London. General de la Panouze, the brother-in-law of Mr. Vendel, was the military attaché at London, and he surpervised the purchases of Mr. Vendel. Captain Esbrayat, director of the Damachy Bank, was the secretary of the commission of woods and metals—in the Ministry of Munitions. A Mr. Goldsberger (a Frenchmen), son of an industrial magnate of Berlin, was the director of the (French) bureau of importation. Mr. Laucheur, a munitions maker, was the Minister of Munitions (ibid. p. 24). Another Frenchman, Max Hoschiller, was employed as a propagandist to show that Germany was not in need of the 14,000,000 tons of iron mined during the war in the Basin of Briey. Thus the interests of the international families and of the international corporations and of the international industrial magnates were well and fully protected on both sides of the front.

It need not be argued that it would have been the human as well as the national interest of the French people to have the Germans driven out of the Basin of Briey and thus reestablish peace within 6 months from the beginning of the World War. Indeed, General Sarrail, of France, reasoned somewhat in this direction, he being not initiated into the mysteries of the war. In 1914 he projected an offensive that would have given the French possession of the Briey Basin if successful. He was told by the French general staff that it was too difficult to maneuver in that district, although the Germans found no difficulty in advancing there 14 kilometers in 2 days. To assure the tranquillity of the iron mines held by the Germans, the patriotic and uninitiated General Sarrail was removed from the command of that front and was replaced by the more complaisant General Gerard. What discourtesy it would have been to disturb or, worse, to dislodge the Germans from the peaceful mining of the French iron! "It is only for the poor devils that war is not a gentleman's agreement." (Pierre Renaudel, member, French Chamber of Deputies, quoted in "Where Iron Is, There Is the Fatherland," pp. 37 and 45.)

Finally, in 1917, it was decided to bomb the iron industries of Germany and thus end the war quickly. Even the French grand general staff approved of the plan. The plan was drawn up under the direction of Lieutenant Lejune, who was to command the bombing operation against the Briey Basin. But the bombing expedition was never started. When the reason for the delay was investigated it was found that Lieutenant Lejune, although a soldier, was in the employ of the French Steel Trust (ibid., p. 41).

The foregoing facts are cited to support the statement of Lloyd George and to bring the truth to light that, regardless of what "emperors, kings, diplomatists, and statesmen said, thought, or intended," the war had to come, and that the military organizations of the principal warring countries were in the control not of the civil government but in the control of the industrial magnates, international families, and international companies. These facts show further that the Hungarian Nation was nowhere involved in the question as to how long the war should last or with what intensity it should be fought. In truth, these facts show that no people of any country had any say as to the starting or continuation of the war. The military organizations were in the hands of the international financiers, who had the final say as to how long and with what intensity and on what fronts the war had to be fought.

This almost unbelievable situation was recognized by members of the French Chamber of Deputies. From the tribune of that chamber Deputy Barthe, on January 24, 1919, solemnly declared:

"I affirm that either by the fact of the international solidarity of the great metallurgy companies or in order to safeguard private business interests our military chiefs were ordered not to bombard the establishments of the Briey Basin, which were being exploited by the enemy during the war. I affirm that our aviation service received instructions to respect the blast furnaces in which the enemy steel was being made, and that the general who wished to bombard them was reprimanded." (Quoted ibid. p. 46.)

Senator Gaudin de Villaine, a conservative member of the French Senate, quoting from the French Yellow Book, that "fabricants of cannon and armor plate; great merchants, who demand the greatest markets; banks, who speculate on the age of gold and on the next indemnity, think that the war should be good business," continues:

"I formally accuse the big cosmopolitan banks—at least, the owners of mining rights—of having conceived, prepared, and let loose this horrible tragedy (the World War) with the monstrous thought of world stock jobbing. I accuse these same money powers of having, before and since the war, betrayed the interest of France." (Quoted ibid. pp. 46 and 48.)

These are hard, definite, and pungent words. They were spoken by duly elected representatives of the French people. Their intention was to bring the truth to light and to fix the responsibilities for the war upon those who are actually responsible. All the reliable evidence and all the testimony of responsible men point to the fact that the international, industrial, and financial magnates stand convicted before the bar of civilization as the responsible parties for causing and continuing the last World War.

It should be clear from this that the World War was financed and prolonged by the financial interests of the major powers on both sides. There is further evidence to show that our Government was aware of that impending conflict, yet no information was given out to the public to acquaint them with the real cause of the World War.

Our so-called free press, which is supposed to speak in the interest of the people, was in reality employed by its owners—the invisible government—to disseminate poison of hatreds toward the Central Powers or the Triple Alliance. Do not forget, however, that the owners of the press were the same powers that instigated and prolonged the World War; and Lord Welby was correct when he said: "We are in the hands of an organization of crooks. These are politicians, generals, manufacturers of armaments, and journalists."

Mr. Speaker, we are in the hands of the same international exploiters today. They own and control the world's gold and credit. They own and control nearly all sources of publicity, our movies, our larger broadcasting stations, our daily press, and news distribution agencies. There is today no opportunity to place real facts before the people except in the so-called patriotic periodicals which the Dies committee and the Department of Justice are trying to suppress.

The power of the invisible government is so great today that even the Government itself is involved in un-American propaganda favorable to the invisible government instead of for the benefit and enlightenment of our people.

The war which is now raging in Europe is a natural aftermath of the Treaty of Versailles, and I may say at this point that nothing else could be expected after taking into consideration those who were responsible for the drafting of that treaty.

I shall now quote from the Senate document so as to further enlighten the public:

The members of the peace conference were composed of the so-called big four and experts. The so-called big four were Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America; Lloyd George, Prime Minister of England; Signor Orlando, Prime Minister of Italy; and M. Clemenceau, Prime Minister of France. These men "were all surrounded by Jewish advisers," and these advisers "played a decisive part." (Prof. C. Sarole, of the University of Edinburg, Scotland, Current History Magazine, January 1923, p. 593.) "The big four were mere novices in international affairs; geography, ethnology, psychology, and political history was a sealed book to them. 'They were specialists in nothing.' Whether one contemplates them in the light of their public acts or through the prisms of gossip, the figures cut by the delegates of the great powers were pathetic. Giants in the parliamentary sphere, they shrank to the dimension of the dwarfs in the international. In matters of international politics they were helpless at sea." (Dillon's Inside Story of the Peace Conference, pp. 102–203. Dr. Dillon was a member of the English delegation to the peace conference.) Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State, and a plenipotentiary from the United States of America, admits that President Woodrow Wilson was stubborn, unprepared, yet "seldom consulted his experts." (Lansing's the Peace Negotiation, p. 107.) With reference to the territory of Hungary, Lloyd George was so ignorant that at one sitting he exclaimed, "Where is Transylvania"—comprising one-third of the territory of Hungary—"which is coveted by the Rumanians?"

The official interpreter of the peace conference was "M. Paul Mantoux, one of the most brilliant representatives of Jewry at the conference." (Dillon's Inside Story of the Peace Conference, p. 127.) How brilliant his translations were and what chaotic situation must have existed at the conference may be shown by the following example:

One of the delegates said, "My country, unfortunately, is situated in the midst of States which are anything but peace loving—in fact, the chief danger to the peace of Europe emanates from them." The "brilliant" translation was, "The country represented by Mr. X unhappily presents the greatest danger to the peace of Europe." (Ibid, p. 128.)

The peace conference finally reduced itself down to a scramble of international financiers. The financial part of the treaty was written by international financiers and a large part of this work was done by our own Mr. Bernard Baruch, a New York financier, who told the investigating committee of the United States Senate: "I probably had more power than perhaps any other man did in the war; doubtless that is true." This powerful man wrote the financial part of the Paris peace treaty.

If Mr. Baruch had the power he claimed when he appeared before the investigating committee of the United States Senate, he used it unwisely and unjustly. In looking over "Conférence—des Préliminaires de Paix—Composition et Fonctionnement" I find that Mr. Baruch is on four important committees, but as members on "Questions Financières" I find the following gentlemen: Mr. Albert Strauss, Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, Mr. Norman H. Davis, Capt. Jeremiah Smith, Jr., and Mr. George Whitney.

There are 130 pages in the peace conference report, each page filled with an impressive list of people from whom much was expected on the 1st of April 1919. But, like the day like the deed, the world was fooled, for the gentlemen in question lacked foresight.

The Treaty of Versailles was written to destroy the nations that were defeated in the World War. It is not an expression of statesmanship but is instead a vicious instrument, unjust and cruel to a people who were not in any sense responsible for the World War. It is only natural that an intelligent people resent coercion and restriction, and this they were forced to endure by partition of their own countries. The more aggressive countries are now engaged in retrieving their former possessions and for this no one can be blamed except those who drafted the Treaty of Versailles. It is time that the larger world powers and the invisible government learned that in living, they must also let others live.

The purpose of the quotations is to expose those who were guilty of bringing about the World War, and I hope this information will counteract any desire to enter into the present war. You will notice that it was not the civil governments or the citizens of the warring countries that were responsible, but it was instead, as history proves, the international financiers or the invisible government.

The international financiers and their associates were not satisfied with the stringent terms of the peace treaty, but true to their stripe, demanded the last pound of flesh. They willfully and deliberately brought about inflation in Germany by the withdrawal of gold and gold-secured currency. After the collapse of the German money, these financial tricksters returned to Germany with sound money from adjoining countries. With this gold currency, they bought German marks, and real estate, for less than 5 percent of its actual value. It is interesting to note the wide scope of this exploitation. I find in the New York Times, September 14, 1922, the following advertisement:

New issue, 600,000,000 German marks, divided into 60,000 common shares, par value 10,000 marks each. Application will be made to increase the common-share capital of this company.

United European Investors, Ltd. (incorporated under charter of the Dominion of Canada). President, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, vice president, Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland; vice president and chairman, executive committee, William Schall, William Schall & Co., bankers, New York; treasurer, August Scherer, 45 William Street, New York; secretary, A. R. Roberts, 7 Pine Street, New York.

Directors: Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt; Almet F. Jenks, New York; William Schall; Andrew Haydon, Ottawa, Canada.

Advisory board in Germany: Senator August Lattmann, former partner, G. Amsinck & Co., New York; Senator John von Berenberg Gossler, partner, John von Berenberg Gossler & Co., Hamburg; Alfred Arnthal, Hamburg.

Bankers and depositors: William Schall & Co., New York; Deutsche Bank, Hamburg; Norddeutsche Bank, Hamburg.

Transfer agents: The Bank of America, New York.

The purpose of this company is to exchange its shares for German marks held by American investors and to invest these marks in actual values in Germany. Carefully selected investments will be made in real estate, mortgages, securities, and participation in industrial and commercial enterprises.

The company's facilities and connections enable it to secure attractive and sound investments; the directors will take advantage of the present money stringency in Germany and of the purchasing power of the mark, which is far greater than is reflected by exchange quotations.

Mr. William Schall, chairman of the executive committee, was sent to Germany by the company on a special mission to make a careful survey of German economic conditions. Mr. Schall conferred with the leading German financial authorities, and with their assistance selected the German advisory committee.

According to a letter from the department of the Secretary of State of Canada, the United European Investors, Ltd., was incorporated by Dominion letters patent dated the 9th of May 1922, with head office situate at Ottawa, Ontario. It was dissolved by a certificate of surrender of charter issued under date of July 12, 1927.

This gives a comprehensive view of the extent to which Germany and its people were exploited by international brokers and bankers, in collusion with German and international banks. Let us not forget that inflation is usually a deliberate manipulation brought about by those who control international gold money and credit. It is a sort of a milking process which leaves the poor destitute and the rich wealthier.

To bring this point home, let us remember that we have had inflated currency since 1934, when the gold was withdrawn and gold securities repudiated by our own Government. It is also well to bear in mind that we are now using a commodity or unsecured dollar that may, like the German mark, collapse at any time. The gold which is now held by the United States Treasury may be withdrawn, as it was in Germany; and when such withdrawal takes place, disaster will face us as it has other nations. The question is, Would we, the American people, resent such exploitation by foreign financiers? I believe we would; and it was such a discovery that terminated in deportation of those who had brought disaster to Germany.

It is only natural that these same international bankers are resentful at having been discovered. They no doubt acquired, by fraud, possession of much valuable property and securities which were later repudiated by the German Government when discovery was made of the manner in which such property and possessions had been obtained. No doubt many of those who invested through the medium of the United European Investors, Ltd., are also disappointed. Yet it is only just retribution and certainly no reason why we should declare war in their behalf.

There is no rhyme or reason why the United States should declare war on any country in order to restore to the international financiers the power of world domination.

The World War, as you can well understand after having read these remarks, was fought to place the invisible government in complete control of international gold and credit. In this the invisible government was successful, only to be foiled by the subsequent attitude of the Central Powers. The question which we must soon decide is whether or not we should become involved in the present conflict, which is for no other purpose except to restore to the invisible government its waning power in Europe.

In order to accomplish this, and to shape our opinions favorable to taking sides in this conflict, we are now submerged in a mass of propaganda no different from that which was employed prior to our entrance in the World War. This propaganda would have us believe that world civilization is to be destroyed if we fail to participate in the conflict. This is stupid propaganda, because world civilization will be destroyed much more quickly if we join the conflict. I make this statement deliberately, for civilization cannot be saved by having civilized powers engage in mutual destruction. It should be evident to all that the present world strife has been brought about for no other purpose except to deplete and weaken the ranks of the higher civilized nations.

It occurs to me that we should take time out to consider the underlying causes of this world unrest. Is it not possible that the present conflict is a deliberate attempt engineered by the forces within the invisible government to bring about destruction so that it may survive at the expense of civilization? It is for this reason that I advocate that we return to the fundamental principles of our Government in order to protect ourselves and our civilization.

In pursuing such course, we do not lend ourselves to unintelligent destruction of life and property, but can, instead, engage ourselves in intelligent reconstruction of our own country. There is not one good reason why we should sacrifice the lives of our people by joining any power which is now or may become involved in war. I am inclined to believe that our Executive will find better uses for his energy and advice at home than he will in wasting them in directing other rulers who seem to be quite capable of taking care of their own affairs.

Our present neutrality legislation was enacted by the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Congresses. It was sponsored by the present administration, passed by the same majority in Congress, and signed by the President. If it was good then, it is good now. At any rate, we must adhere to those principles we advocated 4 years ago, for any change made at this time will, without question, involve the United States in the present European conflict. I am even willing to go a little further than that, by making this statement: Congress should impeach and remove from office anyone found guilty of bringing about causes that may involve the United States in the present war.

Foreign Wars and Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. KEY PITTMAN, OF NEVADA

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] last evening on the subject of proposed neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens of the radio audience of America, it is vitally important that you understand the attitude of your Congress toward foreign wars and the legislation that will be enacted by Congress at this special session. Numerous petitions and communications that have deluged Members of the Senate clearly demonstrate that these petitions are based either upon ignorance of the intent of Congress or are the result of vicious organized foreign propaganda. For instance, most of these communications contain similar demands such as "No cash and carry," "Don't repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war." Many of our citizens might even have been led to believe that it was the intention of the President to urge, and Congress to enact, a repeal of all neutrality legislation before the submission to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate the joint resolution proposed as a substitute for the House joint resolution, passed by the House at the last session of Congress. There exists now since the substitute proposal has been introduced, published in full in all of the great newspapers of the country and synopses of it in practically every paper of the United States, no reasonable excuse for any misunderstanding by any intelligent citizen of the United States or for the continuance of false propaganda.

It must now be evident from the message delivered by the President of the United States to the joint session of Congress on the 21st day of this month that the President is determined to use every power to keep this country out of a foreign war. It is evident from the plain language of that message that he willingly leaves to Congress the establishment of our policy and the form of legislation and that he will approve such legislation.

The proposed substitute joint resolution which I had the honor on behalf of the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate to propose as a substitute for the House legislation does not repeal our neutrality legislation. On the contrary, by mandatory provisions, it vitally strengthens our neutrality legislation. The strongest provision in the proposed substitute is the carry provision. It is new and it is mandatory. It has never existed in any other law. It is known as section 2 (a). It says: "Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 (a)"—meaning when he shall have issued a proclamation that a state of war exists—"it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any state named in such proclamation"—meaning by state any state that the President shall have proclaimed under section 1 (a) as being in a state of war. Now, what did the old cash-and-carry provision provide with regard to carry? It was found in section 2 (a)—and let us remember that this law expired by its own terms on May 1, 1939, and that there is now no law with regard to that subject. Section 2 (a) of the old law provided: "Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act"—meaning the proclamation that a state of war exists—"and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to belligerent states * * * is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful * * * for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent state * * *." It will be observed from a consideration of that language that absolute discretion was vested in the President as to whether he should permit our American ships to carry all kinds of articles and materials to a belligerent country, except arms, ammunition, and implements of war. He could permit our vessels to carry to belligerents scrap iron, steel, every kind of metal, oil, gasoline, cotton, and every other kind of raw material, because such materials are not described in existing law under the definition of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. These last-named articles were all described as contraband of war by the belligerents during the World War; that is, they were described as articles that would aid their enemy in the conduct of war and that, therefore, under international law, they could be confiscated or destroyed. The question as to whether they were going to the enemy or to a neutral the belligerent determined for itself, and there was no remedy during the existence of the war. Great Britain and Germany have already issued their contraband list for the present war. These lists are not limited to those few manufactured articles that we have defined as arms, ammunition, and implements of war; but they include the raw materials that the President now has the power to permit our vessels to carry to belligerents. From the actions of the German Government so far in the present war, it is conclusively evident that the German Government intends to pursue the same policy with regard to the submarining of neutral merchant vessels engaged in commerce with their enemy. I am satisfied that President Roosevelt would not permit American vessels to be destroyed with the consequent loss of the lives of our American seamen if carrying of any goods to belligerents would develop such results. However, section 2 (a) of the proposed substitute is intended to be a permanent law and to control every President that may ever be elected to office. What may be the sentiments, the prejudices, the soundness of judgment of future Presidents no one can know. Without regard, however, to these considerations, such vast and dangerous discretion is unnecessary and unwise.

It is urged that there were many contributory causes that led to our entry into the World War. Some contend that it was the result of extensive credits granted belligerents by citizens of the United States, while others allege that the munitions manufacturers inspired the sentiment that forced us into the war. I know that these alleged influences had no effect upon President Woodrow Wilson in asking for a declaration of war, or upon Congress in voting a declaration of war. I know from my knowledge of the sentiment of Congress at the time that we would not have entered the World War except for the establishment by Germany in February 1917 of its wide-flung war zone and the institution of unlimited submarine warfare, followed by the brutal taking of the lives of our American seamen on our merchant vessels. This zone extended way out to sea and covered practically all of the ports of Europe. It was impossible for any vessel to know when it had entered this zone. And yet in such proclamation Germany notified the world, including the United States, that it intended to sink without notice every vessel that entered that zone, whether neutral or not, whether engaged in trade with belligerents or with neutrals. This was contrary to all the precepts of international law that had been recognized for hundreds of years. Remember that at that time we had no neutrality legislation whatever, but were insisting upon our rights under international law. Between March 12 and April 2, 1917, when the President asked for the declaration of a state of war, 6 of our American merchant vessels were sunk with the loss of the lives of 63 of our American seamen. The patience of the American people was worn out. The patience of the President and of Congress ended. The Congress by an overwhelming vote declared that a state of war existed with Germany. If there lingers a doubt in the mind of any citizen as to the cause that forced us into the World War, let him read the able speeches that were made in Congress upon the war resolution. No more eloquent speech was made in favor of that resolution than was made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH. He based his vote for war, as is clearly shown in his great address, upon the destruction of the lives of our citizens upon the high seas in violation of our rights under international law. I cite this history because we hear and read remarks of Members of Congress and others outside of Congress asserting that President Roosevelt is leading us into the present war as they allege Woodrow Wilson led us into the World War. History challenges the statement that Woodrow Wilson led us into the World War. The circumstances, however, then existing and existing now are entirely different. Then we stood upon our rights on the high seas under the accepted precepts of international law. Today through the substitute joint resolution which I have offered in committee and which I know will be reported out by the Foreign Relations Committee, we intend to enact a law that will absolutely prohibit American vessels from engaging in any character of trade or commerce with belligerents. With regard to that provision, the President has no discretion or control. However, it may eventuate that some of the warring powers may proceed to submarine our vessels going to neutrals adjacent to their enemies on the grounds that the articles and materials going to such neutrals are moving into the enemy country. We cannot afford to lose the lives of our seamen for the consideration of this trade, even though under international law we would have a legal right to engage in such trade. We have granted to the President in such case the discretion from time to time to establish combat areas. In the event of such submarining, he would undoubtedly establish a combat area as to such adjacent neutral country. Remember that this authority is in addition to the absolute prohibition against American vessels so engaging in commerce with belligerents. If this law is enacted restricting the commerce of our American vessels that the lives of our seamen will be preserved, then no sufficient cause will exist to urge our Congress to permit this country to become involved in the European war.

And let us recall again that, under the Constitution, Congress, and Congress alone, has the power to declare war. Many of the polls that have been submitted in the country have asked the question, "Are you in favor of the repeal of neutrality laws?" Of course, very few are in favor of the repeal of the neutrality laws. The question itself conveys a wrong intimation of the issue. Congress has no intention of repealing the neutrality laws. The proposed substitute, which I believe will become law, greatly strengthens our neutrality law all along the line. It provides for the conveyance of title out of the American citizen to property that would be subject to destruction on the high seas. It thus eliminates this cause for controversy. I have already stated that it prevents our American vessels from carrying on any kind of trade or commerce with a belligerent. The proposed joint resolution further makes it unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of any belligerent named in the President's proclamation as being in a state of war. It absolutely prohibits our American vessels engaged in foreign commerce to be armed. It reenacts and makes more mandatory the financial provisions of existing law. It prohibits the solicitation and the collection of funds by or on behalf of warring powers. It restricts the use of our ports by submarines and as a base of supply for belligerent war vessels. It grants to the President the power to restrict the use of our ports not only as to submarines and other war vessels of belligerents but even to armed merchantmen of belligerents. It strengthens the control of the National Munitions Control Board over arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It provides that the American Red Cross, under safe conduct granted by the belligerent powers, may charter American vessels and carry officers and American Red Cross personnel, medical personnel, and medical supplies, food and clothing, for the relief of human suffering. This is the proper way to carry such articles and such aid to the noncombatants of belligerent countries.

May I call attention to the fact also that we have greatly increased the penalties for the violation of section 2 (a) with regard to American ships, with regard to transportation in and through combat areas, and with regard to financial transactions. We not only make the owner of the ship liable to the penalty but in the case of a corporation or association or partnership we make the officers and directors of such corporation, association, or partnership liable to such penalty.

In other words, we have put teeth in our proposed neutrality law.

The only legitimate issue left is as to whether we should repeal the section of existing law providing for the embargo upon arms, ammunition, and implements of war as defined in the act. Now, under the universally accepted principles of international law from time immemorial belligerents have been permitted to purchase any kinds of articles or materials in any neutral country and all neutral countries have recognized this principle and do now recognize it except the United States. The prohibition against the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war is the only departure from international law. The other provisions of existing law and of my proposed substitute are domestic legislation and not contrary to international law. We enacted the embargo law in the first place chiefly for the purpose of preventing the submarining of our American vessels. We should have known then, and we certainly know now, that belligerent governments will consider it just as important to prevent those other materials not defined in the embargo act from reaching their enemy as the defined arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It is the destruction of the vessel with American citizens on board rather than the destruction of the property that arouses a war spirit in the United States. So we do not protect the lives of our citizens by the embargo on a few manufactured materials so long as we permit other contraband material to be transported on American vessels to belligerents. It is urged by the proponents of the embargo act that to sell arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents is engaging in mass murder. Aren't we equally engaging in mass murder in Japan today by permitting to be shipped to Japan gasoline that runs their airplanes and scrap iron out of which they make their bombs with which to destroy the innocent population of China? Can anyone logically contend that oil and gasoline are not equally instruments of war with powder and other high explosives? And yet there is no prohibition against the export to any country, belligerent or not, of gasoline and scrap iron—in fact, of all the raw materials that I have named. It has been strenuously contended that to repeal the embargo would aid Great Britain and France because they are supposed to have control of the sea and because Germany has no way of getting such material into its country. But is this statement true now with regard to Germany? Russia may have been at war with Poland, although none of the belligerent powers have so declared. That war is practically over. Russia is not now at war with any country. None of the belligerents have declared that Russia is at war with any country. Under the embargo act Russia, not being at war, can legally import from the United States arms, ammunition, and implements of war as defined in the act. There is no law, either international or domestic, that prohibits Russia from retransporting these goods or substitutes therefor into Germany.

Russia has gold with which to buy such materials. Italy is not in a state of war with any country. Under our Embargo Act Italy may legally import arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States. There is no law, international or otherwise, which interferes with Italy's transporting such materials or substitutes for such materials into Germany. Ah, but it will be said that it is contrary to the embargo law to permit exports to a neutral country for reexport to a belligerent country. How can we determine these facts during war? It's impossible. But if we could determine these facts, what would there be to prevent Russia and Italy from retaining the arms, ammunition, and implements of war that we sent and sending into Germany arms, ammunition, and implements of war of their own manufacture? Is the President to declare that Russia is in a state of war so as to bring in force and effect the Embargo Act before Great Britain and France make such a declaration? It would probably be considered as a very unneutral and unfriendly act. Certainly no such declaration could be made with regard to Italy. Germany has an opportunity to obstruct on the high seas arms, ammunition, and implements of war imported by Great Britain and France. Great Britain and France have no opportunity to intercept arms, ammunition, and implements of war moving either from Russia or to Italy into Germany. But how about the small peaceful countries of the world? They have few factories for the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. They have depended upon international law to be able to purchase such material from neutral countries when war is brought to them. Is not the helplessness of the small, peaceful countries of Europe now apparent? This country cannot remain neutral so long as the Embargo Act remains on our statute books.

The Congress of the United States has no intention of permitting our country to become involved in that European war. The Congress of the United States intends to remove every cause that might impel it to declare war. If a belligerent country imposes upon us by conducting warfare in our coastal waters, we will repel such impositions. It's not necessary that we go any further. If by reason of these acts of safety upon the part of our Government any government were so foolish—and I do not believe any government would be foolish—as to declare war against us, it would not injure us but it would eventually destroy the government that made such declaration. Our strategy would not be to send our soldiers to fight abroad. We would conquer through our economic and financial power and through our indomitable Navy.

RADIO ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the notable address delivered by the President of the United States on the evening of September 3, 1939, following the outbreak of hostilities in Europe. The address was broadcast throughout the Nation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Tonight my single duty is to speak to the whole of America.

Until 4:30 this morning I had hoped against hope that some miracle would prevent a devastating war in Europe and bring to an end the invasion of Poland by Germany.

For 4 long years a succession of actual wars and constant crises have shaken the entire world and have threatened in each case to bring on the gigantic conflict which is today unhappily a fact.

It is right that I should recall to your minds the consistent and at times successful efforts of your Government in these crises to throw the full weight of the United States into the cause of peace. In spite of spreading wars I think that we have every right and every reason to maintain as a national policy the fundamental moralities, the teachings of religion, and the continuation of efforts to restore peace—for some day, though the time may be distant, we can be of even greater help to a crippled humanity.

It is right, too, to point out that the unfortunate events of these recent years have been based on the use of force or the threat of force. And it seems to me clear, even at the outbreak of this great war, that the influence of America should be consistent in seeking for humanity a final peace which will eliminate, as far as it is possible to do so, the continued use of force between nations.

It is, of course, impossible to predict the future. I have my constant stream of information from American representatives and other sources throughout the world. You, the people of this country, are receiving news through your radios and your newspapers at every hour of the day.

You are, I believe, the most enlightened and the best informed people in all the world at this moment. You are subjected to no censorship of news, and I want to add that your Government has no information which it has any thought of withholding from you.

At the same time, as I told my press conference on Friday, it is of the highest importance that the press and the radio use the utmost caution to discriminate between actual verified fact on the one hand, and mere rumor on the other.

I can add to that by saying that I hope the people of this country will also discriminate most carefully between news and rumor. Do not believe of necessity everything you hear or read. Check up on it first.

You must master at the outset a simple but unalterable fact in modern foreign relations. When peace has been broken anywhere, peace of all countries everywhere is in danger.

It is easy for you and me to shrug our shoulders and say that conflicts taking place thousands of miles from the continental United States; and, indeed, the whole American Hemisphere—do not seriously affect the Americas, and that all the United States has to do is to ignore them and go about our own business. Passionately though we may desire detachment, we are forced to realize that every word that comes through the air, every ship that sails the sea, every battle that is fought does affect the American future.

Let no man or woman thoughtlessly or falsely talk of America sending its armies to European fields. At this moment there is being prepared a proclamation of American neutrality. This would have been done even if there had been no neutrality statute on the books, for this proclamation is in accordance with international law and with American policy.

This will be followed by a proclamation required by the existing Neutrality Act. I trust that in the days to come our neutrality can be made a true neutrality.

It is of the utmost importance that the people of this country, with the best information in the world, think things through. The most dangerous enemies of American peace are those who, without well-rounded information on the whole broad subject of the past, the present, and the future, undertake to speak with authority, to talk in terms of glittering generalities, to give to the Nation assurances or prophecies which are of little present or future value.

I myself cannot and do not prophesy the course of events abroad, and the reason is that because I have of necessity such a complete picture of what is going on in every part of the world. I do not dare to do so. And the other reason is that I think it is honest for me to be honest with the people of the United States.

I cannot prophesy the immediate economic effect of this new war on our Nation, but I do say that no American has the moral right to profiteer at the expense either of his fellow citizens or of the men, women, and children who are living and dying in the midst of war in Europe.

Some things we do know. Most of us in the United States believe in spiritual values. Most of us, regardless of what church we belong to, believe in the spirit of the New Testament—a great teaching, which opposes itself to the use of force, of armed force, of marching armies and falling bombs. The overwhelming masses of our people seek peace—peace at home, and the kind of peace in other lands which will not jeopardize peace at home.

We have certain ideas and ideals of national safety and we must act to preserve that safety today and to preserve the safety of our children in future years.

That safety is and will be bound up with the safety of the Western Hemisphere and of the seas adjacent thereto. We seek to keep war from our firesides by keeping war from coming to the Americas. For that we have historic precedent that goes back to the days of the administration of President George Washington. It is serious enough and tragic enough to every American family in every State in the Union to live in a world that is torn by wars on other continents. Today they affect every American home. It is our national duty to use every effort to keep them out of the Americas.

And at this time let me make the simple plea that partisanship and selfishness be adjourned, and that national unity be the thought that underlies all others.

This Nation will remain a neutral nation, but I cannot ask that every American remain neutral in thought as well. Even a neutral has a right to take account of facts. Even a neutral cannot be asked to close his mind or his conscience.

I have said—not once, but many times—that I have seen war and that I hate war. I say that again and again.

I hope the United States will keep out of this war. I believe that it will. And I give you assurances that every effort of your Government will be directed toward that end.

As long as it remains within my power to prevent, there will be no black-out of peace in the United States.

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

LETTER BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter I have written in regard to the proposed Neutrality Act.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

DEAR FRIEND: West Virginians may be sure that I will not cast my vote in the Senate to take us into war either through the front or back door. No issue since I have been in public life affects me more deeply than this one we are now confronting. I have always been in favor of strict neutrality.

I have condemned and do condemn nazi-ism, fascism, communism and all other isms which run counter to Americanism. We must not let our prejudices, our dislikes, dictate a course that will take us into this conflict. As Colonel Lindbergh said: "We are likely to lose a million men, possibly several million—the best of American youth." He meant your sons, your friends, your neighbors.

To those who want us to take sides, I say, let them be sincere. They can offer their services to the country of their choice. Do not have them sit back in comfort and ask others to die in ghastly "No Man's Land." Let them go if they want to but do not let them try to force others. Be careful of those who want to help other nations but who will stay at home as $1-a-year men or who are ineligible to serve in the Army.

The President in his speech to Congress wants us to get profits from sales to the belligerents. He said:

"From a purely material point of view, what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here? Incidentally, and again from the material point of view, by such employment we automatically aid our own national defense."

Yet, in a speech at Chautauqua, N. Y., in August 1936, the President said:

"It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by the Congress would, in the event of a war on some other continent, reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens."

He now desires to repeal the very measure that reduced such war profits. The President continued:

"Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. It was the prospect of war profits that made our farmers in the West plow up prairie land that should never have been plowed, but should have been left for grazing cattle. Today we are reaping the harvest of those war profits in the dust storms which have devastated those war-plowed areas.

"It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed.

"Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

"They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

"It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear to look beyond—to realize that inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning, that comes from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

"If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.'"

What better argument against cash and carry? Build our prosperity on war! Build our prosperity on the dead, wounded, and shell-shocked youth of the world! They say we can make a profit. Profit for whom? Not for the boys who go into the trenches as cannon fodder for a dollar a day. You hear it said, "We can't stay out." Why? We can stay out. We can't if we are going to chase profits. The choice is clear—profits or peace. I cast my lot with those who want peace.

What does this profit mean? Profits for days, depressions for years. Fool's gold, the President said in 1936. Why is it different in 1939?

Let's have a strong national defense, powerful enough to protect us from all foes, but let's make our line of defense on the American hemisphere—not in Europe and Asia.

Cash and carry. Cash for whom? Not the average American but cash for a chosen few. The American boys will follow the American munitions into the trenches. We cannot afford to become international gun peddlers.

I, for one, will not cast my vote for a plan that means intervention in the quarrels and wars of Europe. I will not cast my vote for our entrance into this war, either through the front or back door.

Sincerely,

RUSH D. HOLT.

EDITORIAL FROM THE PARSONS (KANS.) SUN

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some editorial expressions from my own newspaper relating to the subject of Neutrality.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Parsons (Kans.) Sun of August 11, 1939]

KEEPING OUT OF WAR

If a Senator can judge from his mail, there are more people interested in "keeping the United States out of war" than any other question. At least I have received more letters and petitions upon that subject than any other.

Taken all together the opinions expressed make a queer collection, full of inconsistencies. Some of those who write earnestly urge that the Congress vote to keep the peace, but they want somebody to lick Hitler and/or Japan. So do I. I don't care who licks either or both of them, but I do not see how we can help do it and, at the same time, stay out of war. Or how we can take sides, even before a European conflict may break out and not finally be drawn into war.

We are part of the big world, of course. And the world is not so big as it used to be, from the viewpoint of communication, which has become instantaneous, and of transportation, which has been so quickened as to bring us close together. Maybe we just can't stay out of these wars and threats of wars, but at least I want to try to do so. If we could settle all the questions once and for all time by engaging in a war it might be worth while. At least we could consider the idea. We went into a great—the greatest of all wars, once to make the "world safe for democracy" and did nothing of the kind. So I'm reluctant to even edge into situations on the other sides of oceans and of the world. And that is just the effect that would come from following the suggestions of a majority of the letters a Senator receives—even if the writer did not desire it so. The trouble is that the writers do not follow through on the implications of their written words.

President Roosevelt had a quarrel with Congress about laws concerning neutrality, and at Hyde Park this week petulantly charged the Congress with toying with the fate of some billion and a half of people. Quite a lot. At least half the people of the world.

The trouble with our President is that he looks upon his own notions as final and indisputable. The Congress does not concede that. There were a dozen bills or resolutions introduced into the two Houses of Congress this last session. Finally, a joint resolution was prepared in the Department of State which reflected the Roosevelt administration policy. It was termed a "neutrality" measure. It was nothing of the kind. It was a "Presidential discretion" bill. As the Christian Science Monitor (incidentally about the fairest, ablest, and most impartial commentator on domestic and world politics) accurately stated, "that anyone who waded through the Bloom resolution (and the writer did) came out with the feeling that it was a measure intended to give whomever was President virtually unlimited discretion in the conduct of foreign affairs during a period of war in foreign countries." The so-called Bloom bill, written in the State Department and backed by the President, was just that. The House of Representatives would not take it as introduced and the Senate would not have received and passed it had the House done so. When it came to the Senate in amended form, with which the Senate did not completely agree, it was laid over until the next session.

The trouble with President Roosevelt is that he wants complete authority to do as he chooses if a war breaks out in Europe. He will not be given that degree of authority or discretion. Both Houses of Congress are determined upon that. Rightly or wrongly, the Congress has other ideas upon that subject. The Constitution gives the last word to Congress, not the President, and the latter is to exercise the power and carry out the policy laid down by the legislative body.

And the Congress intends to do just that—whether President Roosevelt likes it or not. Under existing law he could, in his discretion, have found a state of war existing, even though undeclared, between China and Japan any time this last year or so—which automatically would have cut off export of munitions of war, and, perhaps, some war materials. He did not choose to exert that discretionary power. I am not quarreling with him for not doing so. Maybe it was better to do as we have done.

But, in the face of such facts, the Congress does not like the President to scold it and lay all responsibility on its shoulders just because it would not enact a new law which would give him almost complete authority to do as he should choose. And in that conclusion I agree. I helped to reach it.

CLYDE M. REED.

[From the Parsons (Kans.) Sun of August 12, 1939]

WHAT IS NEUTRALITY?

Sometimes I have trouble in making up my mind whether I dislike Hitler or the Japs the more. Japan is savage and barbarous in its attack upon China, but one can account for Japan. Maybe somebody can fairly appraise Hitler—but I can't. I thought at first that he was a "snake doctor" sort and would soon blow up. He obviously isn't the first, and he hasn't as yet blown up. So I was mistaken in my early estimate. So let us discuss Hitler as a phenomenon which very much disturbs the world.

In appraising Hitler one must first consider that France and French continental European policy gave him his chance and made it possible for him to do what he has done. The Versailles Treaty was an impossible thing. Realists Lloyd George and Clemenceau helped themselves while idealist Woodrow Wilson had his head in the clouds. That is where the present condition in Europe stems from.

France made a series of military and financial alliances with a ring of small countries around Germany that gave it almost complete control of continental Europe (France furnishing the money). The German Government in the years following the Versailles blunder or crime was choked to death, and the Germans were shamed by repression and humiliated through being treated as an inferior people, all for the glory and what the French thought was necessary to their security of France. Great Britain had its doubts of that policy, but it had grabbed off, with the consent and aid of France, all that it wanted, and so it kept still.

What Hitler has since done to France, Great Britain, and to Europe is plenty and then some. Not since Napoleon has Europe seen so dominant a figure, and it must be said for Hitler that he has accomplished his ends without war, while the great Napoleon made the whole of Europe a field of battle.

Now—

Has the United States of America a duty to take up the burden and go to war, for that would be the outcome, to mend the damage done by stupid and short-sighted policies of Great Britain and France? Selfish policies, also. At no time was either nation ever thinking about anything except its immediate interests. Certainly they gave us no thought while all this was being done. France used enough money to finance its continental allies to have made a part payment, at least, upon its debt to the United States of America. Great Britain refused to get excited about the rape of Manchuria by Japan, back in 1931, while the United States of America, through Hoover and Stimson, almost got us into war. Great Britain is now greatly concerned about the Asiatic situation—some 8 years too late.

Is it up to the United States of America to mend blunders of timidity or short-sightedness, or both?

My answer, in both and all such situations, is, "No." Europe has been fighting over boundary lines and power policies and trade spheres and racial jealousies for a thousand years. It will be doing so for the next thousand years, so far as anyone now can say. There is no essential difference between the present sequence of events and the results than can be found a score or maybe 50 times in the last 10 centuries of European history. Only the names of the actors are different.

I'm not a pacifist. I'm not even an isolationist. I know quite a number of good people who are honestly one or the other. I'm willing for the United States of America to defend itself and do whatever is wise for us to do and help the peace of the world—as much as we can.

But I'm not willing to send American boys across the sea—either the Atlantic or the Pacific—if we can avoid it. And I think we can if we will attend to our own business. Of course, if we give way to a desire to engage in power politics of either Europe or Asia or allow our emotions to control our foreign policy, we will get into war. Make no mistake about that. But, as I said before, not with my vote in the Senate.

CLYDE M. REED.

[From the Parsons (Kans.) Sun of August 23, 1939]

"POWER POLITICS" IN EUROPE

The old game of "power politics" goes on in Europe. Events of the last 48 hours have developed some possible new combinations and, maybe, put some of the older ones into the discard. But there is no change in either principle or practice. The players are the same. The game is like it has been played for a thousand years. Only the names of the actors and the particular way of grouping and moving the pawns are different.

Russia startled the world. But this little country newspaper in this column Monday, 12 hours ahead of the public announcement of the Soviet-Nazi agreement, suggested that maybe the British and French military staffs had got to Moscow too late. We had no inside information. Certainly there was uncertainty about what Russia might do.

Readers of history know that there was a time when France, England, and Russia were enemies. The British and French fought the Russians in the Crimean War. Then France made a pact with Russia, although it was still the enemy of Britain. But in the World War the three nations fought on the same side.

Italy was one of the triple alliance, Germany and Austria being the other members, before the Great War. But Italy went over to the other side during the war. France and Great Britain double-crossed Italy in the Versailles Treaty arrangements. Italy has been, naturally, sore ever since. Mussolini joined up with Hitler.

Hitler and Mussolini have rung all the changes on their "anti-Communist" pact. They have blazoned their dislike of Russia and the present Russian economic system to the world day in and day out for years. They have pretended to be the "protector" of western Europe against communism. Now they join up with it—as present information goes. (This is written Tuesday evening, after the day's news is in. What another day will bring is quite another and uncertain thing.)

For quite a long period Great Britain and Japan were allies. In recent years they have become enemies. Today the Japs hate the British more than they do any other people—and show it.

One could write along this line, mentioning the changing lines of the quarrels of Europe, of the shifting alliances, of the various combinations almost without end. But what's the use? Anyone who reads history knows about these things. The only occasion for any wonder is when anybody in this country thinks we should undertake to play any part in European "power politics." The trouble is that some people do think so, and some of these people are in high places of authority. Such men and women are using their emotions and not their reasoning power or a knowledge of history.

The best and only real friend that the United States of America has so far as European boundary line and racial disputes are concerned is the Atlantic Ocean. It is 3,000 miles wide and will keep us out of European quarrels if we will only let it do so. The writer favors using our best protector for all it is worth. In the light of the last week, the last year, the last 20 years, where is there room for any hope that we have any duty to participate in the "power politics" of Europe; have any possible gain from doing so; could possibly keep out of war if we did interfere on either side?

Great Britain and France, world empires, are differently situated. They have different interests from the United States of America, play their hand differently because they have different cards. France in recent years has been a lot more realistic and sensible where its own interests are concerned than has Great Britain. The foreign policy of the British for 10 years has been feeble, unwise, not to say stupid. Between those two countries since the Versailles Treaty was signed Europe has been brought into its present condition.

It is not our quarrel—any part of it. There is no gain for us to take any hand in any degree or choose up sides as between combinations of nations which change as do the "power" combinations of Europe. We must have none of it. In that way, and in that way only, can we keep out of war.

THE DRUMS OF WAR

The drums of war are sounding again in Europe. Another of those periodical outbreaks because of boundary lines is occurring. Again it is the desire of a ruler to aggrandize himself first, and secondly, his country. Adolf Hitler, only so recently an Austrian house painter, now the unpredictable dictator of Germany and the German race, is loosing forces that may possibly engulf all Europe before peace can again come. As this is written what are called "flashes" in newspaper offices are coming from various places across the Atlantic. They are the first sparks of what may be a great conflagration. Only the hours to follow this writing will tell the tale.

This is one of the age-old boundary-line quarrels. They have been happening in Europe for a thousand years. They may be happening for the next thousand years—so far as the writer can tell. There is nothing in the attitude of any of the powers of Europe to give hope that all of them are not as selfish, sordid, and short-sighted as they always have been. That includes Great Britain and France, the so-called democracies. If forced to take sides, the writer would prefer them to their enemies, but the United States of America will not take sides in the war, directly or indirectly, with the writer's vote in the Senate. But he is only 1 of 96.

Twenty-five years ago this month a war that became the World War began. The United States entered in 1917. In the intervening period we had sold one side great quantities of supplies; our munition factories were humming; Great Britain, France, and their allied countries owed us great sums; our citizens had traveled on armed foreign ships, some of which were attacked and sunk; our own commercial vessels traveled through the war zones carrying supplies, sometimes to neutrals, sometimes to belligerents; some of them were sunk; our country was flooded with propaganda from every conceivable source; our President was constantly writing notes instead of keeping our citizens off of foreign ships and our own ships out of sea war zones.

Our emotions were being constantly whipped up until finally an overwhelming demand of the country took us into war. The men in Congress—Senate and House—who voted against going into the war were almost ostracized. Ordinary criticism was not enough in those days of frenzy. We were told that a war was being fought "to make the world safe for democracy."

That was a first experience for this country. There is always a "first time," and any man, woman, or nation may fairly be allowed one mistake. That was our mistake as a nation.

This time we should know better. There is no war for or against "democracy" now imminent. It is a war over boundary lines and being fought by rival "powers" for their own selfish ends. No one of them is concerned about us—or our interests.

If war comes, there will be floods of propaganda loosed again. Once more our factories will have a chance to run day and night (if the war lasts long enough). But this time we have the lesson of a quarter of a century to light our way. This is not the "first time." This time, if we get into war, we cannot make any excuse.

The writer's creed is quite simple. It is in the words of Benjamin Franklin "to attend to our own business." That, in the writer's opinion, includes:

Avoid taking sides; avoid trying to pick out "aggressor" and discriminate against any nation as such; keep our citizens off foreign vessels, except as they travel at their own risk; keep our commercial vessels out of sea war zones, except they enter at their own peril; for anything that we sell to any combatant, potential war supplies or articles of peaceful commerce, collect in cash at our own ports and require that the title pass in those ports and that such things be transported by the purchaser at his risk.

Doing those things will, the writer believes, keep us out of war. Doing them would have done so in 1916 and 1917. We didn't do them. We were drawn into the war.

I am for whatever is necessary for the defense of America, but not one dollar to lend, or give, any European nation engaged in war. Either in a special or the coming regular session, my vote will be cast to carry out the policy outlined above. At the end of the last session a majority of both Houses of Congress held those beliefs. Possibly propaganda and waves of emotion may change some Members. I do not know. But I repeat here my pledge to my fellow citizens of Kansas that I will not vote to send an American soldier across the sea to fight over a European boundary line. No matter what other men may do, that I will not do.

THE SPECIAL SESSION

Day after tomorrow the Congress of the United States will meet in extraordinary session. President Roosevelt exercised the prerogative of the Executive and called Congress to meet at noon Thursday to deal with foreign policy in the light of the war in Europe.

Most of the discussion among citizens in general, including letters written to their Senators and Members of Congress, revolves around whether we shall retain the embargo feature of the present so-called neutrality law or go to a cash-and-carry system of making supplies available for belligerent nations. The interest people take is indicated by the fact that 168 letters were received in one morning's mail in the last few days, about 80 of which were written to give the opinion of the person writing on a neutrality policy.

Despite what has been printed in the newspapers about neutrality laws, existing and proposed, there is much confusion in the minds of people who write and people who come to talk with the writer of this column. Let some of that uncertainty be cleared away.

At the present time there is no national law which places any restriction upon the sale and export of anything to any foreign nation except "arms, munitions, and implements of war." That is to say, rifles, machine guns, cannon, etc., in the arms classification; shells, shrapnel, powder, poison gases, bombs, torpedoes, grenades, etc., in the munitions class; vessels of war, airplanes designed for war purposes, tanks, armored vehicles, submarines, etc., in the implements of war category. When a state of war is declared, these things are automatically forbidden to be exported to belligerents.

Up to May 1, 1939, there was a provision in the law which gave the President power to place restrictions upon the export of war materials after a state of war had been found to exist. These materials included petroleum, steel, iron, copper, etc. There was no absolute or automatic embargo, but the President, in his discretion, could issue a proclamation finding a state of war existed, in which case their export would be unlawful. President Roosevelt has never used that discretionary power to limit sale and shipment of such materials to Japan.

The authority over "materials" given the President expired by limitation May 1 of this year and was not extended. Those materials are open to export without restriction at the present time.

There is no time limitation as to the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war. President Roosevelt wants that embargo removed or made discretionary with him. That matter of "discretion" is one of the bitter disputes between Franklin D. Roosevelt and those who do not care to vest unlimited discretion in any President of any party.

The people who write to or talk with this writer mostly assume that whether the United States of America stays out of or enters the war now raging depends greatly upon whether we continue the present embargo feature of the law or whether a "cash and carry" system is substituted therefor. Congressional and other proponents of the present law give room for this belief with their public statements and speeches. This writer does not subscribe to that view.

It is the firm belief of this writer that whether the United States of America enters into or stays out of the present war depends not upon whether we keep the present embargo or substitute a cash-and-carry provision for it, but upon the will of the people of this country and their elected spokesmen to stay out. The method of exporting what we do export is, to this writer, a detail. Important detail but not controlling. There is much wild talk on both sides of this question.

If the United States of America, through its people and its legislators, determines to stay out, and has the will to stay out, in spite of propaganda and emotion, we will stay out no matter whether we operate under the embargo or the cash-and-carry method. We can get in or can stay out no matter which plan is in the law.

This writer leans quite definitely to the cash-and-carry method as being more consistent and logical national policy to permanently follow. But not because he thinks that either policy will put us in or keep us out of war. That depends upon what we will to do.

So far as this writer's will goes, it is to stay out.

Constitution Sunday

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES J. DAVIS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me in behalf of Constitution Sunday over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Co., September 16, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The observance of Constitution Sunday has come out of an increasing realization of the part that religion bears as the fundamental and abiding basis of government in our country. The men who formulated the principles of the Constitution of the United States represented a biblical tradition. They believed in the rule of God in the lives of men as transcendent over any earthly power. They had witnessed the tyranny of princes and kings in the Old World and wanted none of it here.

Last year, together with others, I was active in asking for the observance of Constitution Sunday, September 18. This year I received numerous petitions from eminent clergymen, distinguished scholars, representatives of fraternal and patriotic orders, and others, asking that I introduce legislation to designate Sunday immediately preceeding September 17 of each year as Constitution Sunday. Early in the session of the Seventy-sixth Congress I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 100 for this purpose and it was referred to the Senate Library Committee. No hearings have been held on it as yet, but I am hoping that constructive action will be taken when Congress is again convened. Affirmative action on Senate Joint Resolution 100 will place this national observance of the Constitution near the date each year when, at Philadelphia in 1787, George Washington and his compatriots in free government placed their signatures on the historic document.

This year September 17 has come on Sunday. A committee of eminent religious leaders has been formed to sponsor the exercises of today at the New York World's Fair. The President of the United States has graciously written his belief in the fundamental purpose of this occasion. The Governors of many States from Maine to California have issued proclamations asking citizens to observe it. Special services are being conducted at West Point and Annapolis. The interest developed has been most gratifying. Hereafter, it is our hope that Constitution Sunday will be observed regularly in September of every year.

One of the most important features of this day, as I think of it, is the gathering together of young Americans, coming to the age of 21, for an appropriate recognition of the new responsibilities of citizenship which have recently come to them. Every community in the United States should have some observance of these civic obligations in behalf of their youth. Constitution Sunday presents such an opportunity.

The heart of America is pleading for peace in a world that has been set on fire with the spirit of hatred and war. The Constitution is our surest bulwark of peace. In a day when as Americans we are seeking in every possible way to keep our country free from war, it is well that we remind ourselves of the glorious principles of toleration and balanced government which are set forth in this charter of our liberties. For these are the principles which have constituted the abiding protection for the rights of minority groups in our land, permitting them to live peaceably here without surrendering their right as free citizens in our Republic to differ with their neighbors according to their individual conscience.

The liberty we so greatly prize finds its roots in the free conscience of each individual citizen. This liberty is safeguarded in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. Against it in the past have come in vain all the forces of mass greed and oppression which seek to subject the individual to the domination of the all-powerful state. Our united prayer today is that we may ever be kept in liberty and peace.

We seek for ourselves under the Constitution a continuation of the free expression of opinion which is now possible in this country as in no other in the world. We desire the right to say frankly and fully that we do not want war. We do not want to become embroiled in foreign strife. We do not want to be under the domination of foreign ideals of government. We wish to live peaceably together in this free land under the guidance of the Almighty.

I do not fear the flood tides of propaganda that sweep over this country as long as all sides are given equal opportunity to be heard. The Constitution guarantees free speech to all our citizens, not just a privileged few. We seek to uphold the right of every citizen to petition the Government and to be heard. Only so can the cause of peace be served for any settlement of our national judgment on the issues of peace or war which is based on half truths or one-sided statements cannot endure. If the time shall ever come when public opinion is muzzled in America, we shall be on the way to war.

Irresistably our country is being drawn to the determination of one central issue—the free right to work. The supreme challenge of the present age to our people is to put the Nation to work without putting ourselves into war. War comes when men are restless, discontented, and unemployed. It has been so in Europe. Unless we create a new spirit of work in America, we are in danger of riding into the spirit of war from which there shall be no turning back. War is destructive; work is constructive. War is based on hatred; work is based on cooperation. War destroys life and property; work builds life and property. War breeds through propaganda; work builds through truth. America wants none of war and more of work. Loyal adherence to the spirit of faith in God and man which is embodied in the Constitution of the United States will open up new fields of work and save us from the menace of war. If I understand the heart of the American people, I say America wants work—not war.

The Constitution of the United States is your Constitution. It belongs to you as a sovereign citizen. It is the American proof that every voting citizen is a ruler in this land. The Constitution is not the property of the Congress, the Supreme Court, or the President. Its fundamental law can be extended and enlarged through legislative enactment, defined and interpreted by the Court and administered by the President, but only through constitutional amendment, as provided in the document itself, can the basic law be abrogated or denied. I believe in the citizen's full power over himself, the Congress, the Court, the President, and the Constitution itself. It is your Constitution.

I do not believe in the Constitution simply because of its age or the veneration of tradition which surrounds it. I believe in the Constitution because it represents the highest ideal of government of, for, and by the people in an evenly balanced way. The maintenance of balance and the distribution of power in our modern life, whether it be the relation of labor to industry, industry to agriculture, or of the States to the Nation is of fundamental importance.

Defend and protect the Constitution as you would the purity and privacy of your own home. Uphold the Constitution because you require freedom of speech, press, organization, work, and religion. Stand by the Constitution because it maintains your sovereign right as a citizen. Encourage constitutional government because it serves as a safeguard against tyranny and oppression.

I wish to invite all who are listening in and other friends of the radio audience living in New York City to join us at the World's Fair in the Court of Peace tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock. At that time a program of unusual interest and distinction will be provided, and I am sure you will enjoy it if it is possible for you to be there. I urge you to come in the name of peace and the Constitution. I especially invite the young men and women of this metropolitan area who have come to the age of responsible citizenship to join with me in the Court of Peace for the observance of Constitution Sunday. By coming you will say, "I believe in peace. I am determined that we shall keep the peace under the Constitution of the United States."

I wish to invite my friends of the radio audience living beyond the metropolitan boundaries of New York City who may not find it possible to come to the Court of Peace tomorrow to send me word if you believe in the principles of Constitution Sunday as I have briefly presented them to you. If you believe as I do that the true basis of government in this land is the rule of God in the lives of our citizens, I should like to hear from you. For there is strength in numbers. Today we share a common cause—the cause of all America—the cause of peace and brotherhood under the Stars and Stripes. We are proud of this land; we are proud of its vast resources, its mines, forests, fields, its mountains, and broad, flowing rivers. We are proud of our youth—our young men and women—proud of their courage, their spirit of optimism, and their love for peace. This is the time to keep alive our pride in America—this America of ours, thank God, still in liberty and at peace.

Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

STATEMENT BY DR. A. C. JACKSON

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Frances E. Willard. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a portion of a statement by Dr. Arthur Charles Jackson, of Portland, Maine, president of the Frances Willard Centennial Total Abstinence Society; and I wish to state that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is to broadcast an address tonight on the life of Frances E. Willard.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FRANCES WILLARD CENTENNIAL TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY

(Arthur Charles Jackson, president, Portland, Maine)

September 28, 1939, is the centennial anniversary of the birth of Frances E. Willard, one of the noblest women of all time, as well as one of the greatest of any age or nation.

The story of her faith in the conquest of evil by good should be a mighty inspiration, alike to old and young of this and succeeding generations.

The Master's message was at once her guaranty and her command. The Bible was to her, in very truth, divine.

What immeasurable and increasing influence that book has wielded over the minds of men and women and the destiny of the world.

If it be the word of God, as we profoundly believe, surely it comes to human ears and understanding with all the dignity and peace and power that His word should command. If it be the work of man, then even the doubter must admit that the ancient Hebrews had miraculous skill to cast a spell across millenniums which, strengthening with the years, spreads wider today than ever and embraces the future as far as even the eye of imagination can behold. Not all invention, or all statesmanship, or all of literature have so touched and bettered human life as this one book. And it was the Bible that gave Frances Willard her mission, her strength, her hope, her argument, and her inspiration.

Thus prepared and thus equipped she went out into the world and to her work. No method can measure what she did. The half million of women whom she brought into organized cooperation in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is but a suggestion of the real results of her activities. Indeed, the highest benefits her life bestowed were as intangible as air and as full of life. She made purer the moral atmosphere of a continent—almost of a world. She rendered the life of a nation cleaner, the mind of a people saner. Millions of homes today are happier for her; millions of wives and mothers bless her; and countless children have grown into strong, upright, and beautiful maturity who, but for the work of Frances Willard, might have been forever soiled and weakened.

Let us cherish the memory, the sweetness, and light of Frances Willard—St. Frances of Evanston—by imitating, insofar as we are able, her beautiful life and service.

We believe that every child of God, of whatever age, race, or religion, should have a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, unmenaced and unpolluted by the frightful evils of the liquor traffic—a traffic regarded by millions of Christian men and women all around the world as one of, if not the deadliest enemy of the human race.

Partisanship in War Crisis

OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANK KNOX

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "Knox Foreswears Partisanship in War Crisis." The reference, of course, is to Hon. Frank Knox, who is the editor and publisher of the Chicago Daily News.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KNOX FORSWEARS PARTISANSHIP IN WAR CRISIS—FEELS EDITORS WILL DO LIKEWISE—INSPIRED BY CONFERENCE WITH F. D. R.

WASHINGTON, September 21.—The current world crisis calls upon editors for "an inspiring, nonpolitical discharge of the very great responsibility they bear," counseled Col. Frank Knox, president and publisher of the Chicago Daily News, here at the invitation of President Roosevelt to advise on questions of national peace and security.

RESPONSIBILITY CAN'T BE EXAGGERATED

Predicting an alertness on the part of the press to perform its patriotic duty, he expressed confidence that editors will prove themselves to be "Americans first, and Democrats or Republicans or what not afterward."

At the Washington office of his newspaper, just as Congress was being convened in special session at noon today, Colonel Knox said:

"It is impossible to aggravate the gravity of the present world situation. It is an accomplished and recognized fact that the Soviet and Nazi Governments have pooled their interests under a secret agreement. There is no other possible interpretation of developments in eastern Europe. The world is dominated by a concentration of the manpower of Russia and Germany, the natural resources of Russia, and the German military skill in leadership.

"It is not a prospect at which we can look without a feeling of grave concern for the future.

"It ought to sober our thinking in America and relegate selfish partisanship to the background. Facing such a situation here, where we still have a free press, the magnitude of responsibility borne by newspapers cannot be exaggerated.

"Personally, so long as this situation persists, I have utterly forsworn partisanship. I know that the editors of newspapers of America, like myself, hold ourselves to be Americans first, and Democrats or Republicans or what not afterward. I feel sure that this spirit will dominate the worth-while newspapers of the country.

SEES WHOLESOME OMEN

"It was an inspiring experience to participate yesterday in a nonpartisan conference at the White House designed to discuss measures of common defense in the United States in a world given over utterly to force. The complete lack of any political sharpshooting in that conference was a wholesome omen for the future. It should be recalled that participating in that conference were the most prominent leaders of the New Deal and the most active leaders of the anti new dealers in the Democratic Party, as well as Republican leaders.

"When Congress adjourned more than a month ago these three divisions in public opinion were in sharp conflict. In the White House conference every vestige of feeling engendered by those divisions was washed out. The discussion revolved exclusively about matters relating to protection and maintenance of peace and security in this country.

"The most emphatic declarations were made by leaders of all groups that in the impending session of Congress the questions involving the interests of America in this grave crisis should be discussed and settled without the slightest reference to party alinements.

"I am sure the press of America will be quick to emulate the spirit of nonpartisanship displayed by the conferees. We are faced with momentous and far-reaching problems, among the most important since the organization of the Republic. These are above partisan concerns and deal with the future welfare and security of the American people. It must be that this portentous situation will call forth from the responsible editors of America an inspiring, nonpolitical discharge of the very great responsibility they bear."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of September 21, 1939, on the subject of Neutrality.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of September 21, 1939]

FORTUNE SAYS ONLY THIRD OF UNITED STATES IS FOR ISOLATION—REPORTS ITS SURVEY SHOWS CRUSHING DEFEAT BY PEOPLE OF THE POLICIES OF BORAH

A "crushing defeat" by the American people against the strict isolationist policy being championed in Congress by Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, of Idaho, was reported yesterday in the current survey of Fortune magazine. Nearly two-thirds of the people, Fortune found, are against isolation.

The announcement came on the eve of the special session of Congress called to repeal the present Neutrality Act. The results show:

Eighty-three and one-tenth percent of the people want England and France to win and only 1 percent are for Germany.

Sixty-four and eight-tenths percent believe that the Allies can win as the situation stands at present.

Only 24.7 percent favor a complete embargo against all of the warring nations.

THREE QUESTIONS ASKED

Only three questions were asked, the first two to discover to what extent the public is already disposed to take sides in the European war, and the third to define the policy toward which those attitudes lead.

The replies were as follows to the first question: "In the trouble now going on in Europe, which side would you like to see win":

	Total	Men	Women
	Percent	Percent	Percent
Poland, France, and England and their friends	83.1	85.4	80.7
Germany and her friends	1.0	.8	1.2
Neither side	6.7	7.0	6.5
Do not know	9.2	6.8	11.6

The second question was: "As it stands now, if no further allies join either side, which side do you think will come out ahead?" The replies were:

	Total	Men	Women
	Percent	Percent	Percent
Poland, France, England, and their friends	64.8	71.6	57.6
Germany and her friends	8.3	8.4	8.1
Do not know	26.9	20.0	34.3

"This, then, is the background of hope and expectation, during the early stages of the war, against which the American public is to decide the all-important question of what the position of our country should be," Fortune comments.

The survey then asked the question: "Which of these courses of action comes closest to describing what you think the United States should do?"

The replies:

Total percent

Enter the war at once on the side of England, France, and Poland and send an army to Europe	2.3
Enter the war at once, but send only our Navy and air force to help England and Poland	1.0
Enter the war on the side of England, France, and Poland only if it looks as though they were losing, and in the meantime help that side with food and materials	13.5
Do not enter the war, but supply England, France, and Poland with materials and food, and refuse to ship anything to Germany	19.9
Take no sides, and offer to sell to anyone, but on a cash-and-carry basis	29.3

Refuse any aid of any kind to either side, and refuse to sell anything at all to either side	24.7
Find some way of supporting Germany	.1
Other	3.4
Don't know	5.8

DECISION AGAINST ISOLATION

"This is a crushing decision," the survey continues, "against the strict isolationist policy being championed by BORAH in Congress, for, adding the cash-and-carry vote to that of the people who believe in taking sides, a total of nearly two-thirds of the population stands against economic isolation, while only a quarter are opposed to any trade with the belligerents.

"Here is the United States' answer to its momentous problem. Few people have no opinion on the subject. Adding the first three answers, 16.8 percent are willing that we should go into the second World War when or before our help is needed to tip the scales in the favored direction. Some 20 percent favor taking sides in the conflict by economic means short of war.

"The total vote for using our men or materials to make secure the outcome we want is 36.7 percent. Against this stands 24.7 percent voting for complete isolation, and between these extremes is a 29.3-percent vote favoring equal trade with all nations. If these two votes for what amounts to at least technical neutrality could properly be totaled, the resulting figure would be 54 percent.

"However, many of the voters for a cash-and-carry policy may believe that this form of neutrality will really favor the Allies, perhaps decisively, because they have more cash and ships for the carrying. On the other hand, some of them may also take into consideration the factor of neutral shipping whereby we could be supplying Germany with materials."

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, this special session of Congress has been called by the President for but one purpose, to repeal or revise our neutrality legislation. Several Members of this House with long years of service have told me that there was apparently more interest in this subject of neutrality, judging by the quantity of mail they had received, than has been indicated on any other subject during the past 25 years. With so much interest manifested from my district, it seems only right that I should make this statement, outlining my position on the question of repealing the arms embargo and revising our present neutrality law.

The special session of Congress has convened; the President has delivered his message in person to a joint session of the Senate and House; members of the President's Cabinet were seated in the Well of the House, and the galleries were packed with interested citizens, but this opening session was quite in contrast with the joyful joint session of the Seventy-sixth Congress which convened last January, when for many Members it was a happy reunion with old friends. Last Thursday the Members were solemn, and personally I felt very subdued and humble, realizing that the decisions of this Congress might well settle the dread question of peace or war for the United States in the near future.

That my constituents are aware of the importance of this special session is well proven by the fact that during the past 4 days I have received 1,808 letters, cards, and telegrams on this subject of neutrality, with 1,697 asking that the embargo be continued and 111 favoring lifting the embargo. These communications come from every section of my district and from all classes of society. With but one exception, every person from whom I have heard is opposed to any move which would involve us in a foreign war. I am sure that those who disagree with the position I take are just as sincere in their desire for peace as I am in mine. I have pledged myself not to be influenced by partisanship nor by the effect my vote may have on my political career, nor will the question of possible dollar profit be given consideration, as this cannot be considered when men's lives are at stake.

The other day I received a letter from one of my constituents which impressed me greatly, and I am going to quote it herewith, as it contains much food for thought:

The President made a dignified plea over the radio for neutrality, nonpartisanship, and unity. For neutrality the Nation is unanimous, though divided as to method. All are against partisanship, whether it be in Congress or by the President in his press conferences or in other respects. But it is not partisanship for him to differ with Congress or Congress with him. Where there is a duty to think and decide, difference is not partisanship. As to national unity, that is strengthened and not weakened when the Congress and the President each does his duty, even though they differ, provided they do it respectfully and calmly. But it is not unity—only the outward semblance of unity—when Congress surrenders its brain or its will to the President. There is a possible emergency and a possible concealed danger. The danger is that he may again ask "emergency legislation," as he did before, then hold it beyond the needs of the emergency, as he did before. Whatever the temptation, whatever the popular voice of the moment may be, I hope that men of all parties and views in Congress will resist it quietly but firmly, knowing that that is not democracy. In fact, it is precisely that unconscious surrender by the German people of their rights and duties a few years ago, under the plea of national need, that led to their loss of power to act and so to prevent war, to their sorrow and the sorrow of the world. For there are intermediate steps that inevitably lead in the end to loss of freedom, just as there are steps that must end in war. No matter who he is or what the excuse, enlarged power in one man is never safe. There must be a balance of power. We must remain free in order to be free. And happily it is the wish of the people, as the polls show, that Congress sit at this time, which means, of course, not as a sounding board, not as a "yes" body, nor as a nobody, but as Congress.

I agree with the sentiment expressed in that letter. We are not faced with an emergency at the present time, and it seems to me that now is the time for full, free, and thoughtful discussion of the problems we face. There is no need for hasty action. It might be well at this point to consider the situation as it exists at the present moment and see just what protection our existing neutrality law can give us.

On August 31, 1935, the President approved a neutrality law that the House and Senate had enacted. The law was enacted for but one purpose—to keep the United States out of any future foreign wars. Our people were determined that never again should our young men be called upon to fight or die on a foreign battlefield. President Roosevelt supported the law wholeheartedly and spoke of it as legislation that would in the future keep us out of war. In fact, in referring to the neutrality legislation the President said that this law would put new tools in his hands to aid him in keeping the United States out of any future war. He even added this interesting statement—that the only thing we had to fear was that in case of war breaking out on another continent there would be those Americans who, with a desire for profit—fool's gold—would urge repeal or evasion of the existing neutrality law.

On February 29, 1936, this act was amended in minor detail. In one place the word "may" was changed to "shall," so that the issuing of certain proclamations by the President would be mandatory. Again, on June 8, 1937, the act was amended to provide for an arms embargo to Spain, the question of civil war not being covered by the previous acts.

On May 1, 1937, the President again approved a revision of our neutrality law, and that is the law now on our statute books. The greatest change in this revision was the inclusion of the so-called cash-and-carry provision. The act was so written that the cash-and-carry provision would automatically expire on May 1, 1939; and it has, of course, since expired and has not as yet been reenacted into law. Briefly the existing law provides as follows: Section 1 provides that whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between or among two or more states, he shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to any belligerent nation or to a neutral nation for transportation to a belligerent nation; second, provides for the cash-and-carry provision relating to commodities and material not mentioned in section 1; third, prohibits loans and credits to belligerent nations; fourth, excepts other American republics; fifth, sets up a National Munitions Control Board to practically control the industry, providing for manufacturing permits, and so forth; sixth, prohibits American vessels from carrying arms and munitions to warring nations; seventh, deals with the use of our ports as a base of supply; eighth, deals with armed merchant ships of belligerents entering our ports and the use of our ports by foreign submarines; ninth, makes it unlawful for Americans to travel on ships owned by belligerent nations; tenth, makes it unlawful for American vessels to arm or to carry armament, arms, ammunition, or implements of war. The balance of the act relates to regulations, penalties, definitions, and so forth.

It is well to recall that this act was approved by the House with only a few dissenting votes at a time when there was a minimum of emotion and propaganda; at a time when war was not in sight. It was the considered judgment of the Congress, supported overwhelmingly by our people. During the 5 years that Congress considered neutrality legislation there was but one thought in the minds of its sponsors, and that was to prevent the tragedy of 1917 and 1918, when the mothers of America gave 50,000 sons on the altar of war.

Now, with war again raging in Europe, there are sincere men and women who advise repealing or modifying our neutrality law and, as they express it, go back to international law, which to me means going back to the condition that existed in 1914. It has been said that international law is whatever the nation that controls the seas determines it to be. International law depends on treaties and agreements; and in this day, when treaties are treated so lightly, it seems to me to be a dangerous experiment. If we make a mistake, the forfeit may be the lives of thousands of our finest young men. Do you wonder that at this moment I feel meek and very humble as I consider the responsibilities ahead? You will recall that the existing law provides only for an embargo on arms, ammunition, or implements of war. There are a great many sincere citizens who feel that we should repeal the embargo on arms and substitute the cash-and-carry provision, which would mean that any nation needing such arms, ammunition, or implements of war who could come here in its own ships and pay us cash on the spot could have all they needed. Just 2 short weeks ago, during a radio broadcast, I said I had no fear that a strict cash-and-carry provision would in itself involve us in a war if only we could and would stick to it. I expressed the fear, however, that at the end of a few months of the adoption of a cash-and-carry provision certain countries would come to us and say: "We have given you all the cash we have. We cannot finance this war on a cash basis any longer. We have been good customers of yours, so you will have to arrange for either loans or credits." Would not we then have a moral obligation to grant this request? And if we did, we would have taken another step toward active participation.

I am reminded of the old saying, "If a man doesn't take the first drink of liquor he will never become intoxicated." In this instance, if we do not take the first step toward war, we will not become involved in that war. There are three steps we might take: (1) Repeal our neutrality law; (2) extend loans and credits; and (3)—the fatal step—the sending of our men to Europe. Now, even before Congress has considered the question of cash and carry, proponents of repeal of the arms embargo have stated they would change the term "Cash and carry" to "Come and get it." According to reports the bill to be reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will carry this "Come and get it" provision which will allow the extension of credit—to be sure, a short-term credit—but we all know from past experience that short-term credit often becomes long-term credit.

I am not unmindful of the fact that we could well have a war boom here in the near future, just as we did in 1914, 1915, and 1916, but what good will it do us if, as a result, we should become involved needlessly in a war? Profit would then melt away and finally, I fear, we would see the end of our democracy. I can think of circumstances and events that might sometime make it necessary for us to enter a war to not only save democracy but for humanity's sake. However, when that time comes let us face the issue honestly and act directly, but not in the name of neutrality. If now, while we are trying to write a neutrality act to maintain our neutrality, we have in our minds the aiding of this, that, or the other nation, we cannot say we are truly neutral. Is it not possible that the ruler of a nation, whose enemies we aid, might well say that if the United States is going to furnish his enemies with everything but manpower, he might as well have the United States openly at war with him and then proceed to an overt act which we could not or would not ignore?

As the President said 2 weeks ago, we are the best-informed people in the world. I hope we can calmly consider the information we received; that we can keep both feet on the ground, and, regardless of how strong our sympathies may be or how bitter we may feel toward those who brought about the present war, we can maintain an honest neutrality, recalling the Proverb of the Old Testament, "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he."

I have given a good deal of time and study to this question of neutrality. It is a subject which has interested most veterans of the World War. Many of us came back with a feeling in our hearts that we had fought in the war to end all wars, and we were determined to do whatever we could as individual citizens to prevent this country from ever again becoming involved in a European war. While we may have thought a good deal about this subject, there are many in this country whose life work has been studying and teaching international law and diplomacy. Certainly we cannot ignore the expressed opinions of such men as Prof. Philip C. Jessup and Prof. Charles Cheney Hyde, of Columbia University, or Prof. Samuel F. Bemis and Dr. A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale. Professor Jessup is particularly outspoken on this subject, and the September 21 edition of the New York Times carries an article written jointly by Professors Jessup and Hyde, part of which I quote:

> To be more precise, if the Congress, in order to strengthen the sinews of France and England, removes the present embargo so as to enable those powers to gain a distinct advantage over their enemy, the United States makes itself in fact the ally of those who secure its sustenance. But, more than that, such conduct is illegal as well as unneutral and may, if resorted to, place the Nation in a most embarrassing and even hypocritical position when it undertakes to assert its neutral rights, which Secretary Hull recently announced we had not abandoned. * * * The answer is that the manipulation of American governmental control already established through a statutory embargo, with the deliberate design of aiding a particular group of warring powers by an effort that takes cognizance of their relative supremacy at sea, is a deliberate taking of sides, which makes intervention in the conflict.

It seems to me it would be presumptious on the part of a freshman Congressman to ignore such definite statements from such outstanding authorities; men whose knowledge of the subject and whose Americanism cannot be questioned, and I feel I could not be honest with myself or the people whom I represent if I did other than vote for continuation of the arms embargo. I agree with the President on the other points raised in his message, namely, that some effort must be made to define war zones and to keep United States ships and nationals out of war zones. Whether this can be done by a declaration or whether it will take special enactment of law I cannot say.

In this whole question of neutrality there certainly is room for honest differences of opinion, but I trust that those of you who differ with the position I have taken will at least credit me with a desire to do whatever can be done to prevent this Nation from becoming involved in the war which is now being waged.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, my objective, your objective, and the desire of every Member of Congress is to keep our country from becoming involved in this terrible war.

There is an honest difference of opinion as to how that can be accomplished, not only among Members of the House and Senate, but among our citizens.

It is to be regretted we find ourselves today when a war is raging in foreign lands in a position where it is absolutely necessary to change our present Neutrality Act.

This is my opinion.

Many of our citizens are not in accord with my views.

Naturally on a matter of such importance we are hearing from our constituents. Some of mine agree with me while others do not.

At the outset, I want to address myself to those who have written me expressing the hope there will be no change in the law under which we are now compelled to operate, the act of May 1, 1937. This law is intact today with the exception of section 2 which, under the law itself, expired May 1, 1939.

Let us see what position that leaves us in. Today it is unlawful to export or attempt to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any belligerent state named in the proclamation of the President, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, any such belligerent state. That is the provision of paragraph (a) of the first section of the law.

The President has faithfully performed his duty in issuing his proclamations. He has gone just as far as he is permitted under the law that controls. He is not responsible for the conditions I am about to enumerate because he must obey the law.

Do you know that under this existing Neutrality Act:

First. American vessels may go into any sea area even in the face of danger from mines, submarines, and aircraft of belligerents.

Second. American citizens may travel on American or other neutral vessels through areas made dangerous by mines, submarines, and aircraft of belligerents.

Third. American vessels may carry scrap iron, scrap steel, copper, cotton, oil, and other essential war materials to belligerents.

Fourth. Motor trucks and tractors may be exported to belligerents but not armored motor trucks.

Fifth. Cotton may be exported to belligerents but not gun cotton.

Sixth. Brass tubing in pipe form may be exported to belligerents but not brass tubing in shell form.

Seventh. Lead in the form of bars may be exported to belligerents but not lead in the form of bullets.

Eighth. Steel for guns may be exported to belligerents but not guns.

Ninth. American exporters may sell goods to belligerents without transfer of title to the purchaser, which means that American goods on the high seas are subject to destruction by opposing belligerents.

Tenth. Trucks and tractors containing an engine that could be installed in an airplane or tank may be exported to belligerents.

Eleventh. Food in any form, which is as necessary as arms and ammunition, may be taken in American vessels to belligerents.

In other words, arms, ammunition, or implements of war cannot be exported to any belligerent state, but the material that is necessary to manufacture them can.

Analyze carefully what can be sent to belligerents in American bottoms and then determine if the present law should remain unchanged.

The President and the Secretary of State wanted a law that permitted the sale of anything to anyone provided that the purchaser took title and possession in the United States. The original recommendation likewise would have prohibited American ships from entering combat zones and would have restricted the travel of American citizens in combat zones.

At the time these suggestions were submitted to the Congress, Secretary of State Hull said:

These proposals are intended to aid in keeping the United States from becoming involved in war. They contemplate, primarily, a state of affairs in which relations in the world have ceased to be peaceful.

Our purpose must be at all times to endeavor to foster that state of relations among nations which will maintain the fabric of world peace. In pursuance of that aim we have done, and must do, everything possible within the limits of our traditional policy of noninvolvement in overseas affairs.

In considering the present proposals for legislation we must keep in mind that, no matter how much we may wish or may try to disassociate ourselves from world events, we cannot achieve disassociation. The simple fact of our existence as a great nation in a world of nations cannot be denied; and the substance of the legislation adopted in this country inevitably influences not only this country but also other countries. The problem for us is not whether we shall help any foreign country or any group of foreign countries. Nor is it that of passing judgment upon or interfering in other peoples' controversies. Rather, it is that of so conducting our affairs and our relations with other peoples, both before and after the outbreak of war elsewhere, that we shall be more, and not less, secure; so that we shall not become parties to controversies; and so that our attitude and actions will encourage other people to avoid rather than to become engaged in controversy.

On July 14, 1939, the President sent a message to Congress which said, in part:

The cornerstone of the foreign policy of the United States is the preservation of the peace and security of our Nation, the strengthening of international law, and the revitalization of international good faith. The foreign policy of this Government may be misinterpreted or it may be misunderstood, but it cannot be destroyed. Peace is so precious and war so devastating that the people of the United States and their Government must not fail to make their just and legitimate contribution to the preservation of peace.

The Congress has pending before it at the present time certain proposals providing for the amendment of the existing so-called neutrality legislation. Some of these proposed changes I regard as necessary to promote the peace and security of the United States.

There is an astonishing amount of confusion and misunderstanding as regards the legislation under consideration, and particularly with regard to the operation of the existing arms embargo.

I shall try to bring out as clearly as I can the important points of agreement and disagreement between those who support the principles contained in the six-point peace and neutrality program recommended by the executive branch of the Government and those who oppose these recommendations.

In substance and in principle both sides of the discussion agree on the following points:

1. Both sides agree that the first concern of the United States must be its own peace and security.

2. Both sides agree that it should be the policy of this Government to avoid being drawn into wars between other nations.

3. Both sides agree that this Nation should at all times avoid entangling alliances or involvements with other nations.

4. Both sides agree that in the event of foreign wars this Nation should maintain a status of strict neutrality, and that around the structure of neutrality we should so shape our policies as to keep this country from being drawn into war.

On the other hand, the following is the chief essential point of disagreement between those who favor the adoption of the recommendations formulated by the executive branch of the Government and those who are opposing these recommendations.

The proponents, including the executive branch of the Government, at the time when the arms embargo was originally adopted called attention to the fact that its enactment constituted a hazardous departure from the principle of international law which recognizes the right of neutrals to trade with belligerents and of belligerents to trade with neutrals. They believe that neutrality means impartiality, and in their view an arms embargo is directly opposed to the idea of neutrality. It is not humanly possible, by enacting an arms embargo, or by refraining from such enactment, to hold the scales exactly even between two belligerents. In either case and due to shifting circumstances one belligerent may find itself in a position of relative advantage or disadvantage. The important difference between the two cases is that when such a condition arises in the absence of an arms embargo on our part, no responsibility attaches to this country, whereas in the presence of an embargo, the responsibility of this country for the creation of the condition is inevitably direct and clear.

There is no theory or practice to be found in international law pertaining to neutrality to the effect that the advantages that any particular belligerent might procure through its geographic location, its superiority on land or at sea, or through other circumstances, should be offset by the establishment by neutral nations of embargoes.

The opposition to the present substitute proposal joins issue on this point, and stands for existing rigid embargo as a permanent part of our neutrality policy. And yet by insisting on an arms embargo in time of war they are, to that extent, for the reasons I have stated, urging not neutrality, but what might well result in actual unneutrality, the serious consequences of which no one can predict.

Those who urge the retention of the present embargo continue to advance the view that it will keep this country out of war, thereby misleading the American people to rely upon a false and illogical delusion as a means of keeping out of war.

No matter what action the Congress takes on this question, it cannot satisfy all belligerents. Our one desire should be to enact a law that will eliminate, as much as it is humanly possible to do so, the danger of our country becoming involved.

We should by all means take the profits out of war by proper taxation and we should make profiteering a felony.

Our merchant marine will suffer financially by preventing our ships from carrying arms, munitions, and so forth, but what is that loss in comparison with the life of one American?

Remember under existing law nothing can prevent our ships entering a combat zone. I can see in advance the temper of our people if some of our ships are destroyed. It is our duty by law to keep our ships out.

Under no consideration do I want ships flying the American flag traveling in the combat zone, and we should also prevent our citizens from traveling on the ships of belligerents and other neutrals that enter combat zones.

Fortunately, partisanship has practically been laid aside. We find the leaders of both great political parties seeking the same objective, a law that will eliminate as much as possible the danger of becoming drawn into this conflict.

There is another matter that I think should be cleared up. The statement has been made over the radio on several occasions that our Government can advance credit to belligerents through the R. F. C. under the Export and Import Bank Act. This is true, because the R. F. C. is set up as a corporation, but under the Export and Import Bank Act Congress limited the amount of credit which could be extended to $100,000,000, and I am personally informed by the officials of the R. F. C. that the $100,000,000 has practically been allocated and no part of it was advanced to a belligerent nation. I feel confident that should the Congress be requested to extend the amount of credit that can be advanced under this act we will certainly place a proviso in the law that not one cent of credit can be advanced to a belligerent nation.

Congress passed a law in 1937 in the hope it would keep us out of war. It now develops it is an instrument so worded that there is extreme danger it will draw us into war. Anyone who will carefully analyze the law cannot dispute this.

The mothers and fathers of those who will be required to fight our battles are praying their sons will never be called to the colors. So am I. Never do I want to see the day one American is sacrificed on the altar of war.

Regardless of whether our views are in accord, we should all feel that every American has but one desire, and that is that we remain at peace with the world.

I feel the great responsibility that is mine in this hour of peril and I pray for divine guidance.

Being constantly in touch with the officials of the Government and legislative branches, I can assure the people of the country I have yet to find one, regardless of views, but that wants our country to remain at peace.

When the President addressed Congress September 21, he said in part:

> Because I am wholly willing to ascribe an honorable desire for peace to those who hold different views from my own as to what those measures should be, I trust that these gentlemen will be sufficiently generous to ascribe equally lofty purposes to those with whom they disagree. Let no man or group in any walk of life assume exclusive protectorate over the future well-being of America—because I conceive that regardless of party or section, the mantle of peace and of patriotism is wide enough to cover us all. Let no group assume the exclusive label of the "peace bloc." We all belong to it.
> These perilous days demand cooperation between us without trace of partisanship. Our acts must be guided by one single hard-headed thought—keeping America out of this war.
> I should like to be able to offer the hope that the shadow over the world might swiftly pass. I cannot. The facts compel my stating, with candor, that darker periods may lie ahead. The disaster is not of our making; no act of ours engendered the forces which assault the foundations of civilization. Yet we find ourselves affected to the core; our currents of commerce are changing; our minds are filled with new problems; our position in world affairs has already been altered.
> In such circumstances our policy must be to appreciate in the deepest sense the true American interest. Rightly considered, this interest is not selfish. Destiny first made us, with our sister nations on this hemisphere, joint heirs of European culture. Fate seems now to compel us to assume the task of helping to maintain in the western world a citadel wherein that civilization may be kept alive. The peace, the integrity, and the safety of the Americas—these must be kept firm and serene. In a period when it is sometimes said that free discussion is no longer compatible with national safety, may you by your deeds show the world that we of the United States are one people, of one mind, one spirit, one clear resolution, walking before God in the light of the living.

In conclusion, let me assure you the one thought I will always have in mind is "Keep this country out of war."

God, the Father

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ADDRESS OF HON. LOUIS LUDLOW, OF INDIANA, TO THE CHRISTIAN MEN BUILDERS, INC., OF INDIANAPOLIS, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in these troubled times when the world is torn with passion and hate, when in so many countries bitterness and darkness have put in total eclipse the sweetness and light of religious faith, it is inspiring to find such organizations as Christian Men Builders, Inc., of Indianapolis, upholding with unsurpassed fervor the Christian standard of thought and living.

This association of devoted workers, known as Christian Men Builders, is in many respects wholly unique. It was organized 26 years ago last March, and during practically its entire existence Merle Sidener has been its leader. Mr. Sidener occupies an outstanding position in the esteem of our people.

The membership of Christian Men Builders is an interesting cross section of our community. It is composed of laborers, bankers, lawyers, clerks, newspapermen, professional men of all kinds—a composite of all of the respectable and respected elements that enter into city life. It is no uncommon sight for a man with working clothes on his body to sit side by side with a banker or a carefully groomed businessman. It is no place for snobs, but every true-blue man who wants an opportunity to do his bit to make this world a better place in which to live will find himself welcomed cordially and sincerely, whether he be clad in overalls or in the habilaments of the rich. Christian Men Builders, Inc., heartily subscribes to the philosophy of Robert Burns—

> A man's a man, for a' that.

It looks at his soul and not at the cut of his garments. If he is in earnest and willing to work, he finds the door that leads to humanitarian service is wide open. In the organization today are members of practically every denomination, all forgetful of the narrow limitations of creed while they band themselves together in the service of the Master. Christian Men Builders, Inc., is a nonprofit organization, nondenominational, and nonsectarian, a haven for all who wish to do worthwhile work for the relief of their fellow beings.

There are 3,000 members of the organization, and its Sunday meetings, which are broadcast over the radio, have an average attendance of over 900.

I was honored with an invitation to be the guest speaker of Christian Men Builders, Inc., on Sunday, September 24, on which occasion, after being introduced by Mr. Sidener, I spoke as follows:

> If I, a layman, am permitted a choice of subjects for this feeble effort to interpret the Divine will and purpose, which I call my first sermon, my subject shall be "God, the Father," and my text shall be the Lord's Prayer:
> "Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen."
> You will note that in instructing mortals how to pray Christ, the Saviour, taught them first of all to say "Our Father." Thus we have the highest authority likening the relationship of God to the human race as that of a father over his children. When the Savior selected this simile He knew He was choosing language that anyone could understand. Among all peoples, even primitive savages, the father is the recognized head of the household, whose feeling toward his children is that of tender solicitude. No plummet line can sound the depths of a father's affection for his children, and Christ, the Lord, epitomized in the most understanding way the loving and forgiving attitude of God toward mankind when He taught us to say "Our Father who art in Heaven."

What do we know about our Father who art in Heaven? No one has ever seen God, and the limitations of finite vision are such that we look through a glass darkly when we seek to discern the characteristics of the great Spirit who rules the universe. Yet as one who has lived a good while on this earth and whose fortune it has been to see Divinity in action on many different occasions I make the unqualified declaration that God is revealed to human beings in at least four ways, each one of which I shall discuss briefly.

GOD IN NATURE

First, God is revealed to mortals in Nature. Can anyone behold the beauty of a carnation, a chrysanthemum, or a gardenia, or survey the star-lit heavens above him on a cloudless night and say in his heart that there is no God? God's imprimatur is on all nature. Every rose petal, every leaf, every twinkling star is a testimonial to Divinity. Can anyone doubt the fatherhood of God when he takes into account the provision that has been made for the sustenance of the human race—the blessed rains that make the seeds to germinate and the sprouts to penetrate the earth, the sunshine and the shadows that chase each other over the billowy fields and make the crops to grow and ripen and finally the golden harvest, and then another year comes around and Nature's program is repeated and all the wonderful productivity of Nature burgeons forth anew, and so on forever? Is anyone so blind that he cannot see in these recurrent miracles of Nature a loving God, or Father, as Christ calls Him, keeping watch above His own?

No one has ever seen the face of God, it is true; but all nature is eloquent with testimonials that there is a Supreme Ruler whose love for you and me and all of His other creatures is boundless. Witness the untold millions of tons of coal He has planted in the hills and mountains to warm us in the wintertime; the vast deposits of oil He has stored in the bosom of the earth to drive our wheels and looms; the lavish prodigality of the life-sustaining products of our farms and orchards; the sea food that abounds in every ocean, only waiting to be brought to our tables. These and countless other great sources of human supply did not just happen. They indicate a divine plan and purpose. They are a revelation of God.

Take a watermelon, for instance. A combination of a little seed and the earth, moistened by the rains and warmed by the sun, produces a 50-pound melon weighing 300,000 times as much as the seed from which it sprang. Its exterior is green, and within that exterior is a layer of white, and within the white is a luscious core of red, and through the red core seed are scattered, each one capable of continuing the work of reproduction. I wonder if any person who stops to think can partake of a tangerine without associating it with a loving Providence. Here we have a succulent bit of fruit with a protective covering so amenable to the finger touch that no effort is required to remove it, and tucked away on the inside we find the delicious fruit in segments, each segment an ordinary mouthful. Did a tangerine just happen so? No; it is one of the innumerable evidences of divine planning. A thousand other examples might be given of God's kindness as a provider for human needs, such as the egg, the orange, the apple, the wealth of summer and autumn's rich cornucopia of ripened fruits and grain.

The discoveries of the astronomers, marvelous as those discoveries are, do not reveal among the starry corridors the Supreme Ruler whose will established order in the universe; and yet I cannot imagine a more amazing or more convincing revelation of divinity than the orderly processes of the planets. A story is told of a German astronomer, an expert in reading the heavens, who predicted that 75 years hence certain heavenly bodies would be in a certain relative position observable only from a point 10,000 miles away. The astronomer died. His son, to whom he had made the prediction, lived the allotted span of life, and he, too, died. When the time approached the astronomer's grandson journeyed 10,000 miles to the point of indicated observation, and he saw through the telescope exactly what his grandfather 75 years before had predicted would come true. Asked if the phenomenon had taken place as forecast by his grandparent, he said:

"Yes; on the exact second."

Can anyone imagine what would happen to the universe if there were not a living God to keep the planets in their orbits? The first line of the first book of the Bible says: "In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth." Does anyone have to direct his attention further than to the daily rotation of the earth and the annual revolution of the planet around the sun to be convinced that God still rules the heaven and the earth? When we go to sleep at night we do not worry lest there should be no daybreak on the morrow. We know, or if we consult an almanac we can know, the exact time when the sun will rise next morning. Our confidence that the earth will continue to revolve as usual is an unconscious tribute to our conviction that God is in His heaven and that all's well with the world.

GOD REVEALED IN HUMAN ACTIONS

The second way God is revealed is in the acts of Godlike men and women. With all the dross in poor human nature, there is a residium of nobility in every soul that is Godlike in character. That residium is likely to manifest itself in the most unexpected times and circumstances, and when it does it seems to justify, often with dramatic vividness, the Biblical assertion that man is made in the image of his Maker. Behold a really good man and you see our nearest earthly approach to God.

Every one of us can recall from his own book of recollections acts of human beings that reflect the goodness of God. When I was a boy 18 years old I was stricken with typhoid fever. We lived in a section of rural Indiana where the wilderness was still more a fact than a memory. I was at first violently delirious, and then for months my life hung by a slender thread. The old country doctor said that everything depended upon the care with which I was watched over and nursed. I do not suppose anyone in our neighborhood had ever heard of a trained nurse whose services could be had for hire. What did the neighbors do? Knowing that my father and mother were worn almost to death and could not cope with the problem, they volunteered their services, freely and without stint, to save my life. In relays they came from many miles around and watched by my bedside, two of our neighbors sitting up with me all night after a hard day's work in the fields, to be followed the next night by two more, and so on, week after week, until I got a new grip on life. They would have been deeply hurt if anyone had suggested monetary compensation for their loving services. The only reward they ever received was my eternal gratitude. They were simple country folk, but they made me feel the goodness of God.

Every now and then something resembling divinity flashes up like a bright and shining meteor in human conduct. I was sitting in the Press Gallery at Washington many years ago when a Representative from the State of Colorado arose to make a solemn announcement. He had been duly sworn in and seated as a Member of the great lawmaking body, but what he arose to say was that he had been making a study of the election returns and that he had come to the conclusion that he had not been elected and that his opponent had been elected. Suiting his actions to his words, he sent his resignation to the Speaker's desk and asked that his seat be vacated and that his opponent be sworn in to succeed him. I had never seen anything quite like that happen, and I said to myself, "God must be pleased by this honest man." Evidently the people of Colorado were pleased, too, for after that they sent John F. Shafroth to the Governor's office and then to the Senate of the United States. Death a few years ago closed his illustrious career and he was widely mourned.

Actions do not need to be monumental in size to reflect the spirit of divinity. Some of the smallest attentions awaken in the hearts of the recipients a great response. Some weeks ago, following adjournment of Congress, worn almost to death, I went on a long ocean trip to try to find rest. I did not know that anyone was aware of my departure, but when our ship had cleared New York Harbor and all of the familiar landmarks had faded in the distance the purser handed me a bunch of telegrams and special-delivery letters from Indiana friends wishing me bon voyage. I cannot tell you how much I appreciated those messages of love. It was a thoughtful thing for my friends to do and it did so touch the heartstrings.

When Ralph Waldo Emerson was a tottering old man, broken physically and mentally by the infirmities of age, he attended the funeral of his lifelong friend, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. He gazed pensively for a long time at the face of his friend in the coffin and then in feeble voice he remarked:

"I don't know his name, but he was a good man."

And so it is that if we look with eyes of discernment we can see in every really good man a reflection of the glorious image of God.

CONSCIENCE THE VOICE OF GOD

A third way in which God is revealed to us is in the conscience that exists in every human being. The voice of conscience is the voice of God. Every person that lives is equipped with one of these silent monitors called conscience. It may be in bad working order. It may be seared and warped until it is almost out of commission, but there it is. On questions of right and morality it is an unerring guide, and if we follow it we will not go wrong. The weakness of human nature is such that we do not give the attention we should pay to the dictates of conscience. We are continually persuading ourselves that the promptings of conscience need not be taken too literally; that when the voice of conscience says "Thou shalt not" it means "Maybe we can."

GOD REVEALED THROUGH CHRIST

And now I come to the fourth and last way God is revealed to the world, and that is through the life and mission of Jesus Christ, the Savior. This is the most important of the many phases of revelation, because it carries with it the idea of atonement and redemption. Through it the loving fatherhood of God shines most luminously. This is the chapter that links us with the eternal and makes us a part of the everlasting kingdom of God through the forgiveness of sins. It says to me, a sinner:

"You have said that you are sorry and you have asked to be forgiven. You are forgiven. Your past is a closed chapter. Forget it and come with me."

It is this marvelous transformation from bondage to freedom, from darkness to light, that is envisioned in the Lord's Prayer: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven." I have always believed that this part of the prayer dictated by the Saviour himself is loaded with meaning. I have always believed it foreshadows a possibility of the overthrow of wickedness and the establishment of God's kingdom on this marvelous earth of ours, and that it offers to each and every one of us a part in ushering in the kingdom. The earth with all its seemingly limitless domain, its mountains, and its seas, is but a tiny segment of the universe; but it is comforting to know that we are not too insignificant and remote to come within the scope of God's encircling love. I have always believed that Christ spoke with supreme authority and divine vision when he taught us to pray:

"Thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven."

If I have caught the significance and implications of Christ's life and mission, this means that we may join God's eternal kingdom right here on earth, and by availing ourselves of the innumerable opportunities that are offered to help others, we may earn our place in the eternal kingdom and walk in strength and rectitude until we meet the Father face to face.

One of the most beautiful attributes of the kingdom of God is its open door to the poor and lowly of the earth. It is no closed corporation. At its table is always spread a feast of love and whosoever will may come, the only condition being that he who seeks to enter shall be contrite and pure of heart. Thank God, salvation is without price. In my long career as an observer of human values I can truthfully say that I have found virtue more often in hovels than in palaces. It has been my lot to meet countless thousands of human beings—God's run of the mine—and as far as my finite vision can discern, some of the lowliest and meekest of those I have known will be among the greatest in the kingdom of God. There is no educational test for admission to God's kingdom. Some of the best persons I have ever known, the personification of all that is good and kind and true, whose departure years ago from the kingdom of God on earth to the kingdom of God above left a pain in my heart that still aches and throbs, could hardly read or write. The most impressive and dramatic lesson in the Bible is the parable of the Good Samaritan. If anyone were to ask me how a title to a place in the kingdom of God can be secured, without fail, I would advise him to do as the Good Samaritan did. It is a part of God's eternal plan that those who show mercy to others will have mercy shown to them. The true Christian is one whose conscience never sleeps. He is always thinking and planning ways to be of service to others. He is forever sounding the depths of compassion and searching the limitless possibilities of love. "Love," said the great seer, Emerson, "is our highest word, and it is the synonym for God." We can do nothing better, we can do nothing finer, we can do nothing grander than to help our fellow mortals over the rough places of life. That is what Jesus of Nazareth did, that is what all the saints of all the ages have done, that is the very essence of Christianity. To sincere human beings, earnestly wishing to justify our existence in a world where there is so much to be done to relieve suffering and distress, where there is so much need of love and mercy, it is an appealing thought that by helping others we can earn our way to salvation. The formula for Christian service is very simple and to do our part it is not necessary to worry over the unexplainable mysteries of life. If we go about genuinely and sincerely trying to help our fellow mortals, if we will do all the good we can, to all the people we can, in as many ways as we can, just as long as we can, we will have the blessed consciousness of work well done and as the evening of life approaches we will walk serenely toward the sunset with God's everlasting arms around us.

Let Us Make Democracy Safe in America

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, September 28, 1939

ARTICLE BY R. ARMISTEAD GRADY

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, while so much time is being spent and so much thought being given as to how far, if at all, we should endanger the peace and democracy of America in order to throw American influence and perhaps American youth into the bloody balance scales of Europe, it is well that we recall that there is still much work to be done at home in order to safeguard the democracy we now enjoy here.

Let us not let the seductive lure of internationalism lull us into becoming oblivious to the fact that there is much we can do to preserve democracy in America without, as Senator BORAH so aptly put it, "Fumbling with the hinges of hell," by becoming involved in Europe's holocaust through a doubtful desire to make profits from the pitfalls of international greed.

Let us give more time to the business of making America great and good than we give to the business of getting America gory from the bloodstains of a war in which we have no business unless our avarice for business profits causes us to send the flower of American youth once again to the slaughter beds of Europe as an inevitable sequel to our greed for the fool's gold of blood-stained murder money.

For the thoughtful reading of all who are unwilling to "gamble your life for their country," ladies and gentlemen of Congress, I give you a statement entitled "Let Us Make Democracy Safe in America," which was written by my good friend R. Armistead Grady, of Duluth, Minn., secretary of the Minnesota-Dakotas District of Kiwanis International, and expressing as only Armistead Grady can a sentiment which I hope and believe is shared by the vast majority of the Members of this Congress.

LET US MAKE DEMOCRACY SAFE IN AMERICA

Let us make democracy safe in America!
Let us make minds, souls, and bodies safe in America!
Let us make labor, art, and science safe in America!
Let us make God safe in America!

Perhaps we can save a mad world, but let us first strive to save children's minds from sewage sloughs, their bodies from starvation and disease, and their spirits from utter blindness. There—is a battle for the most courageous.

Perhaps we may penetrate a jungle and maim or kill a wild beast, but let us first encircle our home with the protecting flame of peace, plenty, knowledge, and strength of body and soul.

Let the vermin, the snakes and the wild beasts of the jungle battle within the jungle, peer from its borders, and cringe at the wall of protecting fire between jungle and clearing. Let us fight back the jungle if it encroach upon our homes. Let us fight back from the sun-lit clearing, not from the black, treacherous, mired and slimey center.

Let us have the smoke of creation, of building, of production, soaring high above our cities. Spare us from the pall of low-hung smoke of destruction.

Let us spend money, aye—all of our buried gold and all of our minted pieces of silver that a wall of security surround American homes. That wide and smooth highways stream from end to end of America. That the air be filled with carrier birds and watchful eagles. That from coast to coast steel rails glisten and carry men, machines, and the plenty of land and sea to all our cities and all our peoples. That field, prairie, and even desert yield bountifully.

Aye, let us spend much money in the building of schools, colleges, and universities that every child may reach the end and zenith of its natural bent and desire in mental accomplishment. Let us spend money lavishly that science may progress in magnificent laboratories; and more money that hospitals, many hospitals, may heal the sick and make strong the weak. Dig up the buried treasure and build many factories, homes and schools. Encircle America with a protecting flame of life, not death. Life—strong, proud, sane, courageous, spiritual.

Let us make life, thought, yea God, safe in America and democracy will be reborn in a mad and tortured world; for a weary people will see, comprehend and say "it is good."

Let us fight for America and Americans. Let us fight that every American man have work. That every American mother have peace. That every American child have health and opportunity for development of mind and spirit. Let us make America so safe, so happy, so soaring, all peoples will say "This is good. This is possible. We will build likewise. We will demand that our own beloved lands become safe for men, for women, for chidren, for God."

Let us make democracy and Americans safe in America!

The European Crisis

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESSES BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK; PROF. CHARLES HODGES, OF NEW YORK UNIVERSITY; AND MR. SOLOMON PORTNOW

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio addresses recently delivered by Prof. Charles Hodges, Mr. Solomon Portnow, and myself:

Mr. PORTNOW. Ladies and gentlemen, with Europe on a powder keg, it seems somewhat ironic to call a round table to discuss the European crises. In the "white war of nerves" discussion seems to have run out its course tonight.

London, Paris, Berlin are blacked out. Mobilization seems complete according to latest dispatches, and optimism for a peaceful solution is very low.

While the world waits the inside behind the news is what we are concerned with in the studios tonight.

The New York University Forum Hour has therefore called this special session to give you an analysis at this critical zero hour.

America's policies have yet to be formulated if war breaks out. What role we shall play is indeed the profoundest problem facing us.

At the moment we have no bulletin to read to you. But while we are waiting, let us hear from two prominent persons who are experts in their respective fields of public and international politics.

We are honored this evening to have with us Congressman SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and author of the resolutions investigating un-American activities in the United States. Our second speaker is Prof. Charles Hodges, observer and analyst of international affairs and professor of international politics at New York University.

First, we hear from Congressman DICKSTEIN:

ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

After many years of propaganda and the imposition of alien ideas of many peoples and nations, Hitler was ready to aim his master stroke in the destruction of the Republic of Poland. Years of success are behind him. He was able by threats and blackmail to destroy the liberties of Austria, Czechoslovakia, and of his own German people.

Today Germany is no longer a civilized country. It is a tyrrany, brutally ruled by a master madman.

The other day a German boat came to port filled with people escaping from a possible European war. The boat was filled to capacity, but a strange thing was noticed about its German passengers. Every one of them would be looking around in all directions before he or she would have a word to say to American reporters. This is something that has been observed very often about Germans coming to this country. They all have what is known as the "German look," looking around before they answer any questions to make sure that they are not overheard by spies.

Hitler has made Germany a country infested with spies. No one is allowed to say anything displeasing to the Nazi regime or anything which the Nazi regime considers detrimental to its cause. At present the movies and the radio are censored; the schools teach you that there is only one nation which amounts to something, and that is Germany; and the rest of the world consists of mediocre slaves who should consider themselves happy to submit to the German yoke. As to Poland, of course, not one pleasant word is said; it is a country which in the opinion of the German Government does not deserve to live, because Hitler needs "lebensraun" for his own people. The Germans are entitled to living space, the Germans are entitled to expansion in all directions, the Germans are entitled to impose their ideas and ideologies on the whole world, but no other nations are allowed to breathe.

The United States has for a period of 6 years been bombarded with constant Nazi propaganda. The ships of the North German Lloyd have in recent years brought in tons of antidemocratic and treasonable literature extolling the virtues of Hitlerism and Fascism, and telling Americans how to convert this country into a Nazi paradise, by arraying one American against the other. All these efforts have, however, been in vain. The American people, quick to sense Germany's propaganda machine, have been alert, and were not diverted from their love of liberty, and would not fall for the idea of fighting Germany's wars when the German consuls began to send out army registration blanks, not only to their own citizens but to Americans, a condition of affairs which I exposed on the floor of the House of Representatives several months ago.

A plea was made to the conscience of the world to permit Germany to keep all she was able to acquire by force on the theory that the world is better off that way. Early last week Hitler thought he was playing his trump card by signing a nonaggression pact with Russia, although he claimed for many years that he was fighting communism, and that nazi-ism was opposed to communism.

You may recall that several years ago when I was instrumental in the creation of a committee to investigate un-American activities in the United States, I called un-American and lumped together facism, communism, and nazi-ism as inimical to our institutions and our form of government. It was my contention right along that these seemingly opposite forces are in reality all aimed to destroy our form of government, irrespective of whether they assault us from the right or from the left. Democracy, as we understand it to be is a form of life equally obnoxious to dictators of the type of Hitler and of the type of Stalin. Human dignity, the liberty of the individual count for nothing in a totalitarian state. Whether or not human liberty is to be destroyed in the name of racialism or in the name of a dictatorship of the proletariat is immaterial, the important thing is that human liberty is being destroyed by totalitarian states, no matter what they call themselves.

I feel that we in America are having a particularly trying time of it. Of course, we are lovers of liberty; of course, we believe in the dignity of man; of course, we believe that wrong should be righted—but we do not believe that wars settle anything, and as much as we may desire to see the democracies win in the forthcoming struggle, we cannot allow ourselves to be dragged into war but can best preserve the interests of mankind by remaining neutral.

Neutrality does not mean lack of interest. It does not mean that we can close our eyes and permit totalitarian states to overrun democracies. Surely we cannot allow Hitler any bloodless victories or any victory gained at the expense of trampling on human rights. We remember so well what happened 1½ years ago in Austria. We remember what happened so very recently when the protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia was established.

Wherever Hitler set his foot it meant death and oppression. There is an old Polish saying that where a German once establishes himself liberty and justice are gone forever. While this statement might be extreme, and while I do not wish to condemn the whole German race because of the brutality of a Hitler, it is true that where the German seeks expansion it can only be at the expense of other nations, and where one nation is trying to destroy the liberties of another there can be no two opinions as to where our sympathies should lie.

In its political career as a free nation Poland has repeatedly made mistakes. It did not, for instance, take proper care of its minorities, but under the present circumstances I am sure that Poland will see that oppression of other nations or races does not pay and that real peace can only be had when there is cooperation among all races and nationalities composing a commonwealth.

America has been the shining example to the rest of the world how nationalities can live together and races can form a united nation. America has as many nationalities as Europe; in fact, it has more of some nationalities than Europe. It has been liberal in admitting people of all races and climes to settle within its borders and to form a new nation which, in the words of Lincoln, "was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men were created equal." Nevertheless, the example of America was not followed by Europe. We have an intense nationalism that seeks to destroy one nation by another if it happens to be in its way. Hitler is the typical example of a ruthless leader who will swallow little nations in the name of a fantastic racial theory. After destroying the little nations he may turn to the larger nations with the same object.

Fortunately the world at large cannot sit by and permit him to do so. It is true that military preparedness has cost Europe a tremendous sum of money. It is true that billions were spent in armaments, battleships, and the military machinery designed to curb Hitler's further ambitions. All this expenditure will have been in vain if mankind will keep on "appeasing the beast" and some definite plan is not immediately formulated to see to it that there shall be no reocurrence of a war by blackmail. At this time it is hard to tell whether or not mankind will be able to avoid a war in order to curb Hitler and what he stands for. There is no question, however, that his method of achieving bloodless victories has been definitely stopped. There is no longer a question of how soon a threatened nation will submit to blackmail. There will be no further blackmail paid.

America has always been a great prize to go after. When my committee on un-American activities was functioning a few years ago I called to the attention of the public this vicious propaganda which I was afraid would finally destroy our free press, free speech, and free assembly. Fortunately, the American people, ever vigilant in protecting their liberties, did not permit this to be done. It is to the everlasting credit of our people that in spite of persistent, vicious, and poisonous propaganda which tried to poison all the sources of public opinion in the United States, and in spite of the vicious campaign of hatred which Hitler launched, our people remained true to their democratic ideals, and we hope the time will never come when our democratic ideals should fall by the wayside.

And so now, when war clouds are menacing, when it seems that the whole civilized world is rocking on the edge of the abyss, we, in America must proudly keep the torch of liberty aflame. It is up to us to give mankind that one refuge against nationalistic excesses and government by blackmail.

The last war still leaves us with bitter memories of sabotage at Kingsland and Black Tom. Here the work of German spies caused untold damage and destruction. This sort of sabotage must not be repeated. In this country at present Nazi Germany has ready and waiting over 300 agents, seeking to cause serious trouble in the United States. We must at once reenforce the Intelligence Service of our Army and Navy to cope with this situation.

ADDRESS OF PROF. CHARLES HODGES

This week opened with Poland's problem the problem of peace. By midweek this Polish problem had been transformed by the axis powers, under the drive of Hitler's diplomacy, into a European problem as a much larger basis for peace or war. Tonight this European problem in turn has become a world problem. It makes the preservation of peace as definitely the task of the United States as of any other power on the face of the globe. This crucial concern in the maintenance of what is left of the semblance of public order round the world does not permit Washington to engage in a Hamlet-like soliloquy of detachment, "To act or not to act."

The only question which confronts the Roosevelt administration today is the method of participation in the last desperate efforts to preserve peace. More sinister a thought—What part will the United States play if the desperate gamble of Hitler leads to the war of blood?

The Nazi, their Fascist partner to the south, and their newfound Communist friends to the east are being driven forward by the operation of the feared "military timetable" of embattled Europe. The march of events under this heretofore inexorable schedule of military necessity has never permitted Europe in the past to escape the disastrous consequences of general mobilization. These are war.

The reason for my pessimistic position regarding the prospects of peace and our detachment from every world crisis or its aftermath, world war, is simple. It lies in the essentially imperialistic nature of Nazi Germany's philosophy of life. Even Premier Chamberlain understands this; and we should see by now that Germany's policy has opened up into ever-widening circles of demands. Each builds outward to overshadow more and more of Europe. Eventually the lengthening shadow of the swastika, according to every bit of Nazi documentation from Hitler's "Mein Kampf" to Dr. Goebbel's not exactly disarming propaganda, must, according to these apostles of expansion, extend to every quarter of the globe. The very core of nazi-ism today in Europe is the strident assertion of Germanic supremacy.

The foundations for expansion lie in the understandable doctrine of inclusion of all "lost" Germans bordering the Third Reich of 1933 within a Greater Germany. This made for a divided world opinion on the anschluss with Austria—even at the pre-Munich stages of the drive to include the Sudeten Germans and the handful on the Baltic at Memel. This gave to what now was hailed as "Gross Deutschland"—"Greater Germany"—just under 80,000,000 of Germanic peoples. With the extinction of the surviving part of Czechoslovakia and its transformation this spring into the so-called Bohemian and Moravian protectorates the mask dropped from national socialism. Open imperialism without any racial basis save the demand for this thing that the Germans call "lebensraum," or "living space," appeared. This is the assertion, substantially speaking, that Nazi Germany has a primary right to a superior existence in Europe, together with such extra European resources as are necessary to maintain the leadership level which is the first tenet of the Nazi doctrine of power politics.

Already the Nazi Germany that yesterday only wanted to recover all its "lost" Germans in order to live as a homogeneous national state in delightful peace with the rest of the world has by its racial imperialism incorporated within its boasted 87,000,000 of people minorities who now constitute one-tenth of the whole population of the Greater Reich. Remember that Germany first appealed to world opinion to let her go ahead and get rid of the injustices which arose from these "lost" Germans being outside the fatherland, though more than half of the Austrians did not wish anschluss, and propaganda could make no headway with the Sudeten Germans in cracking open Czechoslovakia until they had disposed of Austria. Breaking down the forcibly included minorities into their rough totals gives us 7,000,000 of Czechs; over a million and a half Poles; 150,000 Slovenians or Carinthians within Austria, or people called Chorvats; 130,000 Lusitians or Wend folk; 78,000 Lithuanians; 12,000 Danes; 8,000 Hungarians; 5,000 Slovaks; and 4,000 Friesians. When we add to this total of 8,887,000 non-Germans held deliberately within the Reich some 500,000 Jews plus 800,000 half Jews, counting all Semites by the Nazi racial theory, we find a total number of 10,200,000 "protected" people.

The operation of Nazi philosophy at this point is pretty significant for the future of international relations. These racial groups face a grim choice: Either "compulsory extinction" or emigration from this nazified greater Germany to lands called the "sub-Germanic zone of waste" by one of the official political geographers of Nazi thought. In the Nazi scheme of things it bears the popular term of "Germanische Befehlsraum" or an "area of Germanic disposition." Since Germany is a proudly proclaimed totalitarian state, obviously the Reich does not recognize the very idea itself of minorities. Equally, obviously, its internal and external policies must be applied to the elimination of minorities inside the bounds of Germany and to the subordination of what the Germans regard as the ring of inferior peoples eastward and southward to Nazi overlordship.

The real destiny of these "inferior" peoples would be to maintain themselves in an inferior status as servile nations upon which the superior Germans can erect a new imperium only Roman in its geographic concepts.

The whole force of Nazi Germany is behind Hitler's drive for what national socialism calls living space—lebensraum.

The Nazi dominion, nothing more than a Hitlerized version of the old pre-war middle Europe and its eastward march, represents the idea of economic penetration paving the way for political overlordship. The economic occupation of Austria, followed by that of Czechoslovakia, simply provided the Nazi with new outlets for the economic expansion underlying political domination. Poland, with its Anglo-French backers, therefore constitutes a rebel in the Nazi scheme of things.

Such a fanlike expansion of the Third Reich from its fortress-like position in Central Europe over the countries lying to the northeast, east, and southeast of the existing empire means control over 113,000,000 inhabitants. Ninety-nine percent of them have not a drop of German blood in their veins. That these are nations who have their own ambitions for national existence in their own way of living only constitutes an offense in the eyes of Hitler and his camp followers of oppression. The Nazis proclaim their determination to dictate life and death to a block of 200,000,000 people. This means dictation of European destinies for a lifetime—a power that must upset the rest of the world, with decisive effects upon the existence of all of us. There is here the real threat of world-wide regimentation.

Listen to the words of Reich's economic minister, Dr. Walter Funk, declared on March 28, 1939:

"Our boundaries enclose today the most industrialized country in the world. Its outposts have firmly gripped the territory between the North and the Black Seas. Under present conditions, the world has but one alternative—either to cooperate with Germany or to face an inevitable destruction of its national economy. The countries of eastern and southern Europe must submit to cooperation with the self-adjusted economic system under the leadership of the Reich."

Something of the real purpose of trade domination came to me from Nazi authorities. They have sought the major place in the trade of these countries because when they have 50 percent of this commerce they overthrow any government eastward by use of this economic blackjack. The Nazi can wreck, they say, any regime under these circumstances by precipitating revolution.

I have detailed the record of Nazi expansion in Europe. I have applied the Nazi language, brutal though it may sound in American ears, to this system of aggrandizement. This is because it is there—a fundamental historic truth behind every surge of empire. No such imperialistic impulse stops the extension of its overlordship until one of two things happens—either it is blocked by superior force or the dream of a new universal Roman empire is realized as a Pax Germanicus with world-wide dimensions in this day of superspeed transportation on land, sea, and in the air.

There is no such thing as a reasonable imperialism in world politics, because the essence of empire building down through the ages is force. The physics of power politics now ascendant in Europe, now supremely expressed by Hitlerism, is a force that automatically reaches to every part of the globe. It only stops ultimately when it meets adequate countervailing force. This means that the United States cannot choose between "holding aloof" or "doing something" about the present European crisis. The only choice appears to me to be the moment at which we propose to meet this challenge to our way of living and the means which we propose to employ to check the course of a new barbarism round the globe.

At this point we come down to statesmanship in detail—even to the words and the punctuation of the laws of this democracy which affect our foreign policy. These obviously center about the long controversy over neutrality. My position is that real neutrality in the lofty moral atmosphere of the nineteenth century has no meaning for us today. The issue is not whether we are going to fold our hands and do nothing about the destruction now imminent of our kind of world or whether we are to throw another A. E. F. into a new western front. The only question is how we may dispose of our great power to tilt the scales in favor of conditions which most nearly express in the outside world what we are striving for within the framework of American life.

Roughly speaking, Americans at this juncture are interested in a world where changes by chronic crises and the threat of military action or its actual employment cease. This does not mean that we are concerned with the maintenance of what is left of the Versailles peace, with the clamping down simply in favor of the so-called "have" nations of all prospects of change in the status quo. We are both idealistically and realistically committed to pacific adjustment and repudiation of all the methods of diplomatic terrorism and blackmail which have typefied the Fascist philosophy of "dangerous living" in action.

The next few days therefore mean to me that over and above the technicalities of neutrality legislation the United States will find itself faced with a fundamental decision. This will determine the whole character of changes in our legal definition of international purposes at this supreme moment. This means that if Europe's plunge toward war is halted by what is now more than the eleventh-hour conference, this zero-hour meeting must lead to a redefinition of world interests. This comes as straight to Washington as it does to Berlin, Paris, London, Rome, Moscow, and Tokyo—not even to forget Warsaw itself. If the poised military machines of Europe tomorrow lunge forward in their wrecking of western civilization, even more does Washington face the necessity of straightforward, unequivocal determination of where our interests lie in this challenge of force. Of one thing I am certain myself: They do not lie on the sidelines. There can be no sidelines in a second world war. Even those who would stand and wait become passive participants in a struggle for the direction of world life.

Mr. PORTNOW. Thank you, Professor Hodges.

Ladies and gentlemen, you have just heard a special session of the New York University Forum Hour, arranged in cooperation with station WEVD, on the European crisis. The last speaker you heard was Professor Hodges, observer and analyst of international affairs and professor of international politics at New York University. He was preceded by the Honorable SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, New York Member of Congress.

We interrupted our regular schedule at this time to bring you an analysis of the very latest developments abroad.

Now, our time is up, and before signing off may I remind you that we resume our series of high-lighting public affairs on September 14.

Until then this is your chairman, Solomon Portnow, saying good night, and cordially inviting all of you to be with us again when we go on the air 2 weeks from tonight.

Good night.

Veterans and Neutrality

OF
HON. STEPHEN BOLLES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I am asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from Henry A. Friede, Wisconsin department commander of Disabled American Veterans of the World War. Mr. Friede says:

You have been summoned for a special session of Congress by our President, and apparently for one reason only, and that is to change the neutrality law which was lauded by him 3 years ago as being an outstanding piece of legislation, but today, according to his way of thinking, is obsolete.

It is hard to believe that a President of this great Nation of ours would make a statement about protecting English possessions in the Western Hemisphere with American troops even after they have declared war on Germany, and this statement was made without sanction from your honorable body. So many things have happened during the last year which lead one to believe that he is strictly pro-English or pro-French. When a situation like this exists we, the people, have only one hope and that is that our Representatives in Washington will realize and vote with only one thought in mind, and that is to not only be neutral to the letter but also in spirit. The writer feels that to change the neutrality law at this time will be our first step in entering the war on the side of a group of defaulting nations who now owe us over $16,000,000,000 in post-war debts, and who have got their heads together, and when we try to collect so much as tell us to try and get it. Furthermore, all war debts incurred during the war, which amounted to many more billions, have been wiped off the books. Should we enter another war we will be forced to loan many more billions, which no doubt our children and grandchildren will be struggling to pay in American taxes. Furthermore, it is common knowledge that these European nations spent many, many billions for armament; still they insist they are too poor to pay us. The World War cost the American Government—and we are still paying in the form of compensation to the disabled veterans—many millions a year, and these payments will continue for a long time to come, and a new war will undoubtedly add billions more to our compensation payments, which again will go on for years and years until the last veteran or his dependents die.

It is the writer's sincere hope that you will do your utmost to see that the present neutrality law will remain as it is and the officials in Washington who insist on trying to pull us into the war are put on the spot publicly and that their activities are called to the attention of the public.

Trusting that you will do your utmost to prevent this Nation from being drawn into this war, and also to prevent the slaughter of the American youth for the sake of a group of defaulting nations, I am,

Sincerely yours, HENRY A. FRIEDE.

The Voice of the People versus Warmongers

OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post, September 26, in an article entitled "Letter Bloc in Action," the writer makes this statement:

The largest influence against President Roosevelt's program about neutrality is letters coming in to Members of Congress from the country. There are other influences, yet it is safe to say that but for the letters, the President's proposal would be enacted readily.

The writer then asks, "What are these letters and what do they say?" From that point on the writer's assumption as regards the letters and the Congressmen's attitude is wrong, for I believe most letters are read and answered.

I find the majority of my letters very interesting. It is true, as the columnist intimates, that practically all the writers are opposed to war—and why not? It is the so-called common or middle-class people who always fight in the defense of the Republic. It is the same people who pay for the war and who are left holding the bag when the war is over. It is these people who are impoverished when the war makers, the international financiers, and the "invisible government" accumulate the gold, wealth, and power. It is the middle class or common people, of which I am one, that objects to war. The reason for this is no doubt due to the fact that they are looking face to face at their enemy—the "invisible government."

The first immigrants who came here to work and build were poor in estate but rich in the hope of human rights and liberties. They were not afraid to labor and build homes for themselves and for posterity. It is those early settlers who must be accredited as builders of this Nation, and it is the now increasing middle class that carries on.

They were happy until they fell afoul of the money changers, but they have been miserable since the advent of the financiers. They are positively in despair since the international financiers became articulate by wielding power through the "invisible government." It is now surprising that these people want to remain at peace? And that they object to sending their children to war to suffer and die for the "invisible government," and to further enslave themselves in the toils of this international monster? Let those who question their patriotism take heed, for each and all would rally to repel invasion of this continent, as they will to protect the United States against the destructive activities of the Socialist and Communist that are now operating under the beneficence of the "invisible government."

Is it now any wonder that these people—our people—do not want war? Is it strange that they might refuse to fight the second World War for the international exploiters in the "invisible government"? Is it not much more likely that our next war will be against the Socialist, the Communist, the international exploiters and financiers for destruction of their "sugar daddy," the "invisible government"?

Is it not much more important to get rid of the subversionist, the socialist, and the Communist, and is it not to our interest to get rid of political rot, intrigue, and double dealing in our own Government and its many departments? It is within the people's power to rescue our Nation from this rapidly swelling river of filth, rot, and intrigue before it is carried over the precipice into a whirlpool of internal strife.

In our own interest, let us fight the next war to restore our own Government to a democratic republic, based on the ever-sound and fundamental principles so clearly set forth in the Constitution of the United States. Let us restore the link which was removed in 1913—the seventeenth amendment.

Article I, section 3, of the Constitution states:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for 6 years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Article IV, section 4, says:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Article V, in part, states:

No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Article VI says, in part:

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The adoption of the seventeenth amendment was not in pursuance of the Constitution, for the United States no longer can guarantee every State in the Union a republican form of government, because in the adoption of the seventeenth amendment the States were deprived of equal suffrage in the Senate (art. I, sec. 3).

The causes which were instrumental in shaping public approval for the adoption of the seventeenth amendment were no doubt engineered by the invisible government to bring about what we have today—a "democracy," or communistic state. The irony of all this is that the slogan in the World War was too true. We were successful in saving the world for "democracy," for we now have communism, its identical twin. These Siamese twins, "democracy" and "communism," are the war babies now undermining and destroying our democratic Republic. We, the people, must unite to get rid of this monstrous offspring and its parents in the invisible government. We are loyal Americans when we face the Constitution and the flag and traitors when we turn our backs upon them.

Mr. Speaker, what is the power of the people in this Nation? It is within their power to take charge of the Government through the Congress of the United States. If Congress fails to obey the orders as given in the Constitution, the people must, in common defense and for the general welfare of themselves, take charge. It is therefore imperative that we, Members of Congress, assume our constitutional responsibility to the people and to our Nation.

The people demand that the Government remain neutral. It is the duty of Congress to comply with this command of the people, so that there will be no cause for war. For the columnists to insinuate that the letters we receive are inspired by foreign nations is in itself an affront to the people. Such statements are in reality a subtle type of propaganda, no different from that which now fills the pages of the "kept" press. It is inspired by the "invisible government" and paid for by those who now control world gold and credit. Statements like this are deceptive:

> In this situation, various suggestions are made. One is that the mass of letters be examined to see how many are in identical words. If many are identical, it would suggest that the letter writing is to a large extent organized and promoted. Then it is suggested that inquiry be made to find out who, or what organizations, are conducting the campaign. It is suggested further that there be counterorganizations to promote the writing of letters in favor of the President's proposal.

It can readily be seen that such investigation as the writer suggests would bring about persecution of those who differ from the administration and the "invisible government." It would differ from the present investigations only in that it would end in investigation and persecution of private patriotic citizens who object to again sending their children to the front to die for the "invisible government." Why not investigate sources of propaganda in films, radio, and in the "kept" press, and the propaganda spewed by hired writers? Why are the special investigating committees engaged in searching for an excuse to silence patriotic papers and in investigating subscribers to such papers? Why is the investigating organization employed to trump up charges against those who are engaged in publishing facts instead of propaganda pleasing to the "invisible government"? Why all this tomfoolery, when the Communists are so thick that the investigators may break their necks stumbling over them? What are we—mice or men—to tolerate such un-American activities?

Our citizens who are criticizing the administration or "invisible government" are in the right, and in such criticism they are not criminals, but they are instead sincere, straightforward citizens. God knows, there is much cause for criticism and condemnation.

Another writer makes this statement, in the Washington Daily News:

> Neutrality does not mean and never can mean "impartiality" in the sense that American policy and acts must confer the same or equal benefits upon both sides in the war.
> Any benefits that either side gains depends upon:
> 1. Its geographical position.
> 2. Its strength or weakness of arms at sea or on land.
> 3. Its ability to get American goods.
> 4. Its ability to pay for those goods in money, credit, or goods.

Points 1, 2, and 3 in this quotation do not concern us. Point 4 concerns us to the extent that the purchaser must pay cash in gold for merchandise delivered f. o. b. on his own responsibility, to be transported in his own ships.

As to the first paragraph, I may say that we should be "impartially neutral," which does not mean, as the writer assumes, that we must confer the same equal benefits upon both sides. Neutrality may therefore be compared to impartiality, fairness, or good sportsmanship, in a game, fight, or war.

There was no reason or justification in detaining the Bremen at the potential opening of the present hostilities in Europe. In this premeditated and unjust detention, we were partial to one nation and unneutral to the other. I shall now quote a letter from a previous Secretary of State, the Honorable William Jennings Bryan, as an example of neutrality:

> The Secretary of State to the German Ambassador (Bernstorff)
> WASHINGTON, April 21, 1915.
> Excellency: * * * In the third place, I note with sincere regret that, in discussing the sale and exportation of arms by citizens of the United States to the enemies of Germany, your excellency seems to be under the impression that it was within the choice of the Government of the United States, notwithstanding its professed neutrality and its diligent efforts to maintain it in other particulars, to inhibit this trade, and that its failure to do so manifested an unfair attitude toward Germany. This Government holds, as I believe your excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions, and I respectfully submit that none of the circumstances urged in your excellency's memorandum alters the principle involved. The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States. It will, I feel assured, be clear to your excellency that, holding this view and considering itself in honor bound by it, it is out of the question for this Government to consider such a course.
> Accept (etc.)
> W. J. BRYAN.

The Honorable W. J. Bryan as a sincere neutral did not fit into the Wilson administration. He was too fair, I presume, to suit the Presidential advisers, the late Colonel House, Mr. Baruch, and others. Many citizens and Members of Congress, knowing that advice is still furnished by the same group, fear the attitude of this administration. In this knowledge they realize that there must be some restriction so that this Nation will not be consigned to war, as it was in 1917. This restriction is found in the arms-embargo clause. It is well to bear in mind, however, that it will provide no greater assurance of peace than international law did in 1917, yet it will point an accusing finger at those who permit violation of the act. Evidence of such violation will be found in the sinking and destruction of our shipping in forbidden zones.

In speaking of war zones it must be understood that such areas are not designated by neutral nations, as we attempt to do in the Neutrality Act. In reality there are no war zones, because any ship that carries contraband cargo to belligerent nations or for consignment to belligerent nations through neutral states is subject to seizure or destruction when overhauled by belligerent warships. The embargo clause in our Neutrality Act serves one purpose alone, which is in restricting shipping of war material to nations at war, and it identifies those who are instrumental in violation of the act.

In a life-or-death struggle mistakes may be made in enemy attack and a neutral nation may become a victim because powers at war disregard international law. For example, a power at war may camouflage its ship as that of a neutral power. When challenged such ship may shed its neutrality disguise to attack and destroy the challenger. It is such infraction that often invites a weaker power to attack shipping in war zones without apparent provocation. Because of such danger our ships should not be permitted to enter such danger zones. This may be taken care of by regulation of clearance papers.

In my remarks on September 25 I referred to a special type of consultant that became popular with the advent of the late Colonel House. It is strange how some executives fall under the spell of a person or special group of advisers. It is quite evident, if one is to judge by results, that these White House ghosts not only give bad advice but also are grossly incompetent. This is clearly evident as we observe the condition our Nation is in today.

It might be a good idea for Congress to give a little advice to the President, for after all we are responsible and must in the end accept the blame. I am sure there are many Members in both Houses capable of giving better advice to the administration than that it may expect from agents of the "invisible government."

The "invisible government's" propaganda machine already claims victory for England and France, so the question may be asked, "Why all this unnecessary effort to get the American people interested in a war that we care nothing about?" I have never seen so little enthusiasm for a war as for the one we are now trying to support by the repeal of the arms-embargo clause.

Imports and Exports

HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to keep the record current with reference to our exports and imports.

Our foreign trade in agricultural products, according to figures just released by the Department of Commerce, continue to show a decrease in exports and an increase in imports.

For the 8 months ended August 1939 our agricultural exports amounted to $343,867,000, a decrease of $183,613,000, or 34.8 percent from the same period of 1938. Imports of agricultural products for the 8 months of 1939 amounted to $693,311,000, an increase of $65,464,000, or 10.4 percent over the same period of 1938. This decrease in exports and increase in imports resulted in an import balance of $349,444,000 for the 8 months of 1939 as compared with $100,367,000 for the same period of 1938, an increase of $249,077,000, or 249 percent in our import balance of trade in agricultural products for the first 8 months of 1939. Also our total trade—exports and imports—in agricultural products showed a decrease of $118,149,000, or about 10 percent for the first 8 months of 1939 as compared with the same period of 1938.

While the Roosevelt administration and proponents of the reciprocal-trade program are alarmed and perplexed, the American farmer is likewise alarmed and dissatisfied over the agricultural export market, which the Hull trade program promised to expand.

Instead of expanding foreign markets for our agricultural products the Hull reciprocal-trade program seems to be working in reverse. The loss in our principal agricultural exports is shown in the following decreases for the first 8 months of 1939: Cotton, $53,736,000; tobacco, $18,214,000; corn, $70,970,000; wheat, $35,654,000; fresh fruits, $4,184,000; all foodstuffs, $112,072,000.

While on the other hand small increases in our exports of meat products, lard, and vegetables were registered.

The following tables give our trade up to August 31, 1939, or the period before the war in Europe began:

Aid For the Allies

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

LETTER FROM MAJ. GEN. SIR LEONARD ROGERS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD an open letter to the editor of the London Daily Telegraph from Maj. Gen. Sir Leonard Rogers, on the subject of the Contribution Which Should Be Made by the United States to the Cause of the Allies.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S AID TO THE DEMOCRACIES—HOW HELP MIGHT BE PROFFERED

From Maj. Gen. Sir Leonard Rogers.

To the editor of the Daily Telegraph.

SIR: President Roosevelt doubtless expresses the true opinion of the American Nation in his sympathetic words in support of the British and French stand against the Hitler bid to enslave the remaining free portion of the world.

I trust that it may not be out of place to suggest—and it is merely a suggestion—that the great American Nation may also wish to show their sympathy with the ideals for which Britain and France are engaging in a life-and-death struggle in something more than words, and more, too, than a business contribution on a cash-and-carry principle of neutrality; but short of taking an active part in the war.

In the first place, might they not consider the costless gesture of canceling the war debts of Britain and France, which obviously have no cash value and form but a small part of infinitely greater sacrifices made in defeating the 1914 German bid for world power, to the benefit of the world at large?

Might it not also be in the true interests of the United States to go further and grant large credits to Britain and France to cover the production of war materials, with some relief to American unemployment?

In view of their immense unused gold accumulations, might not the United States make that contribution to the world-wide democratic cause free of interest; with the proviso that it should be repaid at the conclusion of the present war, provided that United States is then satisfied that they have made as great sacrifices, including the proposed credit, as have Britain and France?

No true democrat doubts ultimate victory, but only the united effort of the democracies is likely to bring it about in time to avert a lengthy set-back to the progress of civilization of the world at large.

Yours faithfully,

LEONARD ROGERS.

HAMPSTEAD, September 2.

Dedication of Physical Education Gymnasium Building at Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

OF

HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND

OF NEW JERSEY

Thursday, September 28, 1939

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 1, 1939, at one of the outstanding and fast-growing colleges of the country located in my district, namely, Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J., the laying of the cornerstone of a new physical education gymnasium building is scheduled. This marks the first building of an expansion program and is, in my opinion, to be one of the finest and best-equipped gymnasiums in the East, if not in the entire country. Seton Hall College, under the very able leadership of its president, Rev. Dr. James F. Kelley, my very dear friend, and the board of governors, has grown remarkably in the past few years and ranks among the leading educational institutions in this Nation.

I wish at this time to commend the Most Reverend Thomas J. Walsh, archbishop of the diocese of Newark, Rev. Dr. James F. Kelley, and the other members of the board of governors upon their noble achievement, with the feeling and thought that their expansion project will continue with rapid strides.

The following are a few of the letters received by the college from New Jersey leaders:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
October 1, 1939.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I am proud to be included among those whose letters will be sealed in the cornerstone of the Physical Education Building of Seton Hall College.

Such great changes are taking place in the world today that it is difficult for us to project our imaginations into the world of 200 years hence, when I understand the seals of this cornerstone may be broken.

If it is difficult for us to imagine what the world will be like 200 years from now, perhaps our lives will seem equally strange to the people who will then inhabit our State.

Through the pages of history posterity will be informed of the state of the world at this time, of the wars which are devastating Europe and Asia and threatening to overthrow our present civilization. They will know the outcome of these wars and their aftermath and what, for good or evil, arose out of the ashes of war. We in this country pray that the blight of war will not fall upon us; that our system of government, which has withstood so many storms, will endure, as we all firmly believe it will. But prayer should be combined with the determination that we shall constantly strive to maintain our American institutions and ways of thought.

We in New Jersey enjoy many advantages. Though forty-fifth in size, we are ninth in population, and sixth in value of manufactured products. We have been abundantly blessed by reason of a favorable climate and location, which have lent encouragement to the development of agriculture and industry and the growth of great recreational centers.

We are especially happy in the thought that throughout our Nation each child is given the opportunity of an education. The American system of education is one of the finest features of our national life. Countless members of foreign races have sought homes and refuge in our country. Today, while their mother countries are at war, we witness the fusion of these races in our country under one banner. Much of the credit for this happy blending of the races can be given to our school system, which has trained the children of foreign-born parents to become good citizens of the United States.

An essential feature of present-day education is physical education, which is doing so much to help children attain vigorous maturity. In laying the cornerstone of a physical education building we are today laying the foundation for the physical well-being of countless children who will benefit from the training given in this school.

By contrast to the situation in Europe, where followers of the Christian religion are being persecuted, we are today enlarging the activities of a college devoted to the dissemination of religious teaching. This brings home to us most strongly another advantage of life in the United States of America—the blessing of religious freedom.

Out of the building whose cornerstone is laid today, and out of the college of which it is a part will radiate forces and influences for good. As we seal this cornerstone, we greet posterity across the bridge of time, and we pledge ourselves that we, who today carry the torch of education, shall not fail to train those who come after us to so carry on that our land shall ever remain what it is today—the hope of the world.

Sincerely yours,

A. HARRY MOORE, Governor.

Most Rev. THOMAS JOSEPH WALSH, S. T. D., J. C. D.,
Archbishop of Newark, Newark, N. J.

NEWARK EVENING NEWS,
September 19, 1939.

Very Rev. JAMES F. KELLEY,
President, Seton Hall College,
South Orange, N. J.

DEAR DR. KELLEY: Only in the Americas could such an event as this cornerstone laying at Seton Hall take place today. Elsewhere in the world the lights of civilization are out or going out. Elsewhere in the world intolerance and persecution have taken the place of tolerance and humaneness.

This ceremony can be held, this building can be dedicated to Christian education because the people of this Nation are dedicated to tolerance, to respect for the opinions of mankind, and to reverence for God and His truths. A people united in peaceful pursuits, with religious and racial hatreds eliminated, will pray God that this building will carry on the fine traditions of Seton Hall.

Yours,

ARTHUR J. SINNOTT, Editor.

NEWARK SUNDAY CALL,
September 12, 1939.

Very Rev. JAMES F. KELLEY,
President, Seton Hall College,
South Orange, N. J.

DEAR DR. KELLEY: It is a privilege to be included among those whose thoughts are to be preserved for posterity in the cornerstone of Seton Hall's physical-education building, but I am afraid that I am too overwhelmed with shame and disappointment in this hour in the world's history to be able to believe that posterity will give much weight to my words or to those who will be associated with me in this enterprise.

I have an uncomfortable feeling that on some distant day, when your building, now so new and fine, is razed to make way for one still nobler, the wreckers will come upon the contents of this cornerstone and read with laughter and pity the words of those who lived in an age when men sought to settle their differences by force of arms.

I am confident that mankind will ultimately discard war as an instrument for adjusting national grievances. When that day comes, men will look back upon our generation as contemptuously as we regard those who burned witches and made propitiatory offerings to evil spirits.

The abolition of war and the establishment of a universal brotherhood of nations and peoples can be accomplished only by education and by educational methods which place spiritual values above the material. Christian educational institutions are striving for this goal, but they have made only a beginning.

The recrientation of the thinking of thousands of years is a task for the centuries. Let none doubt, however, that with courage and persistence and humility the change can be accomplished.

The educational system of the United States, despite its imperfections, offers the world its greatest hope. We have taken natives of every land and taught them to dwell side by side in peace and understanding.

The American school has destroyed the accumulated prejudices of hundreds of years of European history. The spectacular success of American assimilation suggests that in the schools of the world will mankind find the catalyst which will end hatred among men by destroying the illusion that there are vital differences among them.

The glory of the Roman Catholic Church is its teaching that God recognized neither race nor color; that in His eyes all men are alike. Until this teaching spreads over the earth man must always be trembling on the brink of bloodshed and disaster.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD F. BATAILLE.

COURT OF CHANCERY OF NEW JERSEY,
October 1, 1939.

Very Rev. JAMES F. KELLEY, Ph. D.,
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

DEAR DR. KELLEY: Today's ceremonies of laying the cornerstone of the Physical Education Building of Seton Hall College by His Excellency the Most Rev. Thomas J. Walsh, Archbishop of Newark, marks another step in the continuing progress of a great Catholic college. The new building will be an enduring monument to the perseverance of our most reverend archbishop and the president and faculty of the college. In considering the successful efforts of its promoters, our thoughts go to the means which made their plan effective. This new institution, like most every other Catholic institution in the United States today, represents the modest contributions of the diocesan faithful. It is not the product of financial encouragement from rich philanthropic foundations; nor is it the result of generous benefactions of wealthy Catholics. The Catholic institutions, in this country, arise and take form largely through the voluntary sacrifices of the rank and file of our Catholic citizens. We point with pride to their accomplishments. Today Catholic education in the United States ministers to the needs of more than two and one-half million students. It provides facilities on every level from kindergarten to university. A survey shows that throughout our country there are over 10,700 Catholic educational institutions, attended by some 85,000 teachers. There are approximately 8,000 elementary schools, 2,000 high schools, 225 colleges, universities, and normal schools, and 200 major and minor seminaries. The cost, maintenance, and operation of these schools run into an average daily outlay of $1,000,000. There is an investment in lands and buildings and equipment that runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. If the investment of the church in educational facilities were to be turned over to the State, the State would have a heavy burden to carry. The State's aid to the church's educational program is limited to the minimum help of tax exemption. Nothing more. While the financial burden of education weighs heavily in some dioceses, yet that burden will continue to be cheerfully borne, if its transfer to the State means that the church's teachings of the Catholic youth are to be circumscribed or limited in the slightest degree. We Catholics hold, and our children are taught, that this life is of minor importance. Eternal life is the complete life. We contend that any system of education which stresses earthly life and neglects eternal life is fundamentally defective, because religion is not merely an element in education but a fundamental element.

"Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." Those words are not the utterance of any Catholic prelate, sage, or educator. They are the imperishable words of the immortal George Washington. His words are heeded in the Catholic schools. They find no place in the curricula of secular education.

Morality is based on religion. It is the law of right living and our children are taught that it is God's law, therefore just, and must be followed. Our school is a school of the faith and the preservation of the true faith demands that a Catholic child shall be trained in a Catholic school. I can better emphasize this point by borrowing the language of a great Catholic prelate of this diocese who said: "The child who is educated only in a secular school is spiritually illiterate; and of him it may be said that he is unlettered of God, unenlightened of Christ, ignorant of Heaven and the eternal destiny of his own immortal soul. He is not alive to the warning whisperings of conscience; his will has not been strengthened and his heart not trained in the school of discipline. Manhood comes, he is a scholar in this world's science; but the world that has no ending is a complete blank to him. He can measure the earth, weigh the air, name the planets, compute the shining sun, and knows nothing about the Creator of them all and himself—spiritual illiteracy."

The the Protestant church is giving serious thought to the absence of religious training in secular schools is evident from the remarks of Dr. F. Ernest Johnson, secretary of the department of research and education of The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, who, also, is professor of education at Teachers College, Columbia University, on August 29, 1939, before the Williamstown Institute of Human Relations, at Williamstown, Mass. He suggested that public education include among its aims the equipment of boys and girls, youth and adults for participation in the religious life of the community. He asserted that "the result of our present educational policy will be an increasing isolation of religion from life."

In this present day we have but to cast our eyes over the field of secular education and in many instances we find that the scholastic atmosphere is charged with the devastating social poisons of communism and atheism. Those twin enemies of religion are largely imported European products and should find no place in our system of education. They are not American-born. Indeed not. Our country is essentially religious. The first act of the great navigator, Columbus, upon discovering this continent, was to kneel, raise the cross of Christ upon our shores, and offer thanks to God. Our first President, Washington, was intensely religious. He cannot be charged with ever holding back his views of faith in the existence of the Supreme Being. Our American forefathers were of a religious bent. They dedicated this country to God and publicly expressed their sentiments of religious belief in God in the Declaration of Independence. Upon the currency of the United States they inscribed their motto of faith in these words: "In God we trust." The money which the atheist, the Communist, and the godless use as a medium of exchange in this country is marked with a definite expression of the religious convictions of the founders of this Republic. The ideals of our colonial forefathers still prevail; they have in no way lost their influence in the hearts and the minds of true Americans. Christ is still King, and Catholic teaching will continue to proclaim that truism until the last man Christ died to save is gathered to the bliss of Heaven or consigned to the shades of eternal death.

The Catholic layman supports in full measure his municipal, State, and National Governments. That support includes taxes levied for the maintenance of the public or secular schools which his child does not attend. He likewise, from a conviction of right, contributes most cheerfully to the support of the Catholic school. He thus bears a double tax. We indulge the hope that in the no distant future the traditional American sense of justice and fair play will find a way to help conscientious parents to care for the religious and moral education of their children without the necessity of being subjected to the burden of double taxation.

Today may not seem the opportune time to ask the Government to give consideration to the financial burden of the religious educational institutions because of the emergent problems confronting it. The State and Nation for 10 years have been groaning under the burden of an economic depression that has sent and is still sending millions of our citizens to the relief rolls. The devastating war which began in Europe a few weeks ago, as well as the horrible conflict which has been raging between Japan and China, are of immediate outstanding concern to our people and, just now, are properly holding the national attention. Those wars, really world-wide in extent, are casting their ugly dark shadows over this hemisphere. However, regardless of any National or State aid, our Catholic institutions will continue to carry on, and their devotion to Christian ideals may, perhaps, convey to a war-torn world that the practice of Christian principles is necessary to end unrest and to bring permanent peace to suffering humanity.

In conclusion, permit me to congratulate you and your fellow coworkers upon the successful realization of a project that means so much to Catholic life.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES M. EGAN.

What Is Your Attitude Toward Your Government?

HON. JOHN H. KERR
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 28, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN H. KERR, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on September 15, 1939, to the student body consisting of more than 1,100 students, assembled at Wake Forest College, in the State of North Carolina, at the beginning of the one hundred and sixth anniversary session of this great institution:

Members of the student body, ladies, and gentlemen, this is the third time in many years that I have had an opportunity to appear before a Wake Forest audience. I hope that this is not my last appearance. I fully realize that you young gentlemen who are here in the process of preparing yourselves for citizenship should, and doubtless will, play a most important part in the preservation of those ideals and virtues which have made our Nation, the United States of America, great, and given it a position that no other nation has ever occupied. If you should fail in this critical period of the world's history, the consequences may be disastrous, and those critics of Thomas Jefferson who insisted that a government of the people was impossible will have proven to be correct.

I think that the great problem which has always faced this country and all democracies is the nation's youth. I think that Mr. Jefferson understood this when in the answer to those who criticized his ideals he said that "A government of the people would be safe and permanent if the people were made intelligent through universal education, so that one class could not exploit another."

You may accept as a fact that the Constitution of the United States cannot be destroyed except by a revolution of the people. Note the preamble: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America." The Constitution and this democracy will stand or fall together. Only a revolution of the people can effect the destruction of both. This was the position Mr. Webster took in his answer to Mr. Haynes in the momentous States' rights debate between these two gentlemen. Thus far the American Constitution has stood the test of time and the test of secession. The freedom which we enjoy in this Nation is wrapped in the folds of the Constitution, and I believe that it is sufficiently elastic to preserve those things which our ancestors held to constitute human rights. We will doubtless add to and take from this document many times, but we will and should always preserve its fundamental principles and its spirit.

No student of history can have any doubt that a democracy is by far the most difficult form of government that ever existed. In a totalitarian state or a communistic state a citizen has only to do what he is told; it is not necessary for him to think or make any choice, no responsibility rests upon the citizen, and the governmental machine is effective as long as the citizen obeys.

If I were called upon to give my opinion in respect to those influences which entered most in the making of this Nation great, I would unhesitatingly say that it was the religious spirit which was most pronounced in our ancestors and that unconquerable individuality of their descendants which was constructed upon self-sacrifice and the will to make good and accomplish something in life. Our ancestors were a religious people. Those who first came to this country came primarily to seek religious freedom and escape persecution. It is not strange that they sought the form of government which guaranteed to them freedom and the right to do as they wished within the bounds of moral restraint and within the common-law maxim "that the welfare of all the people should be the highest law." And I am convinced that all true Americans still cling to the tenet that the future must be a goal of greater common welfare, of greater opportunity, and greater general happiness. And in the last analysis the problem which our forefathers attempted to solve through our Constitution was the old problem which throughout all ages has engaged the faculties of man, namely, the question of right and wrong.

The affairs of the world are in a deplorable condition, but that does not necessarily mean that our democracy is seriously imperiled. Doubtless it would be but for two things which are at the present time insurmountable, namely, the fact that freedom and liberty have been and are yet the cornerstone of our national life, and the further fact that there is no nation or combination of nations physically or financially able to invade our territory and molest our form of government.

What we should most fear and what I shall call your attention to in this address are matters involving our internal affairs, namely, the utter indifference manifested on the part of the present generation in respect to the affairs of our Government, the want of responsibility on the part of the average citizen of this age, and the shocking criminal record of the youth of this period of our national life. To correct these defects is the task every good citizen should undertake.

Since the day of Solon, the law giver, the founder of democracy, to this day the ability of the people to rule themselves has been disputed and on many occasions has been successfully challenged. Mr. Jefferson thought he had placed his finger on the trouble. His remedy was universal education and intelligence. And I am sure that he had in mind a qualitative system rather than a quantitative system of education, and he never intended the Government to do more than provide physical security, freedom, and untrammelled opportunity.

A self-sacrificing people are trying to perfect Mr. Jefferson's remedy, and we are now spending annually $2,500,000,000 for the education of the youth of this Nation, and this sum about equals the amount spent for this purpose by all the other nations on earth. And at this point I wish to call your attention to what I hold to be the most serious fault in our democracy at this period of our national life, that fault is the callous indifference on the part of this generation to those fundamental attributes which made us great and can only preserve our history. And so I am asking you this question, and asking every other citizen of the United States, "What is your attitude to your Government?"

My question may be in the nature of an indictment, at any rate I hope to be classed as a constructive critic. There is not now and never has been a legitimate place in this world for a destructive critic; such a critic gets nowhere and no great institution was ever established by such criticism. The power to get together and agree is the foundation upon which all great achievement has been wrought. We should court constructive criticism, it is a beacon light to remind us of the faults of ourselves and the virtues and mistakes of others. And here let me remind you that Nature does not deal in perfections, and the noblest characters of this life were not cast in flawless molds. And who would have it otherwise?

Does the average high-school or college graduate know anything about his Government? No. His definition of a democracy, if he could give one, is that it is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. Beyond this few would venture to give a definition. The average citizen's estimate of a public official, the representative of the people in the councils of the Nation, is usually formed from what he or she sees in the press, and this you can in most cases discount. I do not challenge the freedom of the press. It is an important place in our democracy, but I do hold that it is the duty of every good citizen to inform himself as to the history and the purposes of his Government. This is the only means by which you can determine your attitude to your Government. To be indifferent in respect to this duty is nothing less than a moral crime. We can love neither an animate nor an inanimate object unless we know something about it. Every human institution, if it is to be permanent, needs its watchdog, and no institution more than a democracy. But what good is a watchdog if he does not know what he is watching; if he does not know how to safeguard his heritage, or if he does not know what his heritage is? How can an elector wisely choose a representative to express his views about government when the elector has no views or concrete knowledge of what can and should be done, or how it should be done and the effect of his act?

There can be no higher honor than to be the representative of the people in a democracy. It should be a legitimate object of ambition to the best men in the country, and the people should always realize their responsibility in the choice of their representative. A careless estimate of a voter, who knows or cares but little about his government, would likely elect just such a representative, and this is the representative who is most likely to fall a prey to subversive influences. And let me say here advisedly that I do not think that opportunity has ceased to knock at the door of the youth of this land, and I believe that a great majority of the people of this Nation are eager for right thinking, clear-minded leadership in politics and every other walk of life. Just such a leadership will go far toward the correction of the indifference and irresponsibility and the crime of which we complain.

Can the average college student tell you who is his Representative in Congress? I fear he cannot. Can the average citizen of this age define "local self-government" or "State sovereignty"? I am satisfied that he cannot.

What I want to do is to impress upon you that a democracy cannot succeed as a form of government unless the people take an intelligent interest in public affairs. You remember that the makers of our Constitution insisted upon preserving the right of local self-government and there were comparatively few rights delegated to the Federal Government. Most of the government was left to the States. It is apparent that as the Nation's affairs become more complex that there will be an expansion of Federal power, but in admitting this we should be inspired with the determination to preserve local self-government and State sovereignty.

I may doubtless appear harsh in my criticism of this age for its indifference and utter ignorance of government technique. I hope and pray that we may be aroused to correct this mistake. What we should do and begin to do at once is to train the youth of this Nation in the technique of democracy and not in the technique of revolution and destruction. You will never see another political platform which does not advocate an adequate provision for the less fortunate through relief, old-age pensions, subsidized housing plans, and the like, and every political party will write into its platform a plan to restore financial solidarity and business expansion which will cure the unemployment problem. These problems must be met. You cannot ignore them. Let's meet them in the democratic way and so inspire our people through love for our Constitution and knowledge of the function of our Government that we will convince the world that a democracy is a permanent institution.

Let us be able to answer the destructive critics. You have heard that the Government has spent vast sums of money in the last 5 years, and I think most of us will admit that we have spent too much money in recent years. Emergencies had arisen in our national life which made it necessary and unavoidable. And we should thank God that we were able to spend this money and still be solvent. What this Government has spent for national protection, relief, permanent improvements, and education, as reflected in our increased indebtedness for the last 5 years, does not equal the annual expenditures of the Nation for automobiles and upkeep—eight and one-half billion dollars; for cigarettes and tobacco, two and one-half billion dollars; for amusements, $4,000,000,000; and for cosmetics and liquor, two and one-half billion dollars; a total of seventeen and one-half billion dollars. I recall these figures to show you what an income this Government has. Our standard of living is the highest in the world and our labor is paid the highest price in the world. The debt of the Nation, all the States, and all the political subdivisions of the States is approximately $60,000,000,000, and this has accumulated over a long period of years. The annual income of this Nation now is more than $70,000,000,000. One year's income will pay all our public indebtedness and there will still remain an amount almost sufficient to feed and clothe every person in the United States.

I am not sure that indifference and irresponsibility is not the proximate cause of the criminal record of this Nation. We could save $15,000,000,000 annually to be expended on worth-while endeavors if we wipe out this stricture upon our civilization. There is a problem for every good citizen, and your attitude to your Government will determine the solution of this menace.

Coming back to my old college home after years of hard work and political adventure, fully sharing the experience of joy and sorrow of the average man, and with a heart full of gratitude to God for His blessings and a keen sense of obligation to those who have helped me achieve my success in life, my thoughts often linger about the associations and experiences I had here. I have never ceased to thank those who induced me to come to Wake Forest College, and I shall always hold in affectionate regard those wonderful men who taught me and with whom I associated in my college career.

May I refer to the faculty when I was here: there was Dr. Charles E. Taylor, then president of this institution, the wise philosopher and businessman unsurpassed, he was the very best judge of human nature I ever saw, always as candid and guileless as a child, and his sense of humor has rarely been equaled. There were here then those superb Christian gentlemen, old Dr. William Royal, and his son young Dr. William Royal, the lives of these men were a benediction to every student. I once asked the old doctor, when he was explaining to me some literary feast that he had just enjoyed, why it was that he continued to study so much when he already knew so much, and his reply was, "John, I am satisfied that the more I learn here the higher I will enter the university above." Young Dr. Royal was as gentle as a woman and faithful to every duty ever committed to him by God or man; he taught Greek and knew it so well that I always thought that he had little respect for a student who did not master that language. I could never make more than 75 on Greek, and I fear that I fell in that class whom he thought was hopeless. Professor Mills, my old math teacher, knew more about mathematics than any person I ever saw, and always assumed that everybody else knew all about this science, which assumption was most violent. Professor Mills was a walking encyclopedia, he was accurately informed on almost every subject, talked well, and was a most interesting companion. And then there was here Prof. John F. Lanneau, the French Huguenot; he had a genteel background that dated a thousand years, and his stately personal appearance and demeanor was the admiration of all who knew him. He was worth $5,000 annually to any institution just to walk through its campus twice a day. There was my kinsman, Dr. William Louis Poteat. He was born good, and throughout his long life walked with God. He was a great thinker, and I hazard nothing when I assert that he was the most intellectual man this State has produced in a hundred years. Professor Carlyle was our latin teacher; he considered every responsibility committed to him sacred, was one of the best public speakers I ever listened to, and was a great Democrat both in spirit and partisanship. Had Professor Carlyle sought political honor and public office, he would have been a most formidable candidate and would have adorned any office in the gift of the people. Prof. J. C. Maske was here, he soon endeared himself to the student body by reason of his modesty and thorough mastery of the subjects he taught, every student who entered his classroom had the profoundest respect and admiration for him.

These men of whom I have spoken have all gone "across the Unknown River to the Unseen Shore," and there yet remain but three here who were members of the faculty when I was a student. Dr. Sledd, who came to teach modern languages but soon took the chair of English, loved English and its literature and was never happier than when explaining the sublime attributes of the great thinkers and writers of ancient and modern times. Dr. Sledd was always sentimental and his poetic soul frequently burst forth in verse as sweet and as fragrant as the dawn of a summer's day. Dr. Gorrell is here, a man whom Nature endowed with the faculty to teach; his long service at this institution has been invaluable, and I can be corroborated by thousands when I state that no finer teacher ever served any institution in this country. And there yet remains my law teacher, Dr. Gulley. I have no words adequate to express my affectionate regard for him or to properly evaluate his fine service to this institution. He could take a piece of chalk and get to a blackboard and make a synopsis and diagram of a principle of law that a fool could understand and never forget. He never had his equal as a teacher in this State, and I have no idea that John Minor in any way excelled him as a law teacher.

Time is inadequate for me to make but a short appraisement of the men who taught me here and greatly influenced my life. When I came here this institution had the largest enrollment of any institution in this State, and I thought then, and think now, that it is one of the very best educational institutions in this land. Then there was an influence here—and I hope it exists now—which impelled you to realize that no education of mind and body was complete unless safeguarded by a spiritual conception of man's duty to his fellow man and to his God. There was no influence here in this college then which discredited the religious teaching of Jesus Christ or which in any way attempted to subordinate human freedom or the doctrine of popular government established by our fathers. I hope that there will never be a place in this institution for nazi-ism, fascism, or communism, or any other kind of ism which has for its purpose the destruction of our democracy. There should be an inspiration here and at every other school in this Republic to make our democracy so perfect that all other nations will consider it a model.

Certainly under the influence and direction of your great president, Dr. Kitchin, no subversive influence could originate or exist here now. Your president is a member of one of the most distinguished families ever reared in our Southland. Most of his immediate family has a passion for politics, and every member of it has been true to the ideals of democracy and they loved this country with a devotion most pronounced. Their names will always adorn the history of this State and Nation.

And right here I want to impress upon you that one college professor can create more subversive influence and discord among the people by his contact with the student youth of this Nation than all the red-flag demonstrations of cranks and crackpots which ever attempt to parade in it.

Young gentlemen, when shadows of doubt begin to fall about you and you begin to feel that other forms of government are superior to ours, I would have you pause and look back down the road where you came from. If you can do this and remember the way and the history of those generations who preceded you and the blessings you have received because of their fidelity and love for this Government, then you will never be lost. Your heritage is the greatest any nation ever possessed; feel a sense of your great responsibility; do not allow the spirit of indifference to find a place in your life. Take a profound interest in your governmental affairs, and I have no fear as to what your attitude toward this Government will be. That attitude will determine its stability of our democracy and the ideals of popular government.

The Significance of the Pan American Movement in the Present Singularly Unhappy Juncture of World Affairs

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES AND CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BOARD OF THE PAN AMERICAN UNION, ON THE OCCASION OF THE CELEBRATION OF PAN AMERICAN DAY AT THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1939

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following address of the Honorable Cordell Hull on The Significance of the Pan American Movement in the Present Singularly Unhappy Juncture of World Affairs:

In the name of the governing board of the Pan American Union, I should like, first of all, to express our gratitude to the management of the New York World's Fair for their courtesy in designating this day as Pan American Day. For myself I welcome this opportunity to make a few brief remarks regarding the significance of the Pan American movement in the present, singularly unhappy juncture of world affairs.

Around us here are striking achievements of scientists and engineers, of architects and artists, revealing what could be done for the advancement of the human race if only their genius could be given free scope for constructive effort everywhere. There is a poignant contrast between what we behold here and the soul-searing pictures of suffering and destruction brought to us hourly from those portions of the earth in which armed hostilities are now taking place. That contrast should strengthen in all of us a determination to assure an organization of world affairs which would make possible the use of such magnificent technical skill as is here assembled solely and uninterruptedly for the creative work of peaceful progress.

The attainment of such an organization of world affairs has always been one of the underlying purposes of the American republics. It has always been one of the principal objectives of the great movement of cooperation and solidarity—the ties of which, happily, have grown ever stronger among our nations.

Today the American republics are supremely fortunate in that they are at peace within and without our hemisphere. Each of our republics is ready to defend itself against any threat to its security that may come from any part of the world. At the same time, it is the unalterable desire of each and every one of our nations to remain at peace ourselves and to exercise all influence in our power toward the end that just and enduring peace may become firmly established everywhere.

Less than a quarter of a century ago 12 of our American republics were involved in a world war. When that ordeal ended all of us were determined to devote our best efforts toward the establishment of a world order in which recourse to war as an instrument of accomplishing national aims would be unthinkable. Within the limitations of its own traditional policy each of our nations has since sought to make its fullest practicable contribution toward the attainment of that objective.

This attitude on our part is a direct result of our own American experience. From the very beginning of their independent existence the American republics have sought to shape their international policies in accordance with certain cardinal principles. Crucial among these are, first, recognition that each nation is a juridically equal member of the family of nations; and, second, recognition that civilization and progress are possible only when there is universal acceptance of order, implemented by international law and based upon justice, fair dealing, mutual respect, cooperation, and the sanctity of agreements, freely made, faithfully observed, and honorably altered by peaceful methods when need arises.

By applying these principles among ourselves we have gradually built up in the Western Hemisphere an international system which is our American way of peace.

Among the 21 American republics are found various degrees of numerical strength and of military power, as well as different degrees of wealth and of industrial and financial organization. Yet we have arranged and have managed to live side by side. Among us small countries do not feel menaced by their powerful neighbors. Among us no group of nations is allied against any other group. Our peace does not rest on fear.

There are, to be sure, causes for controversy here as there are in other parts of the world. But mechanisms for resolving them have been set up by mutual agreement. These mechanisms are in operation, and there is a growing realization that just claims advanced by any member or members of the group will be fairly dealt with.

All this is the fruit of our persistent endeavors to give form and substance to the ideals which we profess. We have striven for years to remove causes of distrust and friction between and among our several countries. Many of us, including the United States, have had to recognize that mistakes were made and that rectification was in order. We have had to overcome false pride and to correct errors. Much of this has been done; and the doing of it has established faith and trust among the American nations.

Our periodic inter-American conferences have played a great role in this development. I should like to recall to your attention the work done by the three most recent ones.

At the Seventh International Conference of American States, held at Montevideo in 1933, substantial progress was made toward removing the individual causes for controversy through agreement on a treaty to govern the rights and duties of States.

In 1936 the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, at Buenos Aires, considered the need of strengthening the methods by which the peace of the American nations could be safeguarded and maintained. One result of that conference was a Convention for the Maintenance, Preservation, and Reestablishment of Peace, which provided for consultation between the 21 republics in case the peace of the western world was menaced from within or from without.

Finally, at Lima, last year the Eighth International Conference of American States, in its basic declaration, affirmed the solidarity of the nations of America, based on "the similarity of their republican institutions, their unshakable will for peace, their absolute adherence to the principles of international law, of the equal sovereignty of states, and of individual liberty without religious or racial prejudices." With this in mind, the 21 republics affirmed their determination to maintain these principles, to defend them against any threat from outside our hemisphere, and, in the event of danger, to consult among themselves as to measures which might be taken in cooperation for the common safety.

At this very moment representatives of all of the American governments are assembling in Panama for the purpose of taking the measures necessary to safeguard the peace of the Americas. Here we see the functioning of an international system of cooperative peace, designed to assure internal concord and external security for the nations of our hemisphere.

At all three of the conferences, important steps were taken in the direction of a mitigation of unreasonable trade barriers among our various countries and between each of them and the rest of the world. At all three, means were devised for strengthening cultural and other relationships—those indispensable foundations of international understanding and cooperation—again, among our various countries and between each of them and the rest of the world. The resolutions and recommendations of the conferences along these lines have been or are being put into effect by the American republics. Here, too, we see the functioning of a system of cooperative peace.

We, of the Americas, are justly proud of these achievements. And yet we know that however precious, however gratifying, is this onward march of inter-American solidarity and cooperation, it is not enough by itself to give our nations the fullest attainable measure of security, progress, and prosperity.

In every line of national endeavor, each of our countries is thoroughly conscious of the interrelated and interconnected character of the present-day world. Under modern conditions peace and stability are indivisible in the sense that a major break-down of one or the other in any important portion of the globe inevitably affects the life of the entire world. For several years the impairment of normal international economic relations and the disastrous deterioration of international morality in many parts of the earth have retarded our material progress and have filled us with anxiety and apprehension. For the past 2 years the conflict that has been going on in far-off Asia has cast its shadow upon us too. The tragic hostilities in Europe—the greatest calamity of all—have been in operation but 3 short weeks, and already their fateful effects have laid a heavy hand upon many phases of the lives of our nations.

We know that our nations will be materially poorer and spiritually poorer in proportion as the flames of protracted war impair or destroy, in the areas directly involved, the foundations of modern civilization.

Knowing all this, our nations have sought steadfastly to exert their influence in the direction of an avoidance of a widespread war anywhere. We have endeavored, by appeal and by example, to convince other nations that a system of international relations based upon action in conformity with the dictates of international law and morality, upon fair and fruitful cooperation among nations for the greatest good of all, and upon sound, healthy, and mutually beneficial trade relations, is practicable and attainable; that a system based on these principles is far more conducive to the welfare of each and every nation than a state of affairs in which callous disregard of law and morality, with resort to brute force and unbridled violence, are the methods deliberately chosen for the attainment of national aims.

Now that a major war in Europe is a grim reality there is greater necessity than ever before for all nations still in a position to do so to increase their exertions for the preservation of those fundamental principles of civilized international relations, through the application of which alone, we, of the Americas, are firmly convinced, the progress of the human race can be maintained. There is no other basis of enduring peace, of cultural and material advacement for nations and for individuals, of social and political institutions founded upon human freedom and the dignity of the human soul.

It is our devout hope that the conflict now raging in Europe will not extinguish upon that continent the light of that resplendent civilization with which it has, in modern times, illumined the world. It is our fervent prayer that all nations may find in themselves sufficient strength of conscience, of reason, of the very instinct of self-preservation to return—before it is too late—to the tried and proved highway of those basic principles of international relations which, for the moment, continue to function fully only in our hemisphere and in a constantly diminishing area elsewhere.

In the New World we have found that acceptance of these fundamental principles has made for progress and peace. To these same principles all nations can adhere, whenever they choose, and so, together with us, attain once more the blessing of an ordered and law-governed world. Meanwhile, in these hours of tragic trial, it is our duty to ourselves to keep these principles alive in our own midst and to make intensive and unceasing effort toward bringing about adherence to them throughout the world.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVA B. ADAMS

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able speech delivered by my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] on the subject of Neutrality. This speech was delivered at Minneapolis, Minn., and broadcast by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, Mr. Corneaby, for your nice introduction. You have been very kind to me since I arrived in Minneapolis and I am deeply grateful. When I see Senator LUNDEEN in Washington Saturday I shall express to him my personal appreciation of your generous hospitality.

Press dispatches recently released in London and Paris bluntly state, "Unless the United States repeals the arms embargo, democracy will surely perish from the earth," and from Berlin we have a press warning that a repeal of the arms embargo will constitute the first "slip" by the United States toward war.

While these foreign reactions are intensely interesting to us and make us feel important, they are by no means vital or controlling. The Congress will not take a popularity poll in Europe to find out how the proposed changes in our foreign policy fits this selfish European interest or that.

We must make it evident to everyone that our foreign policy is being formulated to enable us to maintain our own neutrality in a realistic and orderly manner, and that policy must above all reflect what appears to us to be an honest and satisfactory method of promoting the welfare, the security, and the happiness of our own 130,000,000 men, women, and children.

This is no time for hysteria or loose thinking. It is a time for serious contemplation. Congress, called into special session today by the President, should go about the business of adopting a neutrality act with the cold-blooded calculations of a banker entering into a business transaction, and we should count the costs, in blood and treasure, of war, with cool heads and accurate adding machines.

There will be a full discussion in Congress of the proposed new neutrality policy, and no successful effort will be made to invoke the gag rule in the United States Senate. All the ramifications of the problem will be gone over exhaustively and at great length.

I look for the President's plan to be adopted with whatever limitations at the moment seem expedient after weeks of bitter discussion, equaling in vigor and intensity the debate over the League of Nations.

The 24 Senators opposing the President's proposal are able and fearless men, with deep-seated convictions acquired from long and diligent study of foreign affairs. I do not agree with their conclusions at all, but I do respect their patriotism, admire their courage, and know full well that the country will listen to their appeal with the rapt attention which their knowledge and sincerity warrant.

No political party and no particular political philosophy has anything to do with their bold determination to prohibit the sale of arms and munitions to belligerents. Their stand comes from the heart and is much deeper than party or personal politics. Every political party and every political school of thought in this country is represented in their ranks.

In this fight they are not Republicans, Democrats, Farm Laborites, or Progressives—they are crusaders in what they believe to be a moral issue of gigantic proportions.

Advocates of the retention of the arms embargo and advocates of its repeal are each erroneously declaring that the opposing policy is the road to war. Neither allegation is truthful nor logical. We can retain the embargo and remain at peace or lift it and still remain at peace. It is by no means the controlling factor in determining this all-important question of war. There may be moral reasons for retaining the embargo and economic reasons for lifting it, but the decision to change it or not to change it is strictly a domestic decision and by itself will have little to do with getting us into war. If we go to war, it will be because of our insane, reckless desire to fight other people's wars and our short memory of the utter futility of the last World War. However, every practical safeguard to insure our continuous peace should be enacted into law by Congress, to the end that the private conduct of every citizen and the official conduct of the United States Government may promote peace and good will with all nations.

Congress will approach this vital problem of American peace determined that under no pretext shall we be "sucked" into the current European butchery; and that under no pretension shall we send the flower of our youth to this bloody slaughter on foreign soil 3,000 miles away.

It is argued that there can be no neutrality between right and wrong and that America, therefore, should not be neutral. We must remember that in international disputes no nation is likely to be wholly right or wholly wrong. The facts affecting these things cannot be fully known to us; and we, therefore, are in no position to judge the equities involved. It is well to remember in this connection that God has not called upon us to be the judge of nations, and neither has He made us His policeman of the world.

We should know that our participation in a world war must mean the immediate suspension of all civil liberties and constitutional government during its duration. We should know that the Federal Treasury, already badly weakened, will reach the status of certain collapse under the strain of conducting a world war, for if we go in, every ounce of our resources and every cent of our capital must be made available to our allies. We should know that a most terrible period of depression and economic chaos must follow the war boom caused by such a gigantic conflict.

The economic, political, and social readjustments following such a war would likely be so violent, so unpredictable, and so difficult in their consequences that no democracy could possibly cope with them. We should realize that it is not our duty to rescue European pride from well-deserved humiliation. We should know that we cannot extinguish the flames of prejudice and hatred which have smoldered and burst forth at irregular intervals through the centuries on the unhappy European continent.

We must understand that if we rectify the blunders and mistakes of the stupid, selfish European diplomats in this instance, that they will be at it again even before the treaty of peace is consummated.

European diplomacy has ever been as cold as the frigid northland; as selfish as the wild beast of the jungle, and as mercenary as the Merchant of Venice. The law of self-preservation warns us to beware of its intrigues.

We are thinking too much in terms of the immediate international situation as we contemplate the President's proposed neutrality measure. The policy which we are asked to adopt is positively not short term or expedient legislation; it is legislation that is expected to remain on the books for a long time and formulating a permanent long-term foreign policy for our country. It is true that the opportune setting for the passage of such legislation is during periods when the world is at peace so that the question may be approached with more light and less heat.

I would remind you, however, that for years now war has been raging in the world. First, it was Italy in Africa. Then the civil war in Spain with most of the nations of Europe helping one side or the other, a typical display of Europe's own idea upon how a neutral nation should conduct itself, and for some time now Japan has been shelling China. So if the United States waits for world-wide peace before she shall determine her own foreign policy and her own neutral position toward belligerents she may never do so. To lift the arms embargo now is positively not an unfriendly act toward any nation.

After this last European war was declared nations all over the world frankly stated their positions toward it. How silly it is to say then that the United States of America does not have a perfect right to openly define her position even though some nations are now at war.

It is true that it isn't good sportsmanship to change the rules after the game starts, but this war is not our game, and we are not a party to it. Thank God that we only occupy a seat in the bleachers as deeply concerned spectators. If we take wise precautions to remain in that fortunate position, who is there with a right to complain. Certainly neither Berlin nor London has any right to quibble about that. As a matter of fact, the only side we should choose to take in any war is our own side.

The so-called cash-and-carry policy is neutral in principle and equitable in practice insofar as we ourselves are able to make it so. It is no fault of a merchant with goods to sell if muddy roads keep customers away. "Cash and carry" provides an honest, open, equitable, and neutral method of transacting international business to belligerents in a time of war.

The United States is happily a Nation with no ambition to expand her territorial dominion and she has absolutely no desire to extend political penetration into any land.

We are honorable in all of our international dealings, and we have no designs upon any nation. There is no sound reason for us to voluntarily quarantine ourselves from the world. We are not a country of cowards. Neither are we a land of knaves. It is in our interest and in the interest of the civilized world that we buy goods and sell goods on the open market, and that is what we propose to do under the cash-and-carry policy.

Neither complete isolation nor complete insulation is either necessary or desirable.

Unless an open trade channel guarded with proper limitations be provided, American goods will likely be bootlegged, smuggled, and sold indirectly, with consequent losses and embarrassments to us. American ships will be tempted to engage in contraband traffic, and if they do not so engage, they will be wrongfully accused of that crime anyway and apt to be indiscriminately subjected to indignities which we in our pride will not tolerate.

With international suspicions rampant, frank, open honesty on the part of the United States will prove to be the imperial virtue and the need of the hour We refuse to favor one nation above the other. We will treat them all fairly and impartially. Under the President's proposal no American ship will be permitted to haul anything for a belligerent to be delivered directly or indirectly, and no one will be given the slightest excuse for suspecting a single ship bearing in permanent design upon its sides the American flag.

Cash and carry does not imply, however, credit and carry. There should be no credit, public or private, extended to any belligerent under the guise of private loans or otherwise. The extension of credit to a belligerent constitutes the rankest kind of unneutrality. It would virtually mean that America was financing the war, and sooner or later in that case our soldiers would follow our dollars into the conflict.

Money loaned to a belligerent can never be repaid and would therefore for all practical purposes constitute a gift. The Johnson Act is effective insofar as it goes, but it will need to be extended and strengthened to cover the whole subject of private and public loans to belligerents.

Unless airplane warfare solves the problem, I doubt whether the Germans can smash the Maginot line, and I seriously doubt that the English and French can successfully break through the Siegfried line. With Russia's unlimited natural resources at her back door, how can the Allies starve Germany? Without Atlantic bases Germany's submarine campaign will shortly be ineffective against English shipping. From this distance it looks very much like a draw, with neither side holding any appreciable advantage.

The United States, by spilling the blood of 2,000,000 American youth, coupled with the expenditure of not less than forty billions of borrowed dollars, could very likely go over the top of the Siegfried line and bring Germany to her knees.

Are we so reckless that we would condemn 2,000,000 American boys to a horrible death in no man's land and spend $40,000,000,000 which we would be obliged to borrow from our citizens with no assurance of repayment simply to conquer Germany and Russia?

We would be fools to go to the expense of crushing Germany and Russia unless we planned to keep an armed guard over them permanently to see that they maintained forever the form of local government which we in our assumed wisdom might prescribe for them.

When we insist upon the right to adopt the form of government of our choosing for ourselves, then, to be consistent, we must grant that same right to every other nation. America hates communism and its blood brother, nazi-ism, with justifiable intensity, but that is not a good excuse for us to engage in a political crusade against them, spilling the blood of our innocent youth to correct merely what we deem to be their political fallacies.

America has neither love nor respect for Stalin or Hitler; but since we firmly believe in our right to choose our own political leaders, we must, to be consistent, advocate Russia's and Germany's right to choose their leaders, however distasteful to us they may be. We should bear in mind that British diplomacy is entirely responsible for Hitlerism.

If the philosophies of nazi-ism and communism be false—and I am certain they are violently in error, because they are founded upon force and not upon justice—then time and circumstances will reveal that error to their own people, and a correction will follow as a natural course. History knows of no other permanent cure for political diseases. We must have patience in such matters. The German people, as a people, are no better and no worse than the English or the French.

For more than a hundred years, under the Monroe Doctrine, we have made the Western Hemisphere the sphere of our influence, and we have denied to Europe any right of territorial expansion or political penetration therein. By inference, at least, we imply in the Monroe Doctrine that we shall not seek political penetration into Europe, for without such an implication the doctrine falls of its own weight.

Under what pretext can we deny the Americas to Europe? Can we consistently say to Europe, "You keep out of the Western Hemisphere" and still maintain that we have the right of political interference in the Eastern Hemisphere?

Only a complete misconception of the Monroe Doctrine and its obvious implications could possibly lead to such an erroneous and unreasonable conclusion. If we will put our temptation to police the world behind us, we will contribute thereby to the cause of world peace; but if we attempt to extend the Monroe Doctrine and make its application world-wide, we will add to world chaos and succeed in making ourselves ridiculous.

No one can predict how long the present war will last. It could end very abruptly, or it might continue for years. But so long as it does continue, Congress should remain in session and meet every emergency as it arises and not delegate one single constitutional power to leaders of the Congress, to the Department of State, or to anyone else. The whole situation is far too precarious to delegate discretionary powers to a small group of men. Under the Constitution, only Congress has the power to declare war, and Congress should exercise all of its other constitutional powers to prevent war. It is too late for it to prevent war after the incidents leading to the declaration have been consummated.

Whosoever advocates that America's participation in this European war is inevitable is hasty and reckless and is permitting his fears or his desires to run away with his better judgment. It is not our duty to destroy our youth and our treasure and to sacrifice our form of government upon the altars of the broken-down diplomacy of Europe.

Hapless Poland is entitled to our deepest sympathies, but God has not delegated America to be His right arm. He has not delegated us to enforce justice and equity in Europe with the sword.

A wise exercise of courage, common sense, and justice by European statesmen in all of the countries at war during the past 20-year period would have spared their people from this unspeakable war. Congress must and will refuse to spill American blood because of the blunders of these selfish, proud European statesmen who rule Europe.

Thirty miles of sea has spared England from invasion for many centuries. Three thousand miles of ocean insulates the Western Hemisphere from the war dogs of Europe. A reasonable policy of preparedness will insure our security and a wise diplomacy, founded upon law and not upon Presidential proclamation, will preserve our peace. Times and circumstances have been kind to us. If we will keep our powder dry, guard against traitorous foreign "isms," proceed cautiously with belligerents, act justly toward all men, and pray sincerely for Divine guidance, peace will be our lot.

If America has the will for peace, she will have peace.

EXCERPT FROM FEDERAL ADMINISTRATORS BY ARTHUR W. MACMAHON AND JOHN D. MILLETT, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS, 1939

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an excerpt from Macmahon and Millett's Federal Administrators.

It seems apparent that in the past too little has been done toward applying approved business methods in an effort to increase the efficiency of the administrative agencies of our Federal Government—the largest corporation in the world.

Turning the pages of this new book on Federal Administrators, my attention was arrested by the section dealing with business managers. The authors use the case-history method of tracing governmental improvements. First they list the inauguration of an experienced general business manager in one of the departments as making an important forward step toward a more efficiently operating state. They describe the significant but little-known success attained by Richardson Saunders, assistant to the Secretary and business manager of the Department of Labor.

This Department administers these divisions: United States Conciliation Service, Labor Standards, Public Contracts, Wage and Hour, Labor Statistics, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Children's Bureau, and Women's Bureau.

Since his appointment by President Roosevelt in 1933, Mr. Saunders has proved himself a valuable public servant. A study of the several innovations for which he is responsible may well point the way for similar integration in other departments and agencies.

BUSINESS MANAGERS

The story of existing business managers is in part a forecast of the matured stage when general managers will be freed for larger responsibilities by having in association with them persons trained to direct the facilitative activities sometimes called departmental housekeeping. The story, however, is in part an account of incomplete stages in the evolution of the general managership itself.

The institutional activities in question notably concern finance (including physical equipment and supplies) and personnel. The Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 required each of the departments to name a "Budget officer" who would be responsible for the preparation of the departmental estimates and their transmission to the Bureau of the Budget. In practice this was likely to entail the further responsibility of managing the appearances on behalf of the department at the hearing before a representative of the Bureau of the Budget and later before the subcommittees on appropriations in Congress. In addition to the Budget officer (though often fused by designation in the same individual), most departments have had a personnel officer. The mere existence of these posts, of course, is no clue to their actual importance. In some cases action on such matters at the department level is largely perfunctory—the estimate forms are sent out and collected; approvals of appointments, leaves, travel authorizations, and the like, are acted upon almost without pretense of discriminating supervision. In any case, where bureaus are vast, intelligent direction at the departmental center must lie in coordination of Bureau organs rather than in sweeping centralization.

Note may properly be taken first of situations in which the business managership may be regarded as a general managership in embryo. The Labor Department has afforded an interesting case of integration proceeding on the business side. Before 1933 the Department seemed amorphous. In point of bulk of operations it was concerned largely with immigration and naturalization, and this preoccupation had become more pronounced in the decade after the close of the World War. Nor was the consideration of immigration channeled; it spilled at the top; responsibility was muddy, shifting. The Department had no focal point; no one existed who even as much as knew by name the key personnel in all of the bureaus. At the time the new administration took charge in 1933 a reorientation in the emphasis of the Department was inevitable. An opportunity was afforded to take account of conditions at the center. An axis was injected in the person of a business manager.

Richardson Saunders, appointed by the President in 1933 to one of the two assistantships to the Secretary provided by law for the Department of Labor, was designated as budget and personnel officer. Saunders had enjoyed considerable experience in financial matters, much of it with public bodies. In 1913 he was appointed assistant engineer in the department of finance of New York City, where his job was to make inspection reports on all the construction work undertaken by the city. When this function was transferred to the board of estimate and apportionment, Saunders continued in his capacity as a supervising engineer. In 1918 he joined the American Cyanamid Corporation as assistant treasurer and comptroller of the Air Nitrates Corporation. From 1919 to 1923 he was consulting engineer for the Emergency Fleet Corporation of the United States Shipping Board and assistant to the director of finance. Thereafter he was associated with various private enterprises, notably as a manager of some of the J. C. Penney properties and banks in Florida. He was president of the Miami Chamber of Commerce from 1928 to 1929 and secretary of the board of regents of the University of Miami.

In his capacity as business manager of the Labor Department, Saunders has been responsible for several innovations of considerable importance. He has introduced a detailed accounting sheet kept on a monthly basis to reveal, in addition to the actual monthly outgo, the total expenditures of the fiscal year to date, the unencumbered balances, and the appropriation item against which each expenditure is charged. The accounting system of the Department has been completely revised and central control of finances has been made a reality. This financial reorganization was effected in cooperation with the General Accounting Office and has been used by other departments in their attempts to improve accounting procedures. Through the hearings on bureau-budget estimates held in his office Saunders has gained an intimate acquaintance with most of the operating details of the Department. In his supervision and control of expenditures he has been assisted by a staff headed by a chief accountant.

All appointments, promotions, and dismissals within the Labor Department are also made through Saunder's office. In the field of personal administration, as in finance, Saunders has brought about two important reforms. He began a system designed to facilitate intradepartmental transfers across bureau lines. He found that there was in the Department practically no knowledge of the work which various individuals performed and no real record of available talent which might be shifted from one bureau to another. Accordingly, at Saunders' behest, the United States

Employment Service, one of the bureaus of the Department, undertook to provide a card index of all the employees of the Department.

Not only was a job history of every individual employee thus made readily available in this way, but there was also a record of comparable jobs throughout the Department It was intended to introduce in the Labor Department a system that will be conducive to a career service. In the second place, Saunders was responsible for the establishment of a conciliation committee within the Department to hear complaints of employees and to investigate matters of employee maladjustment. The committee is composed of four employees and four supervisors, with Saunders as one of the latter and also chairman. All complaints are given careful consideration and usually investigated by a subcommittee; the committee has done important work in improving the morale of the Department. In these developmental activities which affect employment in the Department Saunders has been assisted since 1936 by Robert Chester Smith, director of personnel.

Although inaugurated under auspices which were personal, if not political, in the ordinary sense, the step that has been taken in the Department of Labor is not likely to be retraced. Its spirit has been thoroughly administrative. An important beginning has been made in laying the basis of management, although perhaps in the early years after 1933 the Secretary was too guarded and the avenues of immediate approach at headquarters were too personal to furnish an ideal setting for the development of stable management in its comprehensive sense.

German-American Antirepealists Not Necessarily Pro-Nazi

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence from the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., of September 27, 1939:

[From the Washington Star of September 27, 1939]

GERMAN-AMERICAN ANTIREPEALISTS NOT NECESSARILY PRO-NAZI

(By David Lawrence)

An unfortunate tendency has developed hereabouts with reference to the flood of mail being received on the arms embargo. It is the inclination of the receivers of mail to jump at conclusions about the signers and to regard those who have names of German origin as necessarily sympathetic with the Nazi position.

No greater mistake could be made by Members of Congress than to assume that, because a letter is signed by an American of German ancestry, he wants the embargo maintained so as to help Germany win the war. The truth is there is ample evidence to explain just why Americans of German birth or descent are much more concerned about a possible war abroad than is any other single group. Those of us who recall what happened in the neutrality period between 1914 and 1917 and immediately thereafter, when America entered the war, know the grave injustices which were visited upon German-Americans. The vast majority—indeed, the preponderant number—sympathized with Germany, but the moment America entered the war their allegiance and loyalty to the United States was unquestionable.

It is true, nevertheless, that other people looked with suspicion on German-Americans, and their plight during the war was an uneasy and uncomfortable one. It would not be surprising if the German-Americans of today were as eager to prevent American entrance into the war because of the unhappy relationships that might develop inside America as from any feeling about having to enter battle against blood brethren.

BELIEVE REPEAL MEANS WAR

This raises the point of whether the repeal of the embargo will actually bring nearer or make more remote the possible entrance into the war. It would seem that many German-Americans have been persuaded to believe that the lifting of the embargo is synonymous with eventual entrance of America into the war. Actually this view is not given credence by international-law experts, many of whom feel that the question of American entrance into the war will be decided on other issues altogether, and might, indeed, be the result only of provocation by some belligerent, no matter what laws are passed here.

The view has been advanced among the proponents of the arms embargo that to repeal the law would incur Germany's ill will. But the converse of this proposition is that failure to supply Canada and the British and French may mean incurring the ill will of the nations which buy the most products and have been closest to the United States in the past. Whatever is done about the present neutrality statute is bound to result in some ill will abroad, so the problem may easily resolve itself into whether to offend the democracies or the dictatorships.

EMOTIONAL STAND REVEALED

The letters and telegrams which are pouring in on Senators and Representatives show clearly that many of the senders are emotionally affected by war sympathies, and that many citizens have been accepting the notion that, somehow or other, to change the law is to drag America into war.

The sponsors of such a view have not proved it, and neither can the advocates of repeal prove that their course will keep America out. But there is one thing sure—the American groups of foreign origin are in a difficult spot nowadays through circumstances beyond their control.

Thus a large number of Irish-Americans who have always been anti-British are found urging Members to keep the embargo though they do not indicate they want this done just to hurt Britain. Some Members of Congress representing large Irish districts are urging the retention of the embargo just as are some Members from States where large numbers of German-Americans reside. Reports indicate also that many Scandinavian-Americans are against any change in the existing law.

MANY FAIL TO WRITE

These lines in Congress are being assumed without taking into account the vast number of Irish-Americans or Scandinavians or Poles or Czechs who have not taken the trouble to write to Washington at all. Undoubtedly some foreign money has been spent in America to influence German-Americans and others, but the importance of this can easily be exaggerated, as experience before 1917 readily proves. If German-Americans write vehemently to Members of Congress urging retention of the law about the embargo, it is because they have been told, as have other Americans of Mayflower descent, that to change the law is to involve the United States in a possible war.

The biggest task before the advocates of the cash-and-carry plan is to convince their constituents the new bill will do more to keep America out of war than the old law, and that is what most Members of Congress, irrespective of party, who favor "cash and carry" sincerely believe, for it cannot be emphasized too strongly that there is no disposition in any quarter here to favor American entrance into the war on any conceivable issue except a direct attack on our defenses.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG, OF TEXAS, GIVING HIS VIEWS IN REGARD TO NEUTRALITY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Representative KLEBERG, of the Fourteenth District of Texas, delivered a very able and timely address over the radio last Tuesday evening, September 19, and I feel it should be inserted in the RECORD. It follows:

The subject assigned to me, neutrality, in its general sense may best be described as the condition of a nation which takes no part in a war. Much has already been said and more is to come under this heading, so I think it proper at the outset to make the statement that insofar as neutrality has to do with the purposes of this discussion its objective will be, primarily, that of peace for our country—the United States of America. In talking to you tonight I speak from a veritable Gethsemane of heart and mind—this being the eve before the opening of the special session of Congress called by our President for the purpose of deliberating over what should be done to safeguard the future of our country and, if possible, prevent our involvement in war.

MANY PHASES

There are two kinds of wars—wars of aggression and defensive wars—considering, of course, war from a standpoint involving two or more nations. We have, of course, another kind of war with which we are not concerned for the purposes of this discourse. Wars of rebellion and wars of revolution within the same nation. These latter have no part in view of the subject which is that of neutrality.

Neutrality itself has many phases and can be limited or extended to cover any one of its various types. It may be temporary, conditioned by the existence of war, or established as a permanent policy. The first of these types is the voluntary exercise of sovereign power by a country terminable at its will and independent of external authority. Another type may be constituted from a necessity imposed upon a nation from without by internation agreement and is to place a limit upon the exercise of true sovereign power. Neutrality, in some of its phases, entails reciprocal rights and duties of neutral states and nations as well as belligerents.

NATURAL LAWS

It is my opinion that in a consideration of neutrality such as the one before the special session of the Congress that we should not be blind to other facts and problems of vital importance. Facts which have a definite and inexorable bearing in their possible and probable effects upon the future of our country. It is my purpose in the too brief time for an exhaustive consideration allotted to me to try to make known to you my present thought with reference to this subject which today occupies the minds of all loyal citizens who have reached maturity. Yes, too, the minds of those who have not yet reached that age.

Sound consideration must not ignore natural laws, nor the important lessons of history. Any consideration of neutrality ignoring these is careless. The first law of nature is conceded to be that of self-preservation. The first law of humans is self-defense and it follows, as the day the night, that the first law of nations is national defense and should be thus accepted. If this premise is sound, and I take it to be so, national defense as we understand it may be divided for our purpose into two divisions. I present them in the order which seems to be that of their relative importance.

FRIENDLY RELATIONS

In the first class those intangible but none the less important factors, facts, and things which have to do with the preventing, if humanly possible, of wars of any kind, which, of course, includes a war of invasion. In the second class we find those tangible things known as actual preparedness at home, involving a well-equipped air, land, and sea force, together with the essential equipment, financial and material, for the support of the general military and naval establishments, together with the requirements of the civilian population. Dealing with the first of these divisions of national defense, those matters looking toward the prevention of war and, too, if and when war should come, despite our best efforts, and God forbid, we find that these deterrents or matters looking toward prevention might well constitute an important, if not the most important, part of a sound national-defense program.

In nature those individual forms which bind themselves together under Nature's laws are more effective in both offense and defense, so it is that the individual who has both friends and family is stronger than he who stands alone. I hold, therefore, that in the case of nations it is of paramount importance that our Nation should do everything in its power not to alienate or sever but rather to strengthen the bonds of its friendships and ties with other countries. We should likewise by our conduct do all those things which might tend to add to the list of friendly countries which today is tragically small. Our friendship is important to these and their friendship and attitude toward us is invaluable in this tragic hour.

CONDITIONS NOT THE SAME

In this connection let us review the facts which make up the situation which confronts us under the present Neutrality Act. This act, with its embargo provision, was voted by a Congress with the same determined objective as the present Congress. Back in 1935 world conditions were far different from those which confront us today, and by this action of a devoted group of your fellow citizens and before the development of present conditions to their present state had come upon us, we found the embargo provision of this act instead of functioning in accordance with the ideal of neutrality was an unneutral instead of a neutral act. Conditions had so shaped themselves in Spain, Ethiopia, and China as to make the Neutrality Act one which forced us into the position of strongly aiding the aggressor in each case while at the same time denying succor to the aggrieved. Of course, we know that we cannot correct one wrong by perpetrating another and to be left in a position which is a result of a wrongful act, or to say the least an act which places us in the wrong light, and permit that condition to remain unchanged is a wrongful act of omission.

EMBARGO NOT NEUTRAL

The embargo provision of the present law of our land places an embargo on materials, munitions, and supplies of war prohibiting their leaving our country indirectly or directly with a destination in another land or lands to be used by belligerents at war with one another. A state of war under this provision must be found to exist by the President of the United States and upon this finding the President is ordered to proclaim the embargo to be in effect and is to list all of those materials which he deems may be defined as munitions and supplies of war as well as those nations at war. In my opinion, for many reasons which time does not permit me to give, the very existence of this embargo provision to the act as well as the manner provided in the act for its being made effective constitutes a violation of any sane conception of national defense and neutrality itself.

EXAMPLE OF OTHER NEUTRALS

After much study it is my present thought and my mind is still open to conviction otherwise that neutrality, by direct legislative act is a gesture. That neutrality is a matter which cannot be legislated into existence but rather must be the expression of public opinion and determination of a people evidenced by their action and proper resolutions by duly constituted representative authority as well as action by the people themselves. I have in mind for the basis of this statement the historic significance of the maintained neutrality of Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Finland, etc., in the last World War. A neutrality which was maintained without legislation or restriction in any form. I hold that because of the manifest impossibility of predicting the future, in days when events transpire with unbelievable speed and kaleidoscopic succession, that there can be no wisdom in restrictions being placed on the future necessary activities of our country in the face of unpredictable events to follow. The vital nature and importance of this line of reasoning and thought is not weakened by a survey of existing facts. Facts which are notable indeed if we cast a discerning look into the future which, of course, must be based on intelligent reconnaissance of the past.

IF ALLIES ARE VANQUISHED

At this juncture I submit an interrogatory for the purpose of developing this phase with greater clarity. What do patriotic and thinking people see in the future of the United States and North America if, perchance, England and France were to be vanquished and their naval forces taken from the seas? Documentary history, insofar as it affects us in the United States, calls our attention to the existence of the Monroe Doctrine. Factual history would indicate the investment of German capital in Latin, North, and South America. World War history brings before our eyes again the tragic plight of Europe. More recent history indicates the vastly more destructive results of ultramodern warfare and the development of machinery for human destruction. We can readily visualize the condition of the Old World of tomorrow at the conclusion of a titanic struggle which might end in the erasure of England and France as nations and as factors in the preservation of the freedom of the seas. In this capacity the development of the naval strength of the United States has been limited by reason of our reliance and dependence upon the continued strength of the naval power of England and France. The English Navy was treated, for example, as an adjunct part and parcel of our own in the maintenance of free access to the seas. Our Navy, because of this accepted theory, has been deemed sufficient to meet our requirements, but upon a review of the picture which presents itself with England and France removed we see its hopeless weakness and inadequacy.

ALLIES' PREDICAMENT

I have refrained with purpose from enumerating more explicitly by name or otherwise the probable, possible, and potential future developments. I do this in belief that the time is not yet arrived for more explicit expression. And now to another picture, from which you may discern some of the vital reasons why I feel that the embargo provision should be lifted from a standpoint of neutrality when considered as a part of national defense.

England and France depend for their arms, munitions, guns, and shells and explosives, on munition factories located in France and England—two rather small countries territorially. These factories and sources of supply in France and England would, of course, be an immediate target were a concerted air raid to be conducted by the many times numerically superior air forces of Russia, Germany, and Italy. Their destruction would mean for France and England land, sea, and air guns with no available supply of ammunition; and with the present embargo in existence, what is there to deter the totalitarian states of Russia, Germany, and Italy from attempting, to say the least, the attainment of this objective?

CASH AND CARRY

Let us turn to the other view of the matter, with the embargo out of the way, and with all material, equipment, and munition sources in the United States available to all of the world and every nation therein, provided they come, procure, pay for, and sail away with their purchases. This to be made possible by a repeal of the embargo provision and the substitution therefor of a simple resolution by both Houses of the Congress. This resolution should set out the expressed determination of the American people not to engage in a foreign war, containing, of course, the salient and unassailable truth that we have no desire to accept or create any responsibility for the inability or ability of paying for and taking away these supplies which exist in definite degree with reference to other countries. We will not be responsible for either the war in which they find themselves involved or their failure in foresight looking toward maintaining the essentials which would permit them to use our markets and ports.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

International law, age old as well as recent, neither inhibits nor prescribes this attitude on the part of a nation which is by common consent an accepted neutral posture. Another angle and this derived from examining the picture which thus presents itself as a deterrent, for instance, to an effort to prosecute to fulfillment a war to the end between Russia, Germany, and Italy as against France and England. What will Italy's outlook be with reference to her situation in the Mediterranean? Would she not quickly see the impregnability of the British blockade of the Suez Canal and the Straits of Gibraltar? Would not Italy, Russia, and Germany combined see that the mere destruction of munition sources in England and France would not be the end? They would immediately visualize the situation without the embargo and England and France free to obtain supplies elsewhere. A long-drawn-out war would be inevitable, the outcome doubtful. Pressing economic forces would combine to the extent that Russia, Germany, and Italy would think of plans to end the struggle by peace negotiations rather than a continuation of responding to hallucinations bent upon human destruction and conquest.

FREEDOM TO TRADE

For the stated reasons may I in conclusion simplify my position? I believe the arms embargo should be repealed because it is both unneutral and in violation of sound national-defense policies. I believe it should be repealed because to fail to do so now would constitute an actual act of unneutrality by the failure to act in remedy of our unneutral position favoring as we do the totalitarian states as against states who believe in Almighty God, freedom of speech, and religious worship. I believe the embargo should be repealed because it constitutes a continuing menace to our peace and that it provides a way at least whereby—and God forbid the event—we might be forced to the choice of abandoning the Monroe Doctrine, and at the same time finally be called upon to defend ourselves from organized attack from abroad. And, lastly, because simple logic and such reasoning power as I possess indicate no sane reason why we should bind the United States of America by a law of our own creation and acceptance from freedom of decision and action in meeting future unpredictable events.

My every thought is for the purpose of serving the Fourteenth Congressional District and our country, which we all love in the most effective way, in staying out of war by every possible and honorable means. We have no reason to go to war as I see it, no excuse to become involved in war, and certainly I am convinced that, saving a war of actual defense, all we can ever possibly gain from a war of that character would be the continuing chance to live and remedy our grievous error which we will have committed if we permit this Nation to go to war.

ETERNAL FAITH, VIGILANCE NECESSARY

I ask all of you, my fellow Americans, for your unselfish and patriotic assistance to lead us to the right answer and to help the Congress of the United States in serving a great people which can always be depended upon to strive for the continuation of our form of government and the priceless guaranty of a freeman's right to a continuation of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness free from fears and oppression. I will welcome your advice by letter, any and all of you, and will appreciate your support in this trying period. God willing, we will have peace if we deserve.

Along with life and liberty the God of our fathers gave us reason as a distinguishing factor between men and other forms of life.

As a result of the exercise of reason came our form of government as a reward for our faith in God born of reason. Let us tonight by prayer and purpose reassert our faith in God, in representative democracy and our form of government, and the orderly processes of enlightened reason.

Eternal faith and vigilance today are the price of both liberty and peace.

We are the most peace-loving people on earth, but God forbid the stress which might provoke our other side.

Let us preserve the faith, O God, for you and our land.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ABERDEEN (WASH.) DAILY WORLD

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herewith an editorial entitled "I Am War," from the issue of September 6, 1939, of the Aberdeen Daily World, published at Aberdeen, Wash., and written by Mr. Ed Van Syckle, a brilliant young newspaperman residing in my district. I have read many denunciations in poetry and prose of the horrors and diabolical effects of war, but in my opinion this editorial by Mr. Van Syckle is unsurpassed in all the literature which is extant on the subject and is worthy of preservation in our permanent records:

[From the Aberdeen (Wash.) Daily World of September 6, 1939]

I AM WAR

I am War. Yes; you know me; but there are grass and flowers covering the scarred fields where we met before. You daintily balance your teacups, and relish your wine, and you talk small talk with your neighbors over back-yard fences. You have replanted your groves and the grain waves in the gentle winds. You work and play and dance, and trifling things amuse you. So you are prone to forget me. But you should not.

For I am War. Remember? I have called on you before. I have taken from your huts and your castles, your great buildings that gleam so magnificently in the sun. You came to me from your hills and your plains and the secluded valleys where you felt so safe and secure. I demanded it. I took you from your firesides, the peace of your quiet lanes, the mills and factories, from the oceans and all the lands that you call home. And some I did not let return. Thousands, millions did not return.

For I am War. I kill. I ravage and despoil. I am the waster of flesh and brains * * * and youth. For if I do not take you I will take your son. And I will leave only a stench on the battlefield. I do not care if he is brave or cowardly. I will sprawl his body by some tiny pool made by the rains. And the curly head you fondled and the smile that lifted your heart will be smeared with blood. Yes; it will be ghastly.

I will torture you with anguish and fear. I will rend your body until you wish death to ease the pain. I will tear the white throats of your children. On the pavements they will lie and gaze into the heavens with staring but not understanding eyes. I will leave your cities in shambles and your peoples will strew the streets in death.

Your homes will be ruins, or gaping craters where they once stood. You will search in vain for those that lived there, for one small trace; and you will hope to God it cannot be found.

A whole generation of you will die. Or it will come back in torment, and scarred, and broken, with faces hardened by agony and bitterness. And the memories torturous, the hatreds, the broken faiths, the spending of your substance, the losses that even God cannot replace * * * they will scourge you for generations and generations to come.

Yes; you will remember me. For I am War.

The European Situation and Neutrality

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 26, 1939

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Tuesday evening, September 26, 1939:

I am grateful to the Columbia Broadcasting System for an opportunity to speak over their network from Chicago during the American Legion national convention.

The American Legion is one of the greatest patriotic organizations in America and its members know what war is. I am positive that the rank and file of the Legion are overwhelmingly in favor of strict neutrality and keeping America out of war unless we are attacked.

I happen to have been the chairman of the subcommittee that drew up the preamble to the American Legion constitution, which has never been changed, and I am, I believe, the oldest war veteran in point of service in the Congress.

I do not claim, however, to speak for the Legion, except as a paid-up member, but I have spoken in Legion posts in almost every State of the Union and know that there is no greater force in our country for strong national defense and for keeping America out of war.

There is even now being waged in Legion ranks, and throughout the country, a bitter controversy between the adherents of an arms embargo and the cash-and-carry plan, which now turns out to be a credit scheme. But there is no real controversy between Legionnaires or the American people about keeping out of war, in spite of the propaganda of the internationalists at home and foreign propaganda from abroad.

It is refreshing to speak from Chicago, where the Chicago Tribune has led the fight against all un-American activities at home and consistently exposed the propaganda of the internationalists to involve us in foreign entanglements and war.

The eastern seaboard press is international-minded, and seems to be under the impression that the traditional American policies established by Washington, of neutrality and nonintervention in European quarrels, is outmoded and that our manifest destiny now is to police and quarantine the world.

Newspapers like the New York Times, the Washington Post, and a host of others in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Boston, are so biased in their internationalism and advocacy of sanctions, concerted action, and collective security that it is almost impossible to obtain a hearing in the large eastern papers in behalf of our traditional American foreign policies of neutrality and no entangling alliances.

For that reason it has become necessary to get time on the radio to reach the people in their homes.

It is my definite opinion that 90 percent of the American people want to stay out of war—that the percentage is higher in the West than in the East is due to the eastern international press. However, about 25 percent of the people are, through propaganda, being led to believe that war is inevitable. I am primarily concerned with combating this false and vicious propaganda, which is far more dangerous than any of the proposed modifications of the Neutrality Act. The real issue is keeping out of war, and exposing those elements in our midst who, although giving lip service to peace, are endeavoring to ease us into war. I do not believe that 10 percent of the Members of Congress would vote for war unless we are attacked.

Main Street is swamping Congress with letters and telegrams for strict neutrality, an embargo on arms, and for keeping out of war. The propaganda machine of the administration has become so worried about the avalanche of mail from the wage earners, farmers, and small-business men, and often big-business men like Henry Ford and Ernest Weir, chairman of the Steel Institute, from all parts of the country, that an alibi had to be concocted. Someone had to be blamed; a "goat" had to be found. Why not the Communists? I have no love for the Communists, but if my memory is correct, the Communists and radical new dealers have been bedfellows for the last 6 years, and Stalin and Roosevelt have been their political gods. But a "red herring" had to be found, so why not the "reds"?

I imagine that such powerful American groups as the church elements, the National Grange, the American Federation of Labor, veterans' organizations, and millions of American mothers will resent the implication that they are pawns for the Communists in wanting strict neutrality and to keep out of war. However, that is the type of propaganda one can expect from administration sources.

A few days ago the submarine bugaboo was loosed on the people, and turned out to be a complete dud. Now it is claimed that the Nazis and Communists are influencing public opinion and running the country. I admit, if my old aversion—the Communists—are, it is the fault of the administration that has kissed and pampered them consistently, particularly around election day for their votes.

The real line-up on the arms-embargo issue is Main Street against half of Wall Street, which is far from united, as some of the biggest bankers and industrialists are for the retention of the arms embargo. Main Street does the fighting and pays the bills. Wall Street makes the munitions and collects the profits.

Even the administration propaganda machine cannot get very far against Main Street as long as we have freedom of the press and the radio. If the American people insist on retaining the arms embargo and notify Congress there will be no loans, no American soldiers sent to Europe, and we will keep out of foreign wars.

Mr. Michaelson, chief Democratic propagandist, 24 hours after President Roosevelt's plea for national unity and nonpartisan action on neutrality legislation, issued a blast blaming the Republicans for opposing the President's cash-and-carry plan because of partisan advantage with a view to the 1940 elections. Let me say to Mr. Michaelson that the Vorys arms-embargo amendment was adopted in the House of Representatives by a majority of 41 votes, where incidentally I led the fight for it with the help of 61 Democratic Members who, in spite of the terrific pressure exerted from the White House, voted for it.

It was openly said that these courageous Democrats were threatened with being purged if they did not support the President. Now it is claimed that the Republicans are playing politics, when, as a matter of record, President Roosevelt cracked the whip on his party in the House and Senate from the very beginning. At the so-called nonpartisan conference held last week not a single Republican Member of the Senate or House Committee on Foreign Relations was invited.

The Democratic majority of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee even excluded the Republican minority from its meetings in formulating its bill. In view of this procedure I propose to issue a call for a meeting of the minority members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on October 9 to consider the parliamentary situation, with a view to protecting the legislative rights of the House of Representatives in case the Senate virtually substitutes a new bill. No matter what happens in the Senate the House of Representatives, in my opinion, will stand firm for the arms embargo.

I shall insist that the House be permitted ample time to consider any new proposals and to offer amendments to them.

I cannot understand how any Member of Congress from a seaboard State could favor the credit-and-carry plan, which is an intolerable discrimination against our ships and would practically destroy our merchant marine. For years the Congress has been appropriating huge sums of money to build up our merchant marine, and now it is proposed to scrap it in a cowardly manner.

I see no reason why our merchant ships cannot go into the war zones at their own risk, like those of all other neutrals. Norway lost over 1,000 ships in the World War, and Sweden and Holland several hundred. England, the mistress of the seas, lost a hundred ships in the recent war in Spain.

I'm convinced that any traffic in arms for blood money and war profits is the same as digging the graves of American soldiers in foreign lands. I have always upheld the profits system in America, based on reasonable profit and private initiative, and have debated this issue with Norman Thomas a half dozen times. I agree with Mr. Thomas, however, and the Socialist Party in favor of an embargo on arms.

If we permit the sale of arms for war profit and blood-smeared dollars to kill people with whom we are at peace, we endanger the security of America and the lives of our youth. If we do, then there is something rotten in the profit system. I do not propose to sacrifice American lives for foreign dollars. Instead, if necessary, I would be willing to urge that the Government take over and operate the munitions plants in the United States.

At the present time England and France can buy every conceivable commodity from us except arms and ammunition and airplanes. The Vorys amendment would permit the sale of airplanes, as it struck out the words "implements of war." If the Senate adopts it and adds a proviso that American ships go into the war zones at their own risk, that would end the controversy.

In addition every dollar spent by foreign nations for arms or ammunition in America means just one less dollar to be spent to buy American cotton, wheat, corn, pork, and other foodstuffs.

I have always opposed all halfway measures, such as sanctions, compulsion, and collective security, as they all mean war—bloody, destructive, and ruinous war—in which even the victor loses. By the same token the sale and shipment of arms is a halfway measure that leads to war and tens of thousands of American crosses in foreign lands.

I am willing to appropriate millions or billions for national defense, but not one single dollar to send American soldiers to foreign lands to fight other peoples' battles. We did that once and got no thanks, except to be called Uncle Shylock over the repudiation of the war debts.

The big issue in America is to keep out of war, and the only way I know how to do it is to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunition and to enact a real neutrality law. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, Switzerland, Spain, and Italy, all in the war zones, are able to remain neutral; and why haven't we the same common sense to stay out of the eternal wars of Europe? No matter where our sympathies may be we must preserve our own free institutions and American liberties instead of becoming involved in foreign entanglements and wars.

I do not know what kind of neutrality bill will be finally passed in the Senate, but whether it is good or bad it will have to come back for action in the House of Representatives.

I do not believe in selling arms and ammunition in time of peace or in time of war. It is an unholy, immoral, un-Christian, and also dangerous traffic.

I have stated my views consistently in the Congress for over 10 years against any traffic in arms. I doubt if a single neutral state in Europe would sell arms and lethal weapons to any of the belligerents, so why should we?

There is very little difference between selling cannon, antiaircraft, and machine guns than selling torpedo boats and submarines or of arming belligerent ships. What is to prevent any belligerent merchant ships from buying cannon and, after they are beyond the 12-mile limit, to arm themselves? If this is done we would have an "Alabama claims" on our hands when the war in Europe is ended.

If Congress refuses to repeal the arms embargo, it will amount to serving notice that we propose to keep out of Europe's wars. If we repeal it, it means that we are halfway in, and the next step will be to substitute credit for cash, and that is in the making in the proposed fake Senate neutrality bill. The third and final step is shipping our soldiers over to the battlefields of Europe after our arms and credit or loans. The good ship "Cash and Carry" has already been torpedoed by the administration and even before it was actually launched. The real purpose is now apparent; credit is substituted for cash, and we are back to 1914.

I pray to God that there will be peace in Europe in 6 months, and I think there is a good chance of it if none of the combatants can break through each other's heavily fortified lines. I am inclined to believe if we do not repeal the arms embargo it may hasten a return to peace, and by the same token if we repeal it and sell arms and deadly weapons we may be prolonging the destructive war, with no assurances of victory for England and France. I do not propose by my vote to gamble or speculate with the lives of American citizens by repealing the arms embargo and making America the potential slaughterhouse of the world for war profits and blood money that might involve us in war.

If we are to go to war in the future, it must be in defense of America and not in defense of our munitions makers, war profiteers, stock-market speculators, or for any foreign country.

The National Committee to Keep America Out of Foreign Wars, composed of 50 Members and former Members of Congress, which successfully conducted a campaign to arouse public sentiment in behalf of the arms embargo as adopted by the House of Representatives last June, is again on the job to maintain the arms embargo both in the House and Senate, in an effort to keep America out of all foreign wars. I hope that all Americans who hold the same views will cooperate with this committee in support of its program. I will be glad to furnish, on request, any information desired regarding the organization and its program.

A Sound Proposal for a Permanent Domestic Recovery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

PROPOSAL BY MR. JAY C. HORMEL, OF AUSTIN, MINN., OF AN ECONOMIC PROGRAM TO BRING LASTING PROSPERITY TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES THROUGH THE DEVELOPMENT OF HOME MARKETS AND BY INCREASING OUR PERMANENT TRADE WITH NEUTRAL NATIONS

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me today, I take the opportunity of presenting to the Congress and the country a worthy proposal for a lasting domestic recovery as presented by Mr. Jay C. Hormel, of Austin, Minn. Mr. Hormel's suggestion should have the considerate attention of Congress, the administration, and the country in connection with the enactment of neutrality legislation. In my opinion, we should strive to build for permanent prosperity for the United States instead of a wartime boom with its detrimental consequences. Protecting our home markets and permanent development of foreign trade with neutral nations gives the key to lasting prosperity.

PROPOSAL FOR DOMESTIC RECOVERY

I think that almost to a man, those who saw action in the World War want to keep America out of this war. Those men are thinking of their comrades-in-arms who were on the casualty lists of 20 years ago.

To a man, also, those who have observed the economic consequences of the last war should want to spare America from again suffering those economic consequences it brought about.

We are so interdependent in this world that it is impossible for one nation to attain an isolation which will protect it against suffering the ills which affect the rest of the world. It is impossible for this country to escape the consequences of impoverishment which are bound to come to Europe as a result of the war.

Of course, if we get into the war, we must throw our every resource to wartime activity. Then we will suffer the full economic consequences of the war.

If we stay neutral, we can still gear our economy to the war in such a way as to make it inevitable that we suffer the full economic consequences.

If, however, we do not gear ourselves to wartime economy, the economic consequences for America need not exceed the effect which Europe's reduced buying power will have on us.

Being in the meat business, I will use examples from the meat and livestock industry.

Twenty years ago we had an export meat and lard business. We lost it.

Why?

Because Europe became so poverty stricken in the World War that she was forced to become self-sustaining. She had to almost stop buying our livestock products.

Until last week England imposed a quota system against our meats. Today the quota restrictions are removed. We are invited to increase our meat and livestock production. We are invited to rebuild our meat- and livestock-producing machinery. We are invited to divert a large number of people from their normal activity to that of producing meat and livestock products for the Allies.

We know this is only temporary business. We know that when the war is over Europe again will be so poor it will be forced to exist on what it can produce within its own economy. American workers who have left some sort of employment to engage in meat and livestock production again will be thrown out of their jobs. Their present employment will have become disorganized and disrupted and will not be available to them when the "producing for war" spree is over.

Where 10,000,000 men make up our army of unemployed today, we may have 25,000,000 unemployed as "recovery" from this war starts; that is, if we gear ourselves to this war economy.

On the other hand, if we do not gear ourselves to this war economy, we may find here an opportunity for some recovery of our own situation. For example, some thirty-odd million pounds of ham were imported from Poland last year. This many hams produced at home would require the employment of 40,000 or 50,000 farmers and farm hands, 2,000 packing-house workers, in addition to all the necessary employees in collateral businesses—the production and transportation of coal and salt and packages—everything needed, in fact, from hog houses and granaries straight through to delivery and distribution facilities for the finished product.

There are similar opportunities in the thousands of other American industries.

In addition, by making for ourselves the things which we have been getting from the nations now at war, we can further move toward the reemployment of those who lost their businesses and their employment because of the last war. There is added opportunity if we gain for ourselves markets among the neutral countries which the warring nations are now neglecting.

If we can somehow take advantage of this opportunity to expand and stabilize our normal economy, if we can somehow eliminate all artificial interference with the normal flow of business and avoid any impediments to the free working of the natural stimulants to business, this country might well find itself in good economic health by the time the war in Europe ends.

On the other hand, if we take all the war business we can get and can handle, and struggle for wartime production and profit, we will be putting our unemployed at temporary rather than permanent work. We will divert a great number of currently employed from their permanent jobs to temporary jobs. We will boom our land prices and incur debts on the basis of an inflated price structure. We will produce impoverished farm lands and increase taxes. We will bring upon ourselves unemployment and losses when the period of readjustment comes.

Apparently we are now faced with the most important choice in our history. We can move into a fool's paradise, based on temporary wartime business, or we can take this opportunity to improve our domestic working for each other.

America Loves Peace and Hates War

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY, OF NEW YORK, AT OSLO, NORWAY, AUGUST 17, 1939

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at Oslo, Norway, August 17, 1939, as a delegate in the American group to the Interparliamentary Union:

Mr. Chairman and fellow delegates, I have the honor, as a Member of the Congress of the United States of America, to represent a district which is located in the heart of the great city of New York, a city with a population of over 7,000,000 people. This city is composed largely of foreign-born citizens and of their children to the first and second generation. Our population is drawn from every country in the world. Among our Senators and Representatives we find men who were born in European countries. Many of the children of our foreign-born citizens can point with pride to grandparents who fought in the War between the States to preserve our Union.

The citizens of my beloved country are best described in the following words of the poet Irving entitled "Americans All," a school poem studied by my son, John Kennedy, aged 10, who is now sitting in this historic legislative chamber.

"So when on the horizon rises
A war cloud to threaten the land,
With liberty's native-born children
Shoulder to shoulder they stand,
For America ready to battle,
For America ready to fall,
Not Russians nor Swedes nor Italians—Americans all."

Regardless of their origin, race, creed, or color, they are undivided in their loyalty to the land of their adoption, the United States of America. This is as true today as it was in 1917. The people of my city are pacifists in the sense that they love peace and hate war. The people of my State and my Nation also hate war and love peace.

Many of the delegates from the United States have intimate personal knowledge about war from actual military service and want peace more than anything else in the world. Whatever success my country or fellow citizens of the United States enjoy they enjoy because of their intense love of peace and fair dealing with other people and nations.

World peace is the most urgent problem of the human race to which we can address ourselves at this conference. Today peace is the subject uppermost in the minds of all right-thinking citizens throughout the civilized world. The sun never sets on the mothers of the world praying for peace. The mothers in the far-flung reaches of the Sahara Desert are just as much concerned about their boys and world peace as the mothers in the crowded city streets of Berlin, London, Paris, New York, and Oslo. At this very minute, the strongest human impulse in the heart of every mother is a desire for enduring peace.

Let us hope that this conference of 1939 will make a definite contribution to the cause of lasting peace. In my opinion, we can make such a contribution by urging the citizens of the world to return to the lessons that we were all taught at the knee of our mothers. These lessons consisted of obeying the Golden Rule and the Ten Commandments. Briefly, they are the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. Let us all urge my proposal, because its formula is so well known and has proven so successful in the past that it should be our guide for the present and the future.

I have purposely refrained from quoting the speeches and remarks of any contemporary statesman on the question of war and peace because, however appropriate those remarks may be, there is the possibility of misinterpreting or of maliciously twisting the true content of the speech. Suffice it to say that many volumes have been written on the subject by the best minds of the world, but unfortunately their words have fallen upon barren soil.

I am sure that we all fervently hope that the efforts of His Holiness, Pope Pius XII for a peaceful settlement of the pending controversies between some of the nations will meet with success.

Let us, here in Oslo, determine to do everything possible to avoid war. We should stop at nothing short of victory in our fight for peace. I cannot stress too strongly the importance of constructive leadership in these troublesome times, and in my opinion the Interparliamentary Union should provide this leadership to the citizens of the world. By our calm and friendly approach to the problems that vex the universe, we will give new courage and confidence to all those whose faith seems shaken in the parliamentary system of government, and we will add strength to the keystone of society—the home.

Last evening, as I left this building which is the home of the Parliament of Norway, I felt homesick, being so far away from America, but this feeling soon left me because as I walked to my hotel, mingling with the crowds, I soon felt as if I were back home in dear old New York. I met friendly faces swimming out of the crowd and I walked shoulder to shoulder with many a tired father going home to a family waiting to welcome him. I saw the light falling slantwise past the glowing cornices of your great buildings and I felt the hum of wholesome activity which means contentment, and while these things were happening I again realized that regardless of geographical location or nationality, the home is the one place in all this world that is immune to hate and fear. In the charmed circle of the home is heard the laughter of happy children and here is found the love of a faithful wife and devoted mother. The tradition of the home must always be preserved regardless of the cost—without it this world of ours would be an empty and dreary place in which to live.

LETTER FROM THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF AND RESOLUTION OF THE FORTIETH NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to the President of the United States from the commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and also a resolution adopted by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Formulated on the basis of numerous resolutions adopted at the Fortieth Annual National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, held in Boston, Mass., August 28 to September 1, 1939, our policies for the ensuing year, briefly summarized, are as follows:

1. Security for America, by more modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel and mobilized men for effective national-defense purposes; by equalizing the profits and burdens of war; and by an actual neutrality as to wars outside of the Americas.

2. Security for American citizens, by extending governmental employment and assistance only for citizens; by reducing all immigration quotas; by deporting all criminal and undesirable aliens; by promoting constructive youth activities, adult education, and public forums; by exposing all anti-American activities; by upholding our constitutional liberties; and by revitalizing our representative democracy.

3. Security for America's veterans and their dependents, by employment for those who are employable; by adequate compensation and care for those veterans who were disabled in service; by pensions for those war veterans who are vocationally handicapped by disabilities; and by adequate pensions for the dependent widows and orphans of all deceased veterans.

Because of the great importance of our Nation's international policies, we attach hereto a copy of the adopted resolution designed to keep America out of war.

Your consideration of our V. F. W. policies, aimed, we earnestly feel, to serve the best interests of our country, our comrades, and their respective communities, will be highly appreciated.

Very respectfully yours,

OTIS N. BROWN,
Commander in Chief.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

ACTUAL NEUTRALITY FOR THE UNITED STATES

Resolution 243

Whereas power politics have long been the most potent factors in the policies of the more powerful nations of Europe and Asia; and

Whereas recent developments in Europe have definitely established that economic, prestige, and power considerations are of much greater importance to and a much greater motivating force in the various countries in Europe and Asia than are any differences in their respective ideologies of government; and

Whereas the World War did not end all wars, did not advance the ideals of democracy, and did not restrain the spread of autocratic, dictatorial, and totalitarian forms of government, as per the hopes held out in the slogans used by American citizens during the period of the World War as justification for our participation therein; and

Whereas our participation in the World War has so far cost the Nation more than $50,000,000,000; the lives of more than 130,000 of the youth of our Nation; more than 193,000 of them being wounded, and in service-connected disabilities for perhaps more than 500,000, of whom 340,000 are now receiving compensation, in addition to unmeasured misery for the surviving widows and orphans and parents of deceased World War veterans; and

Whereas our Nation's participation in any possible future world war would prove to be infinitely more devastating and costly economically, financially, and in the lives and health of the youth and citizens of our Nation than was so as to the last World War, with no resulting advantages for our country or for civilization generally which would justify such sacrifices on our part; and

Whereas it is believed that it would be infinitely better for the cause of civilization generally, and for the cause of our country and its people in particular, that the United States keep out of war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby advocate the adoption and application of the following policies, designed to keep America out of war:

1. Adequate mechanized, motorized matériel and trained men for national defense.

2. Renounce war as an instrument of international policy.

3. Recognize the existence of war regardless of its formal declaration by any belligerent.

4. Advocate compliance with the provisions of the Kellogg Treaty.

5. Proclamation by the United States that it will not engage in any war of aggression.

6. Proclamation by the United States that it will support and defend the Monroe Doctrine.

7. Withdraw armed protection to American citizens, after a period of warning, during their continued travel or residence in any country at war or in any war danger zone.

8. Disclaim responsibility for the safety of American citizens in any country which is at war or in any war danger zone.

9. Continue compliance with the provisions of the so-called Johnson Act.

10. Prohibit the extension of credit or loans by the United States or any of its citizens to any country or its citizens which is engaged in war.

11. Permit sale of supplies to any nation at war only if paid for, and only if ownership thereof is transferred at our shore lines, without any protection or responsibility whatsoever by the United States Government as to same.

12. Prohibit any American merchant vessels from becoming armed.

13. Provide for the clear identification of all American merchant vessels during time of war between other nations.

14. Disclaim any responsibility for the protection of any American merchant vessels which carry any merchandise to any country at war or into any danger zone, but permit clearance of American vessels only if adequate private insurance is carried on such vessels and members of their crews which travel into any danger zones.

15. Take the profits out of any possible future war by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes.

16. Enact legislation to provide adequately for all disabled veterans and the dependents of all deceased veterans of all wars, past and future.

17. Conduct an educational program to show the costs of war.

18. Encourage peaceful international negotiations to adjust most irritating deficiencies, differences, and inequities among nations.

The Arms Embargo

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

LETTER FROM JACOB PANKEN

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, which was published in the New York Times of September 24, 1939:

[From the New York Times of September 24, 1939]

MISTAKEN ACTION—ARMS EMBARGO REGARDED AS AN ERROR OF CONGRESS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

For 20 years, within the limits of my sphere and my ability, I warned my fellow Americans against the menace reared in Russia. In common with all Americans, I held and still hold dear the right of each individual with his fellows to decide the kind of world he wants to live in, the kind of government he wants to live under. The Russian adventure was not an expression of its people. The regime was born in the murder of its opponents, suckled on blood, and perpetuated in the denial of freedom of conscience and human rights.

Bolshevik ideology was not intended to be confined within its own borders. Like worms boring into healthy trees and fruit, Russia's ideology was made to bore into and within the democracies. Bolshevism is an ideology which denies the truth, mocks decency, abandons morals, and epitomizes the lie. It developed a philosophy which spurns the culture (and culture is accumulated decencies and morals of the ages) of all who refuse to accept bolshevism. The moral code, accepted by man and by which he lives, is regarded as capitalistic and in consequence it must be destroyed. That's bolshevism. That also is nazi-ism.

DESTRUCTIVE PHILOSOPHY

The human race has, over the centuries, stored up the results of its experience, and out of experience came our concepts of right, truth, and justice. The philosophy of bolshevism is like that of nazi-ism. That of the Nazis is also the philosophy of the Bolsheviks. Destroy all that has been created, acquired, and built.

In September 1938, the heart of Hitler bled for the poor Sudeten Germans, the "blood brothers" of the German people. In September 1939, the heart of Stalin bleeds for his "blood brothers," poor Ukrainians and White Russians. How much alike these two regimes are, these two ideologies when put in practice; how similar even they are in propaganda.

For 20 years blood brothers of Stalin in Poland were not deemed oppressed, for there was not even a squeak out of Stalin on their behalf. For almost 20 years the Sudeten Germans were an integral part (just as Ukrainians and White Russians are part of Poland), of Czechoslovakia. But all of a sudden a terrible hue and cry went up that blood brothers were being oppressed, murdered, bled, and otherwise maltreated, so the big brothers came to their assistance.

SUBVERSIVE PENETRATION

Russia and Germany—Germany makes the kill and Russia feeds on it, and in the rear, there is Japan; there is Italy, watching, waiting for its opportunity to join in.

Russia penetrated into our own country through "fellow-travelers," through the "party line gentleman," through the "borer from within." Nazi-ism has worked and bored through the American bund and its "fellow-travelers." In 1931 the Nazi and the Bolsheviks in Germany joined hands to strangle the German Republic. They joined together in a plebiscite to oust the democratic government in Prussia. They failed at that time. But the betrayal by the Communists in Germany of the Republic in 1931 and again in 1933 bore its fruit—Hitlerism!

We in our country through shortsightedness or worse—political adventure—have put ourselves on the side of Germany, and now that of Russia. The Congress in failing to amend the Neutrality Act strangled international law, which permits the sale of munitions to belligerents. The failure to amend the Neutrality Act has given aid to Germany.

I make bold to say that the action of Congress has not only strengthened the hand of Hitler, but it went to his head. In a measure, at least, it encouraged Germany to rape Poland and set the stage for another world war.

Now Russia is on the side of Germany. Its borders are open to the Nazis for supplies to its military forces, even if Russia does not enter the war against England and France.

CONGRESSIONAL ERROR

Congress has given us strange bedfellows—Bolshevik Russia and Nazi Germany. It has allied us with dictatorships against the democracies. We are helping Germany against France and England.

That help, even if it is not material, is buoying up the spirit of the German rulers. It is too frightful to contemplate.

Europe is being gassed, bombed, decimated. We have the gas masks, we have the means of defense. We are not asked to carry the gas masks or the means of defense to those left in Europe who are still worth while. All that we are asked is to afford them the opportunity to buy from us what we have, and yet there are those who would see Europe destroyed, the democracies liquidated, and civilization thrown back hundreds of years in the name of some peculiar ideology which its followers are pleased to call isolation.

The Congress should atone for its mistake. It ought to undo the wrong it did. It must bring back the United States within the compass of recognized international law.

It would be frightful if Congress would, in this extreme moment in the life of the democracies of the world, shut its ears and close its collective mind against our, might I say, brothers in progress.

"He who lives by the sword shall perish by the sword." (Matthew 26:52.) But he will not perish unless the efficacy of his sword will be destroyed. We need not deny the soldiers for the common good the weapons which they so sorely need, and which we can supply and still not violate any of the principles of international law.

JACOB PANKEN.

Neutrality Minus Partisanship

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

LETTER TO SENATOR ROBERT F. WAGNER, DATED SEPTEMBER 27, 1939

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, which I yesterday addressed to Senator WAGNER:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 27, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As you know, the State of New York has 45 votes in the House of Representatives out of a total of 435, and on June 30 the New York delegation voted as follows on Roll Call No. 117, which was the embargo amendment to the so-called Bloom neutrality bill:

For the embargo	21
Against the embargo	20

Shortly the House will again be called upon to vote on this same bill with certain Sente amendments.

May I suggest to you, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and as the senior Senator from our State, that you invite all the Representatives in the Congress from our State, both Republicans and Democrats, to a "family conference," so that we may privately discuss this most pressing national question. President Roosevelt has taken this issue out of partisan politics, and, following his plendid example of statesmanship, I believe you might properly arrange such a conference. At the conference table it would be possible for us, the Representatives of the Empire State, with its population of more than 10,000,000 souls, to discuss dispassionately and with all friendliness the neutrality bill. As the result of such a conference, I am sure all of our colleagues would have a better understanding of the provisions of the bill and its purposes. It even may be possible to reconcile the wide differences of opinion now existing among the Representatives from New York, and thereby bring about an agreement in our delegation on the merits of this bill.

Mindful of the unusual procedure suggested, I hope you will assume this leadership, because the neutrality bill will affect the lives and future of every American.

Sincerely yours,

MARTIN J. KENNEDY.

I was prompted to write this letter because the subject of neutrality has become the most important and involved issue confronting the people of the United States. The State of New York is deeply concerned, and, as the Representatives from New York, it is our duty to seek all available information on the proposed neutrality bill so that we may cast an intelligent vote.

My plan for a "family conference" between the Senators and Representatives from our State, regardless of party affiliation, has never been tried. However, at this critical period in world affairs, custom and formality should be replaced with action and common sense.

I feel confident that all the Representatives from New York State, Republicans and Democrats, are most anxious to decide the question of neutrality on a purely patriotic basis, and for this reason I believe my suggestion to Senator WAGNER is practical and timely.

American Neutrality and Alien Ideologies

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK, ON SEPTEMBER 12, 1939

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on September 12, 1939:

In these times of doubt and hesitation there is a great difference of opinion among our people as to how to keep this country neutral and yet do everything in our power to prevent alien ideologies from affecting the well-being of our people.

Our President, in his neutrality proclamation, stated that he wanted our people to remain neutral, but that neutrality in action does not mean neutrality in thought. We still must take sides, and we cannot give the same sympathy to aggressors which we give to victims of aggression.

There are many foreign groups in the United States which would like us to become the proving ground for their own pet theories and ideas. There is a man who calls himself the leader of the German-Americans and who glories in the fact that Hitler can lick the whole world. Of course, if Adolf Hitler can lick the whole world, he can lick this country, and in course of time all of us will become subjects of the great German Fuehrer. It is groups like the one which I have just described which have always been responsible for a great deal of trouble and unrest in this country of ours. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that such groups have always been found on the side of our enemy and will never contribute anything to the well-being of our people. This so-called bund maintains camps throughout the United States in which members are drilled by foreign drill masters, made to take the oath of allegiance to a foreign potentate, and behave in every way unlike Americans but like aliens.

Our neutrality should prevent such camps from spreading their poisonous propaganda throughout America. There are also peculiar circumstances surrounding some of these camps—Camp Nordland, for instance, which is situated close to the chemical depot of the Hercules and Atlas Powder Mills. Are the members of that camp engaged in activities which may result in the same type of sabotage out of which grew in 1915 the Black Tom and the Kingsland explosions? I am sure that our vigorous police officers will see to it that no harm comes to this Commonwealth because of the proximity of alien camps to important works of our national defense.

Hand in hand with alien activities which seek to sabotage our industrial establishments comes an activity which on the face of it may appear very patriotic, but which I, as chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House of Representatives, will call upon to check in its very beginning. There are many aliens who go to our naturalization courts applying for citizenship papers, not with the idea of becoming a part and parcel of our democracy, but in order to use American citizenship as a cloak to cover anti-American activities. It surely is not the act of an American citizen to glory in a foreign ruler "licking the whole world," which, of course, means destroying the United States. No American wishes his country to become the province of another government; and, of course, by becoming subjects of Adolf Hitler, Americans will not be happier than by continuing as Americans.

But it seems that some alien elements here would like us to become a foreign province, and it is aliens of this type who ostensibly become American citizens for the purpose of promoting alien interests. I do not propose to sit calmly by and allow such false citizens to run this country with impunity. Any naturalized citizen who takes an oath of allegiance to this country just as a matter of routine, but who is not at heart honestly and sincerely devoted to the principles of our Constitution and our American democracy, will have his naturalization papers canceled under legislation which I seek to introduce at the next session of Congress. Citizenship cannot be acquired by nature of routine answers in the naturalization courts, but must be earned by individuals who will sincerely grow to love America and what it stands for. Only men and women of proved loyalty will be able to become naturalized under our laws, and naturalized citizens who are members of foreign groups advocating alien ideologies should thereby forfeit any claim to the protection of America and have their citizenship revoked. Only in this manner can we protect the purity of our citizenship and see to it that no one but loyal Americans carry the title of American citizenship.

Deportations should be resorted to in the case of disloyal individuals who do not deserve the protection of our laws and institutions.

Let me warn all these alien sympathizers and men who wave the alien flags and wear foreign uniforms and goose-step around the United States that we will not tolerate these conditions too long but will very promptly deport and otherwise punish every alien who uses the sanctuary of the United States to spread un-American ideals and teach our people foreign ideologies.

A number of bills are pending in Congress which seek to compel naturalization of aliens who have lived in this country for many years or who were admitted to this country for permanent residence. I do not believe in this type of legislation, and I do not believe American citizenship should be forced on anyone. Quite the contrary; I do not want any but the most loyal of our aliens to wear the badge of American citizenship. Only after an alien has been thoroughly imbued with American ideals and become fully acquainted with our institutions and Government, and only after an alien has proved that he has no ties with any foreign government, but that he believes that this is a Government for all the people, without discrimination against any race or creed, should the alien be given the boon of American citizenship. To simply force a man by law to become a citizen even though his heart does not respond to the principles of our own Government will do much more harm than good. Let us clean house at once and remove disloyal naturalized citizens from our rolls. They do not deserve a place in America; and if they like foreign ideologies so much, nothing should prevent them from leaving this country and going where their own ideologies are the political creed of that foreign government. There will be many among us who will wish them good riddance, and the sooner the better.

President Wilson in 1914 said that no one can be an American and have a hyphen attached to the term "American." There can be no German-Americans, Irish-Americans, or other hyphenated Americans. One is either an American or he is not. Let us separate the wheat from the chaff and the sheep from the goats. There cannot be any halfway measures, and I am serving warning here and now that when Congress opens, either for a special session or the regular session next January, appropriate legislation will be enacted to make it impossible for aliens not imbued with our philosophy of government to masquerade as Americans—and God knows we have plenty of them now.

The noose is tightening about Hitler's cohorts in America. In the week just passed the press reported the stoning of Nazi camps in Pennsylvania and in St. Louis. The temper of the American people has reached a boiling point. Fritz Kuhn and his bund have reached the realization that their operations as a storm-troop unit in this country is at an end. So we now find a new Nazi-inspired Fascist group known as the Christian Mobilizers and the Nazi-inspired Christian Front. The German bund has overrun these hate groups, and has taken over all the key positions. As a result of all these activities we encounter riots and street-fighting scenes in and about the city of New York. Street speakers coached by Nazi-trained propagandists are trying night after night to cause serious trouble to law-abiding citizens.

These Nazi camps must be closed. Foreign uniforms must be banned. These alien-inspired camps have been the training ground for many former members of the so-called Irish republican army. It was one of these wild revolutionaries who made the statement at a closed Fascist meeting that "if we declare war on Germany, they would bomb New York City the same way they bombed London."

In times like the present there is only one ideal to be pursued by all of our people, the ideal of national unity, and only by the elimination of alien propaganda and a rededication of our people to the ideals of the founders of our Republic can we become again a Government "of, for, and by the people, dedicated to the principles of our democracy and the rights of all men, irrespective of race or creed."

Economic Aspects of Gold Payment in the Cash-and-Carry Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

Monday, September 25, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the cash-and-carry provision of the proposed legislation no doubt will involve widely divergent opinion and interpretation. There is, however, a particular phase of the matter—an economic consideration—to which I wish to direct the attention of this Congress. This is entirely aside from any effect the cash-and-carry provision might have in either keeping us out of the war or getting us into the war. So that we are here not concerned with any effect its adoption might have on neutrality, but only with the effect it would have upon our economy.

Many people are inclined to visualize the transaction as very similar to a person entering a grocery store, selecting a number of groceries, paying cash for them, and carrying them home. But the cash and carry we are here considering is something altogether different. It is not as simple as the cash and carry of groceries. Indeed, it is a very complex and involved proposal.

There are only three possible means that can be considered as available to France and the United Kingdom as cash: 1, gold; 2, holdings of American investments and securities; 3, barter. Since the last can be of little use in time of war, only the first two need be considered. Here, however, we shall consider only the first—gold.

Figures as to the amount of gold those two countries have available for the purchase of war materials vary somewhat. Five billion dollars is given by several authorities. Higher figures, up to $6,000,000,000, are given by a competent authority—Edward J. Howard, editor, Standard Statistics Co. The United Kingdom produces now annually about $700,000,000 of gold. We are perhaps safe, therefore, in assuming she and France would have about $6,000,000,000 available for purchases of war supplies the first year.

On its face it would appear that if we received gold in payment for our goods, we would be receiving cash. But if the word "cash" means value received, which no doubt we all believe it does mean, for our goods, we will see by an examination of the transaction involved that it would not be an actual cash transaction.

Let us take a concrete example. Suppose a French purchasing agent arrives in New York with a million dollars in gold with which he wishes to buy airplanes. But he cannot pay the gold to the manufacturers of planes. He deposits it in, let us say, the Chase National Bank. Here the Federal Treasury steps in and takes full title to the million dollars of gold. Then the Treasury issues gold certificates in the amount of a million dollars which it sends to its agent, the Federal Reserve bank, for the account of the Chase National Bank. Or possibly it merely credits the Federal Reserve bank with the gold certificates for the account of the Chase National Bank. In turn, the Chase National Bank enters upon its books a deposit for the account of the French agent. The steps in the transaction are not quite as simple as this, of course. Nevertheless this represents the basic steps in the gold-buying operation.

In actual practice, the Treasury may buy the gold by paying for it out of the general fund. But by a bookkeeping device this transaction is transformed into the one described heretofore. Otherwise the purchase price of gold would be added to the national debt, which is not the case. Against the deposit in the Chase National Bank the French agent pays out checks to the manufacturer for planes.

To the average person, to one who has not studied the question, this is likely to appear as a perfectly legitimate and innocent transaction. The manufacturer would receive his pay in credits, or paper money, with which he would pay for his materials and labor. It is only when we consider our present abnormal financial and monetary condition that we realize the disastrous consequences which must certainly ensue from this so innocent appearing a transaction.

The important thing to be observed at this point is that in this transaction the gold is used, not as currency, but wholly to create credit, after which it leaves the economy entirely, to be buried in a vault where it is as dormant and useless as it was before it was mined from the earth. Not only is the procedure unorthodox, but anomalous as well. There is no way of ever canceling this credit out except by a reverse process in the transaction. That would involve great difficulties, as I shall later show.

How much of this credit has been created by the influx of gold into this country since the gold-buying program began? How much of this credit is now in our banking system? Today the United States Treasury has about $16,900,000,000 in gold, or in the neighborhood of 65 percent of the world's monetary supply. Of this immense hoard about $9,000,000,000 has been purchased since the Government bid the price up from $20.67 an ounce to $35. Therefore, the amount of credit base in the banking system created by the Treasury's purchase of gold at $35 an ounce is $9,000,000,000, or the same amount as that of the gold purchased. For every dollar of gold purchased a dollar of credit base is created and added to the volume of credit already in the banking system.

Now this nine billions of credit base has, under our present banking laws and practices, a potential expansibility up to nearly sixty billions. That is, this nine billions of credit permits an expansion of loans up to nearly $60,000,000,000.

The effect of dumping this vast amount of gold into our country has caused a swelling of available bank credit to dangerous proportions. The present total potential credit-expansion possibilities are more than $100,000,000,000.

There is general agreement that the importation of this vast amount of gold has created a precarious situation in our credit structure. That the continual addition to our gold hoard adds seriously to the danger is admitted even by the Secretary of the Treasury. In a letter to Senator WAGNER March 23, 1939, he said:

> It is doubtless true that we have more gold than we need to provide a specie base for our monetary system.[1] * * * At present, however, gold and gold-certificate holdings are so far in excess of those legal requirements that they can hardly be said to constitute a protection against undue expansion of our currency and credit. We now have enough gold to permit an enormous expansion of credit and currency even after generous allowance for the outflow of gold that might accompany such an expansion."

Howard J. Trueblood in an article entitled "Gold: An American Dilemma," in Foreign Policy Reports of September 1939, in discussing the excess of gold in the United States, says:

> This huge increase is unwanted, since it can serve no useful purpose to the United States; and it has contributed to the maldistribu-

[1] Only about $5,000,000,000 of gold (gold certificates) are used as a currency base. Only about $2,000,000,000 of gold (gold certificates) are required by law as reserves for this currency.

tion of world monetary reserves. Hence there is general agreement that our excess stocks are at least a nuisance and at worst a tangible danger to our monetary and credit structure, owing to their inflationary potentialities.

As early as the latter part of 1935 the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System recognized the potential danger in the large volume of excess reserves that was being created by the inflow of gold. They recognized that this was adding an amount of credit for which there was no possible use or need in commerce, industry, or agriculture. They then sought to obviate the danger by raising the reserve requirements of member banks, and so reduce the excess. This they did by raising the reserve requirements 50 percent, which became effective the 15th of August 1936. Reserve requirements of member banks were again increased, this time by 33⅓ percent, to take effect one-half March 1, 1937, and the remaining one-half May 1, 1937.

On page 4 of the 1937 Annual Report of the Federal Reserve Bank we read:

> The excess reserves of about $1,500,000,000 which would be eliminated as a base of further credit expansion by an increase of 33⅓ percent in reserve requirements could, therefore, support an increase in bank deposits, which, if it occurred, would unquestionably constitute a credit expansion on a scale injurious to the Nation's economy.

On page 22 of the 1938 report appears the following:

> Member banks at present have excess reserves of $3,600,000,000. * * * The use of the available means of absorbing reserves, to the extent that it may be in the public interest to do so, would still leave the banks with a volume of excess reserves upon which it would be possible for an injurious credit expansion to develop.

Now, consider these two statements in connection with the fact that the excess member bank reserves being now $5,280,000,000, permit an expansion of deposit liabilities, or credit, of about $35,000,000,000.

No doubt steps will be taken in the near future to again reduce these enormously excessive excess reserves, likely by again raising reserve requirements. The great influx of gold keeps adding to our dangerously large credit base. The gold, after serving the purpose of creating the credit, is buried away in the earth, where it lies dormant. Then, to keep the credit which the gold set up from producing a runaway inflation, it is impounded, made inactive, by the device of raising reserve requirements.

As is well known, the Treasury not only has recognized the latent danger the large addition of gold is producing in our credit structure, but it took definite steps in the temporary policy it instituted in December 1936 of "sterilizing" newly bought gold to prevent a further increase of the credit base. The plan was to pay for the gold with funds secured by the sale of Government securities. This method added to the Federal debt but was intended to keep the gold from adding more credit to the banking system. The policy was short lived, and the "sterilized" gold was "desterilized."

Suppose the $6,000,000,000 which the French and British have to buy war materials were added to our present store. That would increase the credit base in the banks by the same amount and add accordingly to our present credit troubles.

Obviously, the American people as a whole cannot get cash, that is real value, by exchanging American goods for something that is altogether useless to us, is in fact unlawful for us to use, must be buried in the earth to remain as dormant as before it was mined, cannot be used as security for any paper currency, but yet at the same time, because of the anomalous mechanics of granting or creating credits, must enter our credit structure and thus aggravate an already dangerous condition and threaten still further the safety of our financial institution.

To those who might say, "We would have the gold, someday it could be sold and we would eventually receive the value for it," we can only reply that many obstacles will have to be overcome and they very probably will prevent our ever receiving full value for it.

Let us consider some of these obstacles. By arbitrarily bidding up the price of gold from $20.67 an ounce to $35, the United States Treasury has created an artificial market for gold, increased normal production, and caused a maldistribution of the monetary gold supply among the nations of the world. The result has been to effect profound changes in their currencies and credit structures, which now require less gold than formerly.

Many nations have become dictatorships. These are in a position to force their peoples to use flat money, so far, at least, as their internal economy is concerned. This fact is of the utmost importance to a full comprehension of the probable difficulties that will confront our Nation in finally disposing of our excess store of gold.

The many altered situations in the different nations, of their currencies and credit arrangements, caused by paucity of gold, which in some measure resulted from our draining it away, tend to become more or less permanently fixed.

That these conditions will seriously contract, for many years, the market for gold can hardly be questioned. Indeed, whether the other nations might dump all the yellow metal into our lap and then go off gold entirely, is no longer a question for mere academic discussion.

Jules I. Bogen, in the September 25, 1939, issue of the Journal of Commerce and Commercial, New York, says on this point:

> In view of the experience over a number of years of the countries in the sterling area, which based their monetary systems upon a currency unit divorced from gold, further demonetization of the yellow metal as part of the postwar monetary arrangements must be reckoned with as a probability.

Suppose the five or six billions of gold now held by the French and British Governments were added to our store, we would then have at least $15,000,000,000 more of gold than we have any monetary use for. If, then, at some future time we should find a buyer for our gold, just what and how much would we receive for it?

Obviously, we shall have to accept commodities in exchange for our gold. What commodities? Competitive commodities would destroy our home markets. We would have to limit our exchange to noncompetitive articles. Last year we imported about $700,000,000 worth of noncompetitive merchandise. At that rate it would require about 30 years to realize the value from our gold. Would you call that cash? How would the purchase of this merchandise with gold affect our export trade? Would it not seriously curtail our exports, since we now exchange them for noncompetitive goods?

Certain it is that if the so-called cash-and-carry provision in the pending measure passes, and England and France are permitted to dump an additional five or six billion dollars of gold into this country in payment of war supplies, until we can resell the gold abroad, the producers of the United States, our own laborers, farmers, and the rest, as a whole, must bear every cent of the cost of those war supplies.

We, as a nation, would not receive any cash, real value, for our goods until the gold we took from foreigners could be sold back to foreigners. This is a self-evident truth. The fable of the miser who accumulated gold at the expense of his own bodily needs to the place where he starved to death illustrates the point. Gold itself is not wealth, but only a means thereto.

We would receive real cash on the barrel head, not when we took foreigners' gold for our goods but when we exchanged that gold for needed foreign produce. We would be a sanguine people, indeed, if we believed we could ever import from foreign nations as much needed labor, service, and goods for these billions of gold as we would give for them.

The gravest responsibility rests upon Congress in disposing of this problem. Self-preservation being the first law of nations, as it is of individuals, we must be guided primarily by self-interest. The profound adverse effects further additions to our gold store must have upon our economy demands that we act immediately to prevent any further injury to it.

Above all, in our deliberations, let us remember that it is the interests of the common man that are most vitally affected. It is he who must bear most of the burden of any wrong action we may take.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLYDE L. HERRING, OF IOWA

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System last Friday evening by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the minds and hearts of all Americans, from the President and the Members of Congress to the millions of people scattered throughout the land, there is but one thought, one purpose, one determination. It is to keep the United States of America out of war.

There exists in Washington the same determination to keep us out of this war that exists throughout the Nation.

The problem before this session of the Congress is to enact such laws and prescribe such conduct on the part of America as will most likely prevent our becoming involved in any way.

The difficulty is in agreeing upon that program which is most certain to effect the result which everyone so earnestly seeks.

In my opinion, the proposal of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, in which the President and the Secretary of State concur, enunciates a policy which we should follow as most certain to protect the United States of America, its institutions, and its people. I am therefore, without reservation, supporting the President and that policy.

The legislation reported by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and approved by the President is not intended to repeal the present neutrality law but to place in its stead a law better adapted to our needs, based upon years of experience with the existing statute, during which its salient weaknesses have been made obvious. Its purpose is to reinforce our position as a neutral nation and make more certain the results which all desire to accomplish.

There is considerable confusion as to the present Neutrality Act. It should be clearly understood that the present law imposes only a limited embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. In modern warfare other materials and supplies are as essential as cannon. Under existing law American ships laden with foodstuffs, grains, cotton, minerals of all kinds, and other war supplies may travel to the very war zones themselves and there make delivery to either belligerent.

It should be remembered that the presence of American ships and citizens in the past World War danger zones led to our entrance into that conflict, both ships and citizens having fallen victim to submarine warfare.

Under the proposed legislation, designed to strengthen our neutral position, this invitation to war will be eliminated, because under its terms no American ship will be permitted to carry war materials, nor will American citizens be permitted to enter war zones or travel upon the ships of other nations and belligerents, except that they do so at their own risk.

The only previous occasion when the United States attempted to enforce an embargo was in 1807 during the Napoleonic war, in reply to the English orders in council and to the Napoleonic decrees, which made lawful prizes of American vessels sailing the high seas. American commerce was threatened and the Congress adopted the embargo as a preventive measure, which only served to bring distress and discontentment at home and, like our recent experience with prohibition, resulted in repeal because it came to be regarded as onerous and against sound public policy.

It is urged that to repeal the present embargo upon the limited list of war materials would be an act of unneutrality because it would definitely favor one group of belligerents. If this be admitted, then it must be equally true that the embargo is now aiding another group of belligerents. It is not enough to answer that this favoritism is the result of a law which was in effect when present hostilities started, because the President attempted, and in my opinion a vast majority of the American people desired, repeal of the embargo provision several months ago, when experience had taught its ineffectiveness and unfairness.

I believe it is time that we consider first neutrality toward the United States, and speaking for myself, I am perfectly willing to change any law at any time, which in the judgment of a majority of the Members of Congress will promote the interests and protect the peace of the people of our country and I have no intention of seeking the approval of any foreign power before declaring my support of such policy.

Our purpose is to strengthen our position as a neutral, not to weaken it. We do not propose to abandon neutrality, but to make it more easily enforceable. And may it be well understood by all the world, we, the American people, support the ideals of peace out of an earnest belief in peace, and not because we have been or will in the future be in any way intimated by a display of arms, or reversion to the persecutions and barbarities of the Dark Ages.

It is to be observed that the American people live peace as well as profess a love for peace. We do not covet the territory or property of other nations. We are opposed to imperialism in all its forms, subtle or aggressive. But we shall continue to assert our right of self-determination as to how the ends of peace may best be served.

Many months ago the President called attention to the wisdom of strengthening our neutral position, particularly by the removal of the embargo provision, which he deemed harmful. Congress had under consideration at time of adjournment the recommendations which he and Secretary Hull made in his further message to Congress on July 14. Because hostilities have since broken out in Europe, and before the Congress had acted to effect the change deemed necessary for the maintenance of neutrality and peace, are we to understand that the Congress should not be permitted to complete the important service requested by the Chief Executive, and which the exigencies of the situation demand?

For my part I am wholeheartedly behind the President's program to keep us out of war, and I shall give him every possible assistance.

As I have previously stated the sole concern of the President, the Members of Congress, and the people of this Nation is the maintenance of peace. We desire no war with a foreign power. We are prepared to studiously avoid any possibility of being drawn into the present war or future wars by remaining absolutely neutral in our international relations.

We are willing to go far beyond any of our predecessors in the pursuit of our determination to maintain peace by imposing upon ourselves restrictions as to our conduct, which is without precedent in the annals of this or any other nation.

Let me repeat, our purpose is to strengthen our position as a neutral, not to weaken it. We do not propose abandonment of the present neutrality law. We propose to put a better law in its place.

The proposed bill provides that the Congress as well as the President may put the provisions of the law into effect by declaring that a foreign war exists.

It would lift the present embargo, but it provides that no American vessel may transport goods or passengers to nations at war.

It requires that title to goods shall pass to the purchaser before such goods leave our shores.

It proposes to vest in the President authority to define combat areas, which would be forbidden to American citizens and ships of American registry.

A munitions control board would be established charged with the responsibility of keeping a complete record of arms exports and to render a report thereon to the Congress semiannually. This legislation does not affect the Central and South American republics.

Both the present act and the proposed measure forbid the arming of merchant vessels and prohibit the solicitation of funds for any belligerent government, but do permit solicitation of funds for the support of the Red Cross and other agencies of mercy engaged in relieving human distress.

Both prevent loans to belligerents, and goods must be paid for on a cash-and-carry basis.

Both the old law and the proposed bill forbid Americans to travel on the ships of belligerent nations, except under such conditions as the President may prescribe.

Contrast the self-imposed restrictions upon our personal liberty, and custom, with the age-old practices of neutrals under international law.

Before the United States sought a better way of remaining neutral, a neutral state was defined merely as a nation which declined to take sides. Trade with belligerents was accepted without restriction and with only such interference as the belligerent country on the opposing side was powerful enough to inflict.

Shipping, seldom a prosperous industry in peacetimes, became an important factor in the national economy, and international trade was most earnestly sought.

Citizens traveled at will throughout the world, and at least one great empire built much of its prestige on the fact that the flag followed the citizen wherever he might go and stood prepared to defend him and his rights against such aggressors as he might encounter.

Commencing with our original experiment in 1935 the policy of the United States since has been to find a constantly improved method for handling international relations under definite law.

The present neutrality law which the Congress seeks to improve by substitution was not an inspired instrument but a compromise piece of legislation, even as the pending measure will be subject to change by amendment. As I have had occasion to say repeatedly during recent years, it is highly improbable that the Congress can adopt a neutrality law sufficiently narrow to be effective and sufficiently broad to be safe, covering a period of years in advance, the conditions and circumstances of which are unknown to us at the present time and which may be wholly unlike we now envision.

No one among us is so all-wise and all-powerful as to be able to say with certainty, "This is the way." We can only be guided by our best judgment and earnest conviction and hope that we have determined wisely as well as honestly the policy by which we shall continue to govern our neutrality in this grave world crisis.

There is and there will continue to be, in countries where freedom of expression is permitted, a difference of opinion as to method in achieving any desired result.

And there is a growing concern that present tendencies throughout the world may lead to a point where America will be the only country remaining where such freedom of expression is enjoyed.

In my office in the past 10 days we have received thousands of letters and telegrams, the plea in each being "Keep us out of war."

Individual citizens differ in the recommendations which they make, but they join as one voice in insisting that everything possible be done to prevent our being drawn into the conflict on the side of any belligerent.

These communications are welcomed and they are very helpful in enabling us to ascertain the sentiments of our people.

I have before me a large number of messages from citizens of Iowa expressing their views and urging me to act accordingly. I believe in free and full debate of the various proposals, which I know will be given every possible consideration by the Congress.

If we believe in democracy, we must respect the right of the individual to be heard, but after mature deliberation and a judgment is reached by a majority of those charged with the responsibility of determining a policy, we should without reservation support that policy, until such time as experience will have taught us that further changes are both desirable and necessary.

Such was the reasoning employed in supporting amendments to the present neutrality law. Not until it had been thoroughly tested and sufficient time had elapsed to reveal its inadequacies was an effort made to substitute a better neutrality measure.

Realizing the impossibility of regulating well the world without first regulating well our own lives, the United States of America accepted the doctrine that we should have friendly relations with all nations and entangling alliances with none; that we should assume responsibility, moral and physical, to protect the Western Hemisphere from the imperialistic designs of any European power. We have assiduously cultivated the habit of minding our own business, letting the rest of the world know that we recognized our sphere of influence as that of the Western Hemisphere, an influence exercised on behalf of peace, not conquest, and leaving to Europe and Asia the settling of disputes as to the Eastern Hemisphere.

In addition to providing the safeguards contained in this well-established policy, and the promise of peace contained in the proposed legislation which the Congress is now giving consideration, I, for one, favor a continuance of the policy to build up our Navy, air force, and Army as measures to protect and defend the two best allies we have—the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Proposed Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT, OF OHIO, AT VIENNA, ILL.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an impressive address delivered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] at Vienna, Ill., on last Saturday evening.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Republicans, everywhere throughout the United States Republican enthusiasm is rising. In the East, in the Central West, on the Pacific coast, the Republican meetings are crowded; the Republicans are confident and determined that the people in 1940 will demand a change in national policy, and many Democrats, even in Washington, agree with them.

The reasons for this change in public sentiment are obvious. After six and one-half years of New Deal experimentation, after demanding and securing more arbitrary power than any government has ever enjoyed, the New Deal has failed in its declared purposes. It promised prosperity and employment. More than 10,000,000 men are still unemployed. The national income, which approximated $80,000,000,000 in 1928, is still only sixty-five billion, although there are 10,000,000 more people among whom to divide this reduced income. No wonder times are hard. It promised higher prices for the farmer, and, until the war boom, prices of farm products were generally lower than they were 6 years ago, in September 1933, before any of the farm-control measures were inaugurated.

Instead of curing our problems, the New Deal has produced grave threats against the freedom and the stability of our people. In its craving for power to carry out its planned economy, it has tried to subject the courts and the Congress to the arbitrary powers of the President. It has threatened to swamp local self-government and personal liberty by all-inclusive grants of power to Washington. It has increased the national debt by more than $20,000,000,000, and is incurring deficits at the rate of $4,000,000,000 a year, an insane policy which can only lead to national bankruptcy, inflation, and the utter destruction of the American system of thrift, industry, and free enterprise.

Instead of prosperity it has produced depression by imposing an intolerable weight of regulation and taxation on private industry and on those who might enter and extend private industry and increase employment. Even the humanitarian and reform measures, like relief, social security, housing, security control, and collective bargaining for labor, have been so recklessly and unwisely administered as to defeat their own purposes. It is not strange that the American people have turned from the "brain trust" quacks and are searching for a better doctor. It is not strange that every Republican leader is confident of Republican success on the basis of the domestic situation.

But to some extent today attention has been diverted from domestic policy. All America is shocked at the catastrophe in Europe. In spite of all our hopes, Europe has been plunged into a war which threatens civilization itself. Undoubtedly the people of this country are tremendously interested in the war problems, but I do not think they are going to let any war issues change their fixed opinion that the New Deal domestic policies are a failure. If economic conditions improve by the artificial stimulus of war, it is still perfectly clear that they did not improve through any New Deal wisdom. War cannot conceal the dangers and collapse of New Deal policies.

Furthermore, it is just as important for the Republicans to point out the danger of New Deal fallacies, and to offer their own constructive alternative policies as it ever was before. In fact, it is just a little more important. While the people's attention is diverted, and using the war itself as an excuse, we will doubtless see the inner circle of the New Deal proposing more Government dictation of business and individuals and more and better deficits. A fight in Congress must be carried on, as it was carried on in the session this year, to prevent the extension of reckless spending and regulation of everybody, until they can be reversed in 1940. The newspapers and the radio can serve a real public purpose by giving at least equal prominence to domestic questions as to those of the European war. Unless we are ourselves involved in the war, domestic policies are going to have more to do with the future welfare of our people than the result of European battles.

I find a few Republican leaders discouraged by the rise of these new issues of foreign policy. There is no reason for such discouragement, provided the Republican foreign policy is based on the same sound Americanism as its domestic policy. The welfare of this country and its people depends on keeping out of the European war, and the people are determined that we shall do so. On that issue the Republicans occupy the strong position. They are the peace party.

It is true that the President today has expressed his determination to keep America out of war and that his actions and recommendations up to this time look in that direction. But the Democratic Party has a bad record. President Wilson was reelected in 1916 on the boast that he had kept us out of war, and we were in war almost as soon as he took office for a second term. President Roosevelt, in his Chicago speech, expressed the opinion that we should, by economic embargoes, quarantine those countries which we judged to be aggressors. In his opening address to Congress in January of this year, he proposed "many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words" to protect religion, democracy, and good faith among nations. He approved, last spring, a Washington Post editorial advocating interference in European quarrels. He is a recent and a half-converted convert to the cause of peace. If the people of this country wish to remain in peace after 1940, they had better trust the administration of their foreign policy to the Republicans.

Today the American people are overwhelmingly in favor of keeping out of war. But even today there are many people who, at heart, do not sympathize with that position. Furthermore, the American people are an emotional people. A tremendous war spirit was aroused in 1917 by the sinking of American ships and the drowning of American citizens. We went to war in 1898 because a friendly people were oppressed by cruel dictators. No one can be sure what waves of feeling may sweep over the country if American ships are sunk or innocent civilians and noncombatants slaughtered without mercy. Many of those who shout for peace today may shout for war tomorrow. And so now is the time to make certain that our present feeling is based on reason and not solely on prejudice. What possible arguments can be made for our entrance into the war at any time?

War is so horrible today that the reasons against it are obvious to all. The glamour and romance of an earlier day, always largely imaginary, have been completely destroyed by the methods used in the World War. Instruments of destruction threaten the entire civilization built up in Europe through thousands of years, with all its historical landmarks, and all its institutions and accomplishments for improving the welfare of mankind. No man wants to spend months or years in the trenches himself. Every parent dreads the day his sons may sail away to war.

But it is said that we cannot stay out. We can stay out if we are determined, and remain determined, to do so. We have stayed out of many European wars. If we admit that we cannot stay out, we will be perpetually involved in war, because in Europe races are so mingled that no one can even draw boundaries without leaving minorities which are a perpetual source of friction. There have been wars for thousands of years, and there will be wars for years to come. Of course we can stay out. Holland and Switzerland and Scandinavia stayed out of the World War, although they were in the very midst of it. We have an isolated location, and it is still isolated in spite of all the improvements on sea and in the air. I find that many people who say that we cannot stay out, at the bottom of their hearts do not wish to stay out. Theirs is a defeatist attitude and certainly no argument for not trying to stay out.

Secondly, it has been widely argued that we should enter the war to defend democracies against dictatorships. The President's own expressions have indicated this belief in the past. No one can sympathize more than I do with the success of democratic governments against dictatorships. No one desires more strongly than I the destruction of Hitlerism and Stalinism, but I question whether dictatorships are necessarily destroyed by war. The purpose of the World War was to save democracy, but it actually resulted in the destruction of more democracies and the creation of more dictatorships than the world has seen for many years. Nothing is so destructive of forms of government, particularly forms of democratic government, as war. We may go in to save England and France, and find that when the war ends their governments are either Communist or Fascist.

Our going to war would be more likely to destroy American democracy than to destroy German dictatorship. Congress would be flooded by a large number of measures designed to have the Government take over business and regulate every detail of private and commercial life. The President already has statutory power to take over the railroads and manufacturing plants in case of war, and the radios and public utilities in case of threatened war. I have little doubt that he would exercise most of these powers. We have been warned by Mr. Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, that private business would be regulated in every detail by the Government. Conscription of wealth seems a reasonable accompaniment of conscription of men, but if carried out in a New Deal spirit it will result in the complete socialization of all property. We went far down that road in the World War. By an earnest effort, normal conditions were restored after the war, but I doubt whether today we would ever see again real local self-government in the United States, or real operation of private enterprise. We might retain the forms of democracy, but we will be likely to find ourselves with an absolutely arbitrary government in Washington, and a plebiscite every 4 years to determine who shall control it. A government by plebiscite either is not, or will not long remain, a democratic form of government.

I believe we will do the cause of democracy much more good if we maintain our neutrality, and show that a great nation can get through a crisis of this kind without abandoning democratic principles. We cannot interfere with other forms of government. We can only assist democracy by showing the people of the world that it is more likely to bring peace and happiness to its citizens than any other form of government. In that manner it spread all over the world in the nineteenth century and will triumph again.

The third argument that we should enter the war is based on the theory that if France and England are defeated, we will be overwhelmed by Germany. This view is widely held, and it will be more strongly pushed if England and France are losing. I do not claim that a world dominated by Hitler and Stalin would be a pleasant world to live in. But terrible as conditions might be, I do not see why they would threaten the safety of the United States. If, by some remote possibility, Hitler could overwhelm England and France, it would not relieve him from the complications of European policy. England and France defeated Germany, but Germany has been a thorn in their side for 20 years. No race and no dictator has ever dominated Europe for long. Why Hitler should choose to add to his European troubles by attacking the strongest nation in the world is hard to see. He would gain nothing by such an attack on this country, because he would already have available, in Africa and Asia, the raw materials and colonies Germany has sought. I cannot even see any reason why trade between the United States and the rest of the world would not continue in about the same volume as before.

But, above all, the best military authorities tell us that we can defend North America and the Caribbean Sea south of us, if we maintain an adequate navy and an attendant air force. Today we have the best navy in the world, and it is essential that we keep it of a size and condition sufficient to assure our safety without war. The Republicans certainly have approved all the increases in naval appropriations.

In short, the horrors of a modern European war are so great, its futility is so evident, its effect on prosperity and happiness and democratic government itself so destructive that any alternative seems to be preferable except the subjection of this country to physical attack or the loss of its freedom.

The Republican Party is for peace and will be the peace party in 1940. What is the best policy to keep us out of war? In the first place, we must learn to distinguish propaganda in whatever guise it comes and try to sift the truth from the vast ocean of reports. A false idea of conditions may result from the best-intentioned reporters with strong individual prejudices as much as from deliberate false statements.

I believe that the adoption of the cash-and-carry system is more likely to keep us out of war than any other proposal which has been made. We became involved in the World War because the American people were outraged at the sinking of American ships and the drowning of American citizens. Some people seem to think that the arms embargo will prevent the repetition of such incidents, but they do not seem to realize that under the present law everything except the very limited classification "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" may be shipped to Europe and is being shipped to Europe in American ships, including castings, steel, and machine tools with which to make guns; and alcohol, cotton, and cellulose, with which to make ammunition. In fact, even if the arms embargo is repealed, arms, ammunition, and implements of war would never be more than a small proportion of total shipments. In the World War, prior to our entry in 1917, they only amounted to 13 percent, while other goods and materials amounted to 87 percent. The Germans recognize no distinction between arms and other contraband, and almost the whole 87 percent is contraband. Finnish ships carrying only lumber were sunk last week. American ships today are likely to be sunk at any moment. You may have noticed last week that when the Courageous was torpedoed an American freighter was right there, picking up the survivors. Under the cash-and-carry system American ships would be excluded from the war zone, and the chance of incidents leading to war tremendously reduced.

The President has said that he could obtain this result by proclaiming that American ships would travel at their own risk. To my mind, this does not satisfy the requirements. The American people may be as much aroused by the unjust torpedoing of American ships traveling at their own risk as any other kind of American ship. There should be a legislative prohibition of such travel.

Under the present law, credit for all goods can be and is being advanced to British and French firms. If we permit the steady growth of such credits, we build up a large number of people in this country financially interested in the success of England and France and likely to aid any propaganda for us to enter the war. If cash must be paid for all goods shipped, then even a manufacturer of arms has no financial interest in the success of either side. Again the President suggests that by proclamation he can relieve the United States of responsibility for collecting such credits. But this is not enough; we want to avoid the interest which may lead to war. Furthermore, experience has shown that credits advanced to warring countries may be very difficult to collect. They also increase indefinitely the artificial and inflated prosperity brought about to some extent even by cash purchases. We will have a hard enough time adjusting ourselves to the economic reaction at the end of the war without making that reaction much worse through the loaning of money abroad. Such loaning during and after the World War tremendously increased the severity of the 1929 depression.

Provided that a strict cash-and-carry plan is adopted, I believe the arms embargo should be repealed. Many people seem to think that this means a departure from neutrality. I do not agree, and I may say that I stated my position on this question on April 25 of this year over a Nation-wide radio hook-up long before the President made any recommendations to Congress. The most neutral position we can take, in my opinion, is to say to all nations, "We will sell you whatever we have if you pay cash and carry away your purchases in ships which you supply." No one has ever claimed before that an arms embargo is necessary to neutrality. We have been neutral in countless wars without any arms embargo.

I get a good many letters which indicate that the writers think someone is trying to repeal the Neutrality Act. No such proposal has been presented to Congress, and the cash-and-carry amendments, with repeal of the arms embargo, increase our neutrality. An arms embargo has always seemed to me unwise, and unfair as between other nations. It directly discriminates in favor of those nations which build up their military establishment in peacetime so that they are not dependent on imports. It discriminates against weak and peaceful nations which have not increased their own munition plants. It discriminates in favor of land powers against sea powers. It deprives England and France of one of the natural strengths of their position. They have many natural weaknesses. For instance, Germany can go to Russia for ammunition and supplies, while England and France cannot. I can see little difference between shipping arms and shipping the machinery and material with which arms are made; and the German Government takes the same position today. I see little sense in a law which prohibits our supplying arms to our friendly neighbor, Canada, on the north, while it permits the shipment of arms to our neighbor, Mexico, on the south, from which assistance indirectly can easily reach Russia and Germany. I see little sense in a policy which permits American companies to set up airplane factories in Canada and deprive American workmen of the work resulting from airplane manufacture in the United States.

The removal of the arms embargo is not in any way calculated to increase the chances of our getting into war. The Germans are not going to declare war on us simply because we ship finished arms instead of materials. Even if American ships were permitted to sail, they are as likely to torpedo them without munitions as with. I do not see that Hitler has any cause to complain merely because the law is repealed now instead of before the war began. The proposal to change the law was pending in Congress and openly recommended by the President before war began. I have heard some people say that if we sell arms to Europe those arms will therefore be followed by American troops. There is no reason or logic in such a conclusion.

As to the bill actually presented to Congress, I have some criticism of details. I believe the war zone should be declared by Congress in the first instance; that a war zone surrounding all Europe might well be substituted for the prohibition against shipment to belligerent countries. I believe private credits should be covered as well as credits to governments. I believe that the provision permitting 90-day credits should be eliminated. Cash and carry means cash, and not 90-day credits. I am opposed to giving the President any discretion which will enable him to favor one warring nation over another, and thereby abandon neutrality. The arms embargo should be repealed only if the cash-and-carry plan is written into the law.

The President may at some time recommend a course unfair to one combatant nation as against others, but his present recommendations are entirely consistent with neutrality and increase the chance of our keeping out of war. It is important that the Republican Party, if it is to maintain its position of authority with the people, shall not cry "wolf!" until there is a wolf.

There are some who say that politics should stop at the water's edge and that the Nation must present a united front. I do not at all agree. I do not believe that any position of the Republican Party should be dictated by partisanship, whether in foreign or domestic policy for that matter, but if the President should advocate a policy, for instance, which leads this country toward war, I would feel it not only my right but my duty to oppose it as energetically, and as publicly, as possible. There is no principle of subjection to the Executive in foreign policy. Only Hitler or Stalin would assert it.

The Republican Party today has a heavy responsibility. We should all analyze every proposal that is made, and oppose those which tend toward war. We should concern ourselves perpetually with domestic policy. We should oppose every effort to use the war as a cover for extending wasteful expenditure and bureaucratic regulation. We should be prepared to present a constructive program to restore our people to work, to maintain our domestic liberties, and to encourage individual initiative and build up private business activity. We should devise policies to guard against artificial expansion and speculation, which may bring on another depression with its hardship and suffering. On the course which the Republican Party pursues depends the peace and happiness of the people of the United States.

ARMS A FRACTION OF WAR GOODS EXPORTS

(By Lowell Limpus)

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 1.—Nearly nine-tenths of the things we sold the Allies before we got into the last World War aren't on the present embargo list.

When it comes to stopping the exports used by warring nations, experience seems to indicate that the Neutrality Act is little better than a giant sieve. It simply doesn't touch 87 percent of the sales we made in 1914–17.

The figures are explicit. In the 30 months that elapsed between the outbreak of the war and the time we broke with Germany, we sold the Allies $7,562,573,000 worth of supplies. They constituted the bulk of our export trade.

And only $960,390,000 of that total represented the wartime sale of munitions, firearms, armor plate, and other items on the 1939 embargo list.

The other things which made up almost nine-tenths of that total—items which are perfectly legal to export today, unhampered by any cash-and-carry or bring-your-own-ships regulations—included vast quantities of wheat, meat, cotton, coal, sugar, wood, gasoline, tires, railroad cars, electrical apparatus, and cigarettes.

Of course, Uncle Sam might have sold some of these seemingly harmless things to the same customers if there hadn't been a war. But it is clear that he wouldn't have sold nearly so much—not by almost $4,500,000,000 worth.

The figures are clear about that, too. We reach them by comparing our normal, peacetime trade for the 30 months preceding the war with the business we did during the next 30 months.

WAR DOUBLED TRADE

During the 30 months ending June 30, 1914, we sold the seven biggest allied customers (who were, in order, England, Canada, France, Italy, Japan, Australia, and Russia) $3,226,934,000 worth of goods. And during the next 30 months, when the war was raging, we sold the same seven customers a total of $7,562,573,000, as stated.

That certainly looks like the war boom netted us $4,335,639,000.

Now, since only the $960,390,000 was spent for goods listed on the present embargo, it is evident that munitions constituted only 22 percent of the total increase in wartime business.

Only one slight adjustment has been made. We figured the increased munitions sales at $960,390,000, after deducting an item of $76,103,000, which looks like the normal, peacetime sales of steel plates, etc., that we sold in the 30 months before the war broke out. And the $960,390,000 was the remainder.

GERMANY'S TRADE LOST

That munitions business, in fact, almost balanced the amount of ordinary trade with Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria which we lost when they went to war. For the 30 peaceful months that trade amounted to $897,754,000.

The 30 months of peace for which we selected statistics extended from January 1, 1912, to June 30, 1914, including all trade up to the month before the war broke out. The 30 months of war extended from July 1, 1914, to January 1, 1917, the month before we broke with Germany. They give us this picture:

Peacetime exports

January–June 1912	$1,006,775,000
To June 30, 1913	2,170,319,000
To June 30, 1914	2,329,684,000

Wartime exports

To June 30, 1915	$2,716,178,000
To June 30, 1916	4,272,177,000
To Jan. 1, 1917	2,970,855,000

It is evident that our entire business with the world totaled $5,506,778,000 (of which $3,226,934,000 was with the Allies) for the 30 months of peace and that for the 30 months of war it rose to $9,959,210,000 (of which $7,562,573,000 was with the Allies).

If we figure total munitions sales to the world—the amount being $1,036,657,000—it becomes evident that the embargoed articles represented only 10 percent of the entire world business. That gives anybody his choice of three percentages. The munitions plus other war equipment represented, respectively, 22 percent of the increase in sales to the Allies, 13 percent of the total sales to the Allies, 10 percent of the total sales to the world.

That isn't a lot any way you figure it.

Repeal of the Embargo Act

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ALFRED E. SMITH

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered last evening by the Honorable Alfred E. Smith over the Columbia Broadcasting System on pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the outset of my remarks, let me first say that I do not know of anybody in the United States of America who wants this country to go to war. Certainly I do not—for I have three sons of the fighting age; the oldest of them is already in the Army and would be among the first to leave this country in the event that the United States was brought into the European struggle.

So, therefore, the argument, as far as I am concerned, resolves itself into this: What should we do that is best calculated to keep us out of war? In the discussion of this there is no room for personalities, parties, classes, or creeds—all differences must be wiped out in this hour of challenge. Personal interests must be subordinated to the common good. We must be selfish, not for ourselves but for the whole Nation.

PRACTICALITIES CITED

I was brought up in a tough political school where facts counted for more than theories. My training has been to distinguish between high-sounding principles and actual results. My experience has taught me not to ask, "Has it a lofty purpose?" but to demand an answer to the question, "Does it work?"

The present Neutrality Act does not work. The theory back of it seemed excellent. The principle upon which it rested appeared sound when the act was passed. In the absence of any severe test, the purpose which it contemplated could not have been successfully criticized. But all this has changed. The act has now been tested. It has not met the test and in the coming state of world affairs it can't possibly meet the even more drastic strains of the future. It has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

I am not the least bit interested in the language of any of the acts so far suggested, nor for that matter in any act that may hereafter be suggested, as to its details. What I am interested in, however, is that course which is best calculated to keep us from being drawn into the European war.

FORGET TECHNICALITIES

This is no time for technicalities. We should have a prompt decision by Congress on the merits. I don't mean to discourage debate. There is a real question to be argued. What I do advocate—and I am sure the overwhelming majority are with me—is that the debate shall be on the real issue and not on obscure or minor considerations. Personally, I am not interested in the argument as to whether or not we should return to so-called established principles or international law. I am not a student of law, but I am ready to defend the propositions that there is no respect for international law at this time.

Similarly, I take no stock in quibbling over constitutional questions in connection with the proposed substitute for the present Neutrality Act. Apparently there are some learned people who think we should give a lot of time to a discussion of whether the Constitution of the United States permits Congress or the Senate, as well as the President, to decide that a foreign war exists. What is the difference? The President's decision would be based on conferences with congressional leaders anyway and would be subject to review by Congress. In a crisis there is no time for legalistic hair-splitting. Let Congress go straight to the real issue and let Congress decide it, because, after all, Congress speaks for all the people of the country; that is my understanding of democratic representative government.

QUOTES ROOSEVELT

"The Neutrality Act as it stands today prevents the sale to a belligerent nation of any completed implements of war, but it allows the sale of many types of uncompleted implements of war, as well as all kinds of general materials and supplies."

These words are taken from the speech of the President of the United States when Congress convened last week. He further says that the present law allows such products of industry and agriculture to be taken in American ships to belligerent nations, and he concludes that herein lies the definite danger not only to our neutrality but to our peace. I am unable in the light of history to understand how that statement can be successfully disputed.

Let us go back into history. Many reasons were advanced as the cause of our entering the World War nearly 22 years ago.

Nobody can truthfully say, in the light of history, that Woodrow Wilson was anxious to plunge this country into the World War. In fact, he leaned in the directly opposite way. Long before he called upon Congress to declare war against the imperial Government of Germany because of the sinking of American ships, there was a distinct feeling throughout the country that we should go to war to vindicate the dignity and the majesty and the sovereignty of this great Republic. In a conversation with his secretary in 1916, after a submarine had sent an American ship to the bottom, he said, "I will not be rushed into war, no matter if every last Congressman and Senators stands up on his hind legs and proclaims me a coward."

FACE SAME SITUATION

In the latter part of January 1917 Germany announced to the United States that she was going to begin on February 1 unrestricted submarine warfare in the zone around the British Isles and undertook to specify the route which a restricted number of American ships might take through this zone. When the secretary to the President brought that Associated Press bulletin to the White House and showed it to the President he said, "This means war. The break that we have tried so hard to prevent now seems inevitable."

Here we are under the present Neutrality Act, facing that exact situation. The law as it now stands allows supplies to a belligerent country to be carried in American ships; supplies which will be needed for the prosecution of the war, although not named in the Neutrality Act.

But all of that seems to be beside the question in view of the attitude of the German Government as shown by the destruction of two Swedish steamships. The attitude of Berlin to the sinking of these two ships clearly indicates that the German Government does not recognize any difference between the goods covered by the American embargo and the goods that are not covered by the embargo.

That means that anything delivered to belligerent nations in American ships puts the ship in danger of destruction and means the loss of the lives of American seamen. I believe that we should prevent the transportation in American ships of any goods of any kind, war goods or other goods, contraband or noncontraband or any passengers to the warring nations. It is undoubtedly the absence of such a law in 1917 that brought us into the World War. There is only one way of avoiding a repetition of this experience and that is by keeping American ships and American passengers out of trade with belligerents.

DEFINITION "THE BUNK"

The distinction between contraband and noncontraband, war material and nonwar material is essentially the bunk. As a matter of fact, the Swedish boats were carrying lumber, and that was declared to be contraband of war because it is used for shoring in coal mines which produce fuel necessary for the production of war materials. As I have said, in this war the Germans have already declared there is no such distinction as far as they are concerned. They take the position—if I read the papers aright—that everything routed to the British Isles is contraband of war and they put it upon the ground that no belligerent can afford to buy anything at the present time that is not absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the war.

In view of this and in the light of the German attitude to the sinking of the Swedish ships, those who oppose amendment to the present Neutrality Act are compelled to take the position—let them sink the ships. Those who desire the Neutrality Act amended take the position that we will not let the ships go where they can be sunk.

The Bible speaks of beating swords into plowshares. By the same token plowshares can be beaten back into swords. Armies travel on their feet and on their stomachs, and therefore shoes and food can be regarded as war material and contraband.

Under these circumstances we should keep American ships and American passengers out of the export business and let the purchasers come and get what they need by paying cash and carrying it away in their own ships.

I read by the papers that the Members of Congress are being deluged with letters, the purpose of which is to convince them that we should keep out of the war. Right. The news article said that most of the letters come from people who do not desire any amendment to the Neutrality Act. That is probably because they do not understand it. I would suggest that those who believe, after a study, that amendment is best calculated to keep us out of the war should also write to their representatives in Congress.

Therefore, I repeat, the question before Congress is which of the two measures is best calculated to keep us out of war—the present Neutrality Act or the amendments suggested by the President.

It is because I firmly believe in my heart and soul that the amendments suggested by the President are best calculated to save us from the scenes that we witnessed in 1917 when our American boys were starting for France that I am at this microphone tonight appealing to the American people to stand solidly behind the President because he is so clearly right, so obviously on the side of common sense and sound judgment of patriotism that only those who lack an understanding of the issue will oppose him. I urge this with all the sincerity I possess, with the profound conviction that I speak for the good of the Nation which we all love so much.

Proposed Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM E. BORAH, OF IDAHO

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD an address recently delivered by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on the general subject of neutrality.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, Europe is again in the midst of war. The President of the United States has issued proclamations to the effect that in this war this Nation shall stand neutral. But we all realize that laws and statutes and proclamations are not and will not be sufficient to maintain successfully a policy of neutrality. Only the united will of the people can accomplish this difficult task. It is highly proper therefore that we openly and frankly discuss all phases of this question which bears, and will bear, so heavily upon the great body of the people. I want to associate myself tonight with all those who believe we can and ought to remain neutral. I want to resolve with you that we will in good faith put forth our best thoughts and our best efforts to accomplish that great aim.

If we can succeed as a people, especially in the midst of conditions such as they now are, in establishing here upon this western continent a great neutral power—a power standing not for force, not for cruelty and injustice, but for peace, for fair dealing among nations, for reason and justice—we will not only have added honor to our own Nation, happiness to our own people, but we will have rendered to all nations and all peoples a service far greater than it will ever be possible for us to render by joining any nation or nations in carrying on war. Force is gradually undermining and destroying freedom everywhere. If we are not going to wholly surrender to a world governed by force, then we must establish somewhere a great power which speaks for and represents in act and deed the things which make for reason and justice. Whatever may be the discouragements, and however great may be the obstacles thrown in our way, let us make the effort, let us unite behind a policy which, if carried through in good faith upon the part of the Government and with effectiveness upon the part of the people, will not only shelter our homes from mass murder, our people from poverty and premature graves, but will also go far toward guaranteeing anew the blessing of free institutions. It is an effort worthy of a great and free people.

We are met on the threshold of all debate, of all consideration, of this subject of neutrality with the statement often delivered and with an air of finality that we cannot be neutral, that Europe is now so near to the United States, owing to modern inventions and the mingling of business affairs, that neutrality is impracticable, if not impossible. This seems to me a spineless doctrine. It is not the doctrine inherited from our forbears. If true, we would be the most ill-fated nation on the earth instead of being, as we had long supposed, the most favorably circumstanced of any, or all, nations.

How near was Europe, how smotheringly close, was the European system when Washington announced his policy of neutrality and published it to an astonished and enraged Europe? He thought neutrality both wise and practicable; in fact, he believed that such a policy was indispensable to a free America. Yes; how close was Europe to the United States at that time? The United States was really looked upon by European powers as a part of the European system. Brazil at that time belonged to Portugal. Practically, if not all, the balance of South America was owned or controlled by the Spanish crown. The West Indies belonged to England, France, and Spain combined. European countries owned or controlled Central America, Mexico, also what was later known as Texas, Arizona, California, Florida, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Alaska. In fact, this continent might be said to have been at this time geographically a European controlled continent. Our entire northern frontier was heavily garrisoned by European regulars. The Indians were being used by European powers to harass our people and all Europe mocked at the idea that this young Republic would long remain an independent government. We were in actual contact, physical, political, and spiritual—if I may use such a term in this connection—every day of our lives with Europe and affected likewise daily by the domination of the European system. But Washington said we will be neutral as to these European conflicts. And had he not so declared and made good, does anyone doubt the devastating effect upon freedom, upon liberty, upon this Republic?

But we have no alternative, it is in effect declared, after these 150 years of self-government, we must go in in some way or other into all these controversies, broils, and wars of Europe. It is useless, we are told, to try to avoid this fate. Though these wars are not our wars, though they are wars brought on through the manipulation and unconscionable schemes of remorseless rulers, though their national policies are not our policies, though their crimes are not our crimes, still, we have no alternative, so it is urged, but to sacrifice the wealth, the homes, the savings, and the lives of our own people whenever the conflicts arise. Although our people have sought peace and now seek peace, still we must make war because European governments maintain an eternal saturnalia of human sacrifices. Though the law of our land banishes racial and religious persecution from our common country, still, because Europe is "near," we must join in the racial and religious conflicts and sacrifice our people over conditions which our forbears long since rejected. Though we seek no people's territory, nevertheless, because Europe is "near," we must sacrifice the savings of our people and the sons of our mothers in this endless imperialistic strife. Though we would take no part of the loot which was divided up at the close of the World War, we are now called upon to make sure the title to a vast amount of this loot. What a fateful doctrine to propose! Let us renounce it and make the effort at least to establish freedom from the European system.

But friends, the problem of maintaining neutrality under present conditions lies closer home. Let's go direct to its discussion. It is presented by this proposal to repeal the Arms Embargo Act. To those who are advocating repeal, I submit this question: Is it not your main purpose in securing repeal to enable us to furnish arms, munitions, and implements of war to one group of nations and to deny them to another group of nations, which groups are now in mortal combat? Is not this laying the foundation for intervention—in fact, is it not intervention—in the present European war? Is it not your purpose to take sides through the authority which will be available when the embargo law is repealed?

And if the purpose of repeal is to do these things, and we do them, is not neutrality broken down, destroyed, and are we not thenceforth by every rule of international law, by every dictate of common sense and common honesty, parties to a European conflict? I further submit to those who hear me: Do you think the time has come when for reasons of humanity, or of national defense, we should take our place in another European war? I feel we are really considering in this debate the broad question of whether we are justified as a people in intervening in this conflict and meet the issues as they are being presented upon the battlefields of Europe, for we cannot escape that destination if we move along the lines now proposed.

Let me review a brief and recent piece of history. Four years ago there began an earnest discussion in this country of the subject of neutrality. It was taken up in Congress and fully debated. Every phase of it was presented. It was discussed in the open arenas of the Nation. Learned men in all walks of life brought their contribution to the consideration of the subject. Our people wanted, above all things, to cut out the sale of arms to warring nations. It was felt it would help to keep us out of foreign wars.

Finally, in 1937, we passed a law which prohibited the sale of arms, munitions, and the implements of war to any nation or nations engaged in war. This law met the approval of both Houses of Congress almost unanimously. It met the approval of the executive department. It met the approval overwhelmingly of the great majority of the American people. At the time this law was passed and this policy of neutrality established there was no war of any moment anywhere. Germany and Britain were upon comparatively friendly terms. Both as a matter of morals and as a matter of international law, as a sovereign right, we had the undoubted right to establish this policy of declining the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war to any nation engaged in war. It is now proposed to repeal entirely this provision of the law. It is proposed to repeal it to enable this Government to furnish arms to one side and to withhold them from the other. The proposal for repeal is based upon the program of taking sides in the furnishing of arms. Undoubtedly, as I say, we had a right to pass the law, and undoubtedly we have a right to repeal the law. But when we couple the repeal with the announced and declared program of furnishing arms and munitions to one side and withholding them from the other, such program will unquestionably constitute intervention in the present conflict in Europe.

It may be said to repeal the law is not unneutral. I think under the circumstances it is. However, let's not discuss technicalities. But when it is said to me as a Senator: I want you to carry through a program, the first step of which is repeal, the second step of which is the furnishing of arms and munitions to one side, openly, persistently, and continually declared, then I know I am voting for intervention, I am helping to take this Nation into a European war. I cannot hide behind the fact that they are two different acts, because both are a part of one plan and that plan includes the furnishing of arms which is beyond question intervention. All anyone need to do to know that this is the real, the controlling purpose of repeal is to read the literature on repeal down to the last 48 hours.

The talk here in Washington is no longer that of merely furnishing arms. It is said we must prepare to fight. One of my colleagues, a most able and sincere Senator, declared a few nights ago publicly: "Let us give up this 'dream of impartiality,' therefore, of neutrality. It is better," said he, "to take sides and fight." He was speaking out boldly what is now heard from the same sources from which came the agitation of furnishing arms. And if in a few months we can tear up the law which a nation almost universally approved, how long do you think it will take to put across the proposition of sending our young men into the trenches once we have intervened? They may say to me: You cannot be sure that intervention will send our young men to Europe. Of course, I cannot be sure, but I cannot be sure that it will not. I say that would be the logic of the movement. But suppose I cannot be sure, I ask: Why risk it? Why trifle with foreign wars? Why bring the American boys to the precipice where any incident of war may kick them over?

The plan now presented by the advocates of repeal is that the democracies of Europe are imperiled, that we must go to their rescue, that civilization is threatened, that we cannot ignore the problem presented. But, if the war continues and the imperiling of democracies and the threatening of civilization increase, what can we say, having once put our hand to the plow? Will we turn our backs upon the whole situation? I repeat, as I stated a moment ago, what we are really considering these days is the broad question: Has the time come when the United States must take a part in this European conflict? Why deceive ourselves as to what will happen once we enter the conflict? Why shut our eyes to the inevitable consequences which must flow?

The time will not permit a detailed discussion of what is known as the cash-and-carry plan. It is based upon the principle that those who want our arms and munitions or raw material shall come and get them, pay cash, and carry them away. But, while I cannot discuss it in detail, I want to take time to say that this plan does not change the situation, as I understand it, with reference to neutrality. The cash-and-carry plan repeals the embargo law and enables our Government to direct the arms and munitions to one side and withhold them from the other. Whatever merits or demerits this plan may have, it does not seem to me to bear, only most indirectly, upon the question which I have sought to have you consider this evening.

I am concerned at this time with one proposition, that of avoiding any act or acts which will embroil us in a European war. I do not believe the cash-and-carry plan has any considerable bearing upon that point, and I shall therefore content myself with this brief reference.

Friends, I know how deep-seated is the feeling in this country against certain creeds and ideologies prevailing in Europe. I have had ample proof of this feeling in recent weeks. I would not want any of our people to think less of these creeds and ideologies than they do.

Here let me digress a moment. A newspaper friend called me shortly before I came to this room and suggested this sentence I have just read might be susceptible to misconstruction, that perhaps I should have used the word "more" rather than the word "less." Perhaps so. What I meant to say was that I would not want anyone in this country to abhor these creeds and ideologies less than they now do. They are in conflict with every tenet and teaching of our American civilization. But it is not hatred of another country but love of our own which makes for wisdom and justice in the formation of national policies.

We should not forget at this time that the world is still in turmoil and millions of men and women are in misery and want because of a treaty which was written in hate and bitterness 20 years ago. I do not want myself to be confused as to a right course to pursue in the interests of our own people because of my feeling toward creeds and governments of which, as a practical matter, we must take notice.

What we are all interested in is, what course will most likely bring peace to the United States and contentment and happiness to the American people. Where the welfare of an entire Nation and the health and the lives of the people are involved, we can afford to be patient, to be tolerant, and, at the same time, determined in our effort to find the right way. The democratic processes should at all times be kept intact.

Free speech, free press, uncontrolled consideration in debate are essential to right conclusions and sound judgments in a democracy. We can all afford to trust our cause to the democratic processes, and, when the final judgment is made up according to those processes, we can rest in the belief that the judgment will be a wise judgment.

Twenty years ago we went into Europe to take part in a European war. We went with high hopes and, in my opinion, for ample cause. But even so, how futile the sacrifices we made. Scarcely had the heroic story of our soldiers been written before the so-called peace treaties had set at naught the principles for which our soldiers fought. Every move in that direction, therefore, should be subjected to the test of the best thought and the high motives of the entire American people. If the worst should come, and for any reason we should be involved in another European struggle, nothing should be taken for granted as to why the sacrifice must be made.

In conclusion, the President has called a special session of Congress for the purpose of removing the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war. There are some of us who want to keep the old law—who insist that the sale of arms to all nations engaged in war shall continue to be prohibited. The only question in controversy, the only matter of difference that I know of, is the sole question of whether we shall sell arms or not sell arms. We see that the supporters of repeal are anxious to put an embargo on ships going to war zones, on loans to all nations engaged in war, anxious to prohibit our citizens from traveling in war areas; all this and more is to be done in the name of neutrality in the effort to keep us out of war. We most heartily support this entire program. We say, in the name of peace: Do these things. Maintain neutrality as to all these matters. But we observe here that there is a sudden break in the embargo—the most threatening and disturbing of all factors, the most calculated to get us into trouble—arms, munitions, and implements of war are to be let through. Embargo is not to apply. What is the significance? We feel sincerely that this is an error. We stand where we stood 2 years ago; where Congress stood; where the Executive stood; and where the people stood. What is the significance? Why prohibit loans in the name of peace and for the protection of our people but not prohibit arms? Why place an embargo on all these other things mentioned but repeal it as to arms? That is the sole matter of controversy. What we did 2 years ago we did in the name of humanity, in the name of peace, to protect our homes, our sons and daughters, and to help keep us out of war. Blame us not therefore if we are slow to surrender our convictions.

What we who oppose repeal are contending for is now the law of the land. It has been and is being enforced under the proclamation of the President. No arms, munitions, and implements of war are being sold. In what possible way can the United States be benefited by permitting the sale? Who is it that is to be benefited? In what respect is this country threatened by reason of the fact no sale of arms is being made. In what respect are the safety and security of the people imperiled? This is the sole matter of controversy. We urge that the same rule, the same principle, be applied to the most deadly of disturbers—arms—along with the other things prohibited.

This, as you see and have well realized, is a problem which concerns every home, every family, and every citizen under the flag. Those of us who must represent you in this in determining the proper course to pursue want to know how you think and feel about it. The people have altogether too little to say about the affairs of government in times of war or with reference to matters which lead to war. You not only have the right, but it is your solemn duty to record your convictions in every practical way that may be presented.

The Pittman Peace Proposal

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, OF WASHINGTON, SEPTEMBER 29, 1939

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] over the National Broadcasting System on September 29, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The United States will stay out of this war! That must be the high resolve of every American! I do not need to tell you this now. But during the months to come let it not be necessary for anyone to tell you. The will for peace must not relax. There will come times of confusion. Efforts will be made to confuse, by subtle propaganda, by stories of wartime atrocities, by arousing a feeling of fear. None of these must succeed. Neither sympathy, horror, nor fear may be permitted to swerve you from your determination for peace. That determination must be firm and grim. Your minds must never drift on this subject. Nobody ever drifted any place except into trouble. I am confident that you at your firesides, reading your papers and listening to your radios, are the ones who can and will keep us out of war.

There are so many reasons for this. In the first place, war would cost so much. I don't mean merely the billions of dollars cost—I mean the cost in human lives and in broken bodies and stricken minds. I mean the maladjustment of our economic system. I mean the probable destruction of our democratic government.

Then we must ask ourselves, "What would it avail us to be in this war?" The answer is nothing. We want none of the things for which wars are fought. The last time we hoped we could make the world safe for democracy and end wars forever. We now know how vain was our hope. I think we made an honest mistake then. We would not be honest with anyone if we made the same mistake now.

At this time, we of the Congress are here to try to work out possible legislative assistance to keep us at peace. Among Members of Congress, I find that same grim determination I have urged upon you. Although we may differ as to the exact path we should take, we have no differences on the goal we seek to reach. That goal is peace for America.

It seems to me that, in trying to decide upon our course, common sense requires that we first inquire concerning our past experience. That is usually the safest procedure.

Since the founding of our Republic two Europe-wide wars have occurred. We got into both of them. In the first, England fought France under Napoleon. It was 132 years ago. In the second, England and France were fighting Germany. It was 25 years ago. Surprising as it may seem, the passing of time and the changing of conditions have not materially changed the nature of our national dangers of involvement. Then as now England controlled the seas. Then as now England was determined to starve out its continental adversary. Then as now each was determined that we should not help its enemy. Then as now neither was willing to obey the established rules of international law. We got into both of those wars because of the attacks upon and destruction of our citizens, our property, and our ships upon the high seas. Is it not wise that we should not repeat the mistakes of those two occasions?

During the period before 1812, we tried an embargo. Not merely on munitions, but like the proposal of many who today support the present embargo against all goods. At first it applied to all foreign shipping. Then after 14 months it was modified so that, like our present embargo, it applied only to belligerents. Thomas Jefferson was its sponsor and advocate. Yet even he, 3 months after its adoption in a letter to Madison said, "I take it to be the universal opinion that war will become preferable to the continuance of the embargo after a certain time."

I make not the slightest claim that this embargo took us into the War of 1812. However, no one can deny the fact that it did not keep us out.

We are all familiar with what happened in the last war. We remember the illegal searching and seizing of our ships by England. They almost brought us to war against England. Then came the submarine campaign of Germany. We were exasperated with England's disregard of our property rights. We were outraged with Germany's destruction of the lives of our citizens. During this war we stood on our rights under international law. President Wilson consistently and vigorously protested as to the right of our ships and our property and our citizens to sail the seven seas. We never swerved from this course. Finally, public opinion so strongly condemned Germany's conduct that we plunged into war. I concede that the sale of British war bonds to our people played its part in getting us into that war. Nevertheless, no one can fairly read the history of those days without concluding that the proximate cause of our entrance was the destruction of American lives by German submarines.

Now, what does our present so-called neutrality law provide? Does it correct the mistakes of the last two experiences? So many people in this country are relying upon it. Impartially analyzed, it not only does not correct the mistakes of the last wars—it is a combination of both of them. In regard to arms, it gives us the embargo which failed Thomas Jefferson. In regard to everything else, it gives us the international law which failed Woodrow Wilson. Do you who are relying upon the present law realize that under it American ships, American property, and American citizens can travel in precisely the same way as they did in 1915 and 1916? Any day we may see a repetition of the Lusitania, the Essex, or the other World War tragedies. American citizens and American goods may travel on our ships, neutral ships, or even belligerent ships, through submarine- and mine-infested danger areas. They not only can, but they are doing it every day. Since there is no law against it, it is the duty of our Government to protect them. The fact is that aside from arms we are in the same position today as we were in 1915 and 1916. I wonder how many of you people who now demand that we make no change in our law were aware of that fact. The self-same conditions which took us into the last war exist today. If we want peace, these conditions must not continue.

Now let me discuss Senator PITTMAN'S proposal for peace, which is the bill now before the Senate. It is a careful, painstaking effort to correct our past mistakes. It is a code of restrictions upon our citizens so as to prevent any one of us from so conducting ourselves as to endanger all of us. It prohibits our ships from traveling to belligerents or from making deliveries to belligerent ships. It prohibits goods owned by Americans being shipped to belligerents. It prohibits our ships and our citizens, even though destined for neutral countries, to travel through the dangerous submarine and mine-infested areas. It prohibits our citizens from traveling on ships owned by belligerents. It prevents the arming of our merchant vessels. It prevents our Government and our people from loaning money or extending credit to belligerent governments. It so strengthens the duties of the Munitions Control Board as to give Congress such a check on munitions as to prevent our being dragged into war by munitions sales. It takes away from the President all of the important discretionary power granted in the 1937 act. There is not a word in it giving the President power to name aggressors. Since it treats both sides precisely alike, it is as truly neutral as any law that could be devised. Since it simply restrains our own citizens, neither side has a right to object to it. It tries to substitute a true peace plan for our present dangerous, unneutral hodgepodge. If any law can keep us out of war, this one will.

After several years of study on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I am convinced that this is the best device for peace. I recognize in those who disagree with me the same sincere desire for peace which I think I have. It is important in this debate that both sides recognize this fact. We can and must debate this subject. We must not create dissension among ourselves over it. We all seek the same goal—peace.

What we must do is to protect and preserve democratic methods in America. No doubt we will be urged again to spend our resources in a futile effort to correct conditions in Europe. We must not succumb to that urging. When this war ends the hope of the world will rest upon the existence some place of a strong democracy. That place should be here. Let us turn our hands to that task. Let no influence turn us from it.

Letter to President of American Federation of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. VIC DONAHEY, OF OHIO

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a letter written by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] to the president of the American Federation of Labor.

The letter was addressed to Mr. Green at Cincinnati, Ohio, while the Federation was holding its annual convention in that city.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 26, 1939.

Hon. WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor,
Netherland Plaza Hotel, Cincinnati, Ohio.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT GREEN: I have before me your letter of September 14, extending to me a special invitation to attend a session of the A. F. of L. on Monday, October 2, 1939.

I regret that I cannot attend what I believe to be a history-making session of the American Federation of Labor in our home State—Ohio. My heart is tied up in the consideration of a neutrality that will keep us out of war.

On October 10, 1900, I received my first commission from the A. F. of L. as general organizer for Tuscarawas County, Ohio, and it was signed by the "noblest Roman of them all"—Samuel Gompers.

I congratulate the delegates attending the fifty-ninth session of the A. F. of L. This great organization has made history and has lived true to form. It is an all-American institution.

I want to submit to you what I believe to be the seven wonders of American government:

1. No people ever acquired so vast and resourceful a continent in so quiet a manner.
2. No nation ever rose to such greatness by means so peaceable.
3. No nation has an older written Constitution than America.
4. No nation ever rose to such power and strength in so short a time.
5. No nation has ever placed in the hands of its subjects such perfect civil liberty and high standards of living.
6. No nation has ever existed in which men have been left so free to work out their own destiny and enjoy religious and political freedom.
7. No nation gives greater protection and freedom to its women and children than America—the most worth-while country in the world.

I urge this great convention, with the eyes of the world on it, to adopt a ringing stand on neutrality based on common sense and common honesty, dedicated, if you please, to mother, home, and country—the sweetest trinity locked in the hearts of men who toil.

Fraternally yours,

VIC DONAHEY.

Neutrality Legislation and the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWARD R. BURKE, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on September 30, 1939, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] over a Nation-wide hook-up of the Columbia Broadcasting System on the subject Neutrality Legislation and the National Defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Within the next few hours debate will open on the floor of the Senate upon the question of amendment of the existing Neutrality Act. Bear this in mind at the outset. The proposal is not to repeal a neutrality law and leave a void, as some would have you believe. It is to strengthen legislation, the chief purpose of which is to render less likely our involvement in any foreign war.

America is consecrated to the cause of peace. We covet not a foot of soil that belongs to another. There is in the hearts of our people not a trace of envy, or jealousy, or hatred of any other nation. Beneath contempt is the individual who would charge, or by innuendo imply, that the motive of any of the participants in shaping our national policy is influenced by considerations of financial gain to industry, labor, or agriculture. America would sacrifice much to restore peace—a righteous peace; a lasting peace—among all the nations of the world.

May I repeat with strongest approval the words of President Roosevelt at the opening of this special session of Congress:

"I proceed on the assumption that every Member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and every member of the executive branch of the Government, including the President and his associates, personally and officially, are equally and without reservation in favor of such measures as will protect the neutrality, the safety, and the integrity of our country and at the same time keep us out of war."

The question then is whether that objective can with greater likelihood be attained by retaining the Neutrality Act in its present form, or by adopting some or all of the suggested changes. It is with firm conviction in the efficacy of the amended bill that I speak to you tonight. Let its several suggestions be read and understood by all citizens throughout the land. Let them be weighed impartially as to their value in protecting the safety and integrity of our country and in keeping us from involvement in foreign wars. When that has been done, I have not the slightest doubt that an overwhelming voice of approval of the suggested changes will swell the chorus from "every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land."

The main feature of the existing law, as you well know, is a prohibition on the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to a belligerent state. Authority was delegated to the President to place restrictions on the export of certain additional articles or materials. Thereafter no American vessel should transport to a belligerent state such articles. Title should be transferred to some foreign government, agency, or national, before shipment. By limitation written into the act this section expired on May 1, 1939.

When the President signed the original act on August 31, 1935, he stated that the question of the advisability of imposing an embargo on the export of arms required further and more complete consideration. He expressed the opinion that this prohibition might have exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended. It might, in other words, retard rather than favor the protection of "the neutrality, the safety, and the integrity of our country" and the effort to keep us out of war.

Secretary of State Hull has consistently held to the view that an embargo on the export of arms is undesirable. He stated to the committees of Congress last May what everyone must recognize to be the true condition:

"Modern warfare is no longer warfare between armed forces only; it is warfare between nations in every phase of their national life. Lists of contraband are no longer limited to arms and ammunition and closely related commodities. They include not only those items which contribute toward making warfare possible, but almost every item useful in the life of the enemy nation. A nation at war is no less anxious to keep cotton or petroleum, or, indeed, any useful product, from reaching an enemy nation than it is to keep guns and airplanes from reaching the enemy's armed forces. I doubt whether we can help ourselves to keep out of war by an attempt on our part to distinguish between categories of exports."

The correctness of the conclusion reached by Secretary Hull is indisputably borne out by experience. Two alternatives present themselves. Congress could enact an all-inclusive embargo. We could completely close our doors. We could make it impossible for anything and everything produced in America to reach a belligerent state either by passage directly from us or through an intermediate country. Such an embargo rigorously enforced during a general and protracted war would tumble our whole economic system into ruins. With half the world in need of all we would have for sale, our goods would pile up on the docks and in warehouses. Our commerce would be disrupted. Prices would break. An army of unemployed would walk the streets. Discontent would seize our people. Irresistible would be the demand for repeal of such an embargo.

We have demonstrated that an arms embargo is undesirable and productive of no good results. A complete embargo is unwise and its consequences devastating. There is an alternative. Simple. Sensible. Sound. It is set forth in the pending substitute. It attempts no meaningless distinction between classes of goods. It recognizes the futility of discriminating between the raw material, the partly fabricated article, and the completed product. It says to all the world that what we have for sale is ready for any purchaser without the slightest discrimination on our part. As far as we are concerned, all will be treated exactly alike.

More than that this proposal goes to the very root of the evil we are trying to correct—the evil of involvement in war. Since certain countries unfortunately are engaged in a titanic struggle which is not of our making and in which we do not propose to permit ourselves to become involved, we will not let our ships make deliveries to any of the belligerents. We will say to them, one and all alike, if you want that which we have for sale come and get it in your own ships. Title must pass to you here and it will not pass until payment has been made. When you leave our territorial waters with the goods you have bought and paid for—wheat, oil, cotton, airplanes, or whatever they may be—we have no further responsibility. You take all the chance of a safe passage.

It must be clear to every person capable of reasoning that the way for America to keep from involvement in this war is to make it unlikely that American goods, American ships, American seamen, American citizens, will be sent to a watery grave while pursuing a course permitted by law. We propose to strengthen our neutrality legislation by making such happenings unlikely to occur.

But, it is said, if we follow this course of dealing not at all with any of the belligerents except on the terms stated, some belligerent, unable, for reasons with which we have nothing to do, to come and get goods from us, or lacking ability to pay for them, will become incensed. So what! Will such a nation retaliate by preying upon our commerce with neutrals? I do not think so. I credit all of the belligerents with more sense than that. But are we to be deterred from acting within our recognized rights and in accordance with our best judgment by threats of force? Much as we abhor war, zealously as we will strive to treat all with such complete fairness as to give no justifiable offense, we still have the ability and the will to meet such a situation. To meet it promptly and with such overpowering force that there will be no repetition.

The surest way for America to keep from ever having a war forced upon her is to make adequate protection for the national defense. Not to engage in any conduct remotely resembling aggression. Not to act the part of the bully. Not to fight on foreign soil. Not to participate in wars between other nations no matter how deep our sympathies may be. We must be strong, we must be prepared both in man power and in equipment, in order that we may thus command the respect of the world.

Promotion of our national defense affords the final and conclusive reason for the prompt repeal of the arms embargo. You ask how that is so? The answer is that it is not the country which buys from us arms, munitions, and implements of war which receives the only or the greater benefit. By completing the process of manufacture here, whether of planes, tanks, arms, or war equipment of any kind, we are thus enabled to develop the facilities and the organization to place our own national defense in a position of superiority that will render America immune to attack from any nation or combination of nations in all the world. Had an arms embargo been in force from 1914 on it would have served not at all to have kept us out of the war. But it would have left us woefully weak and unprepared when we were forced to enter.

It is our common hope and prayer that the day will soon come when righteous men and women in every land will take control. When war will be no more. When every dispute will be settled at the council table.

We will not hasten the coming of that day by fondly lapsing into a false security. An America weak and unprepared will not be able to lead the world along the pathway of peace. We have the latent resources, the partially developed possibilities, the manpower to make this Nation impregnable. Let us perfect our national defense and we can then take the leadership in the movement to end war. Toward that end the repeal of the arms embargo is an essential step.

"Realization that the neutrality law now on the statute books is neither really neutral nor in any way a reliable guaranty against war, explains the rising tide of sentiment for its amendment," says the Washington Post. The Pittman bill is strictly neutral. It affords the most reliable guaranty against our involvement in war. It should be, and I have no doubt will be, promptly adopted.

Proposed Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESSES BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two addresses on the subject of neutrality legislation, delivered on September 30 and October 1, by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, SEPTEMBER 30, 1939

Retention of the arms embargo is the first requisite for the preservation of American peace. To repeal it now would be to take the first, most important step toward our eventual participation in the war in Europe.

England and France wish the United States to repeal the arms embargo. This wish is to be expected. Do they want it repealed to insure the United States against being drawn into their war?

The fact is that these two nations have known for 2 years that they were up against a challenge in Europe and have been making ready to meet it in a military way. The Chamberlain government, however, until last March, was more concerned with buying Hitler off than with its own war preparations. The sacrifice of the one real democracy in central Europe, Czecho-Slovakia, was the climax of that policy. Now, with the bankruptcy of Chamberlain's appeasement and the alleged change in policy, we are being asked to throw overboard a provision to ensure our own peace—which Congress by overwhelming majorities wrote into law in 1935, 1936, and 1937—the ban on the shipment of arms to belligerent nations.

Why are France and England so eager to see the repeal of the arms embargo? True they want our munitions-plant capacity devoted to their needs. But more than that—and the real crux of the matter—their World War experience with us has taught them to know that if the United States caves on one really important issue, the road to war for us will then easily be laid out. If we give up the arms embargo now, they know they can accomplish easy change of the other provisions of law intended to help keep us out of other people's wars. They know that once this first step is taken it will be comparatively easy to get rid of any cash-and-carry requirements, and of the Johnson Act forbidding American loans to nations that have forgotten to pay us what they owe us from the last war.

Once these barriers against involvement have been destroyed, the final step of sending our young men on to correct Europe's ills will not be far off. The last chase in behalf of imperialism has already cost us to date $47,247,286,344.

England and France do not want us to repeal the arms embargo because they want us to keep out of war. But here in our own country there are many eminent authorities who insist not only that England and France will be crushed by Hitler but that the United States will be drawn easily into Europe's war if we don't repeal the Embargo Act. I wish someone would clearly explain just how maintenance of the arms embargo, which only 2 years ago was hailed by the leaders as a great protection against war, is going to drag us into war. Oh, we hear that it is because the arms embargo leaves uncovered so many commodities the shipment of which to belligerent nations would be sure to invite incidents that would take us to war. The administration's proposal is to repeal the arms embargo and enact a cash-and-carry law that will cover all commodities, including armaments.

May I ask those who so reason why, if they are so fearful of our commerce with nations at war dragging us into their war, why wouldn't there be larger security against war in our retaining the arms embargo, and adding all commodities to the embargo list? If it be answered that this would be too costly in foreign trade, then let it be acknowledged that it is trade and profits, not security about which we are most solicitous. Very well; then why not keep the embargo and put back into the law the thing that was there until last May, namely, the cash-and-carry provision for all other commodities.

Incidentally, let there be a reminder at this time that the neutrality law had a cash-and-carry provision of that very nature until last May when the administration permitted it to expire. Now the same administration bemoans the fact that there is no cash-and-carry provision to ensure our security against war. Why were they so careless as to let what they now so much want expire last spring? Perhaps the answer to that is the same as the answer might be to another related question, namely, Why did the administration, from the President down, once praise the neutrality law, with its arms embargo and cash-and-carry plan, as a safeguard of American neutrality, and why does it now so roundly condemn it?

It is generally acknowledged that the administration would prefer outright repeal of the entire Neutrality Act and then fall back on international law as the instrument to keep us out of war (the same international law that served so well in getting us into the last war). But as recently as the fall of 1936 President Roosevelt was praising the existence of the neutrality law. In his famous Chautauqua speech the President, the same one who only in August complained because the refusal of Congress to repeal the arms embargo had halted a nice economic boom, this same President at Chautauqua said:

"The Congress has given me certain authority to provide safeguards of American neutrality in case of war * * * new weapons with which to maintain our neutrality.

"* * * Effective maintenance of * * * neutrality depends * * * on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State.

"It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by Congress would in the event of war * * * reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens. * * * Let us not blink the fact that we would find * * * thousands of Americans, who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality. * * * If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace!'"

Today, while the President is urging destruction of what he then called "weapons with which to maintain our neutrality," the people of America, however, are saying, "We choose peace." We stand a far greater chance of having peace if we hang tight to the arms embargo. If there are going to be changes in that program let them be changes to tighten the existing law and to make the most effective peace insurance we can have.

This battle to retain the arms embargo is going to be won if the people of the land will continue their insistence against its repeal. That statement is hardly consistent, is it, with the newspaper dispatches from Washington to the effect that there are already more than a majority of the Senate pledged to vote for embargo repeal. What is that information intended to do if not to convince the people that their fight here is already lost, that there is no longer any utility in writing letters to your Senators and the President urging retention of the arms embargo. Will it work? Not for very long, I am sure. When this great debate gets under way in the Senate next week there will be, day after day, most positive demonstration of the fact that the fight is not lost, that it is only just begun, and that there is ample reason to believe that the majority in the Senate will vote to keep the embargo.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OCTOBER 1, 1939

I insist that repeal of the arms embargo is not in keeping with American determination to stay out of Europe's war. This attitude is not prompted by any partisan spirit. Those of us who are for the arms embargo now were supporters of it since 1935, when we introduced bills for both the cash and carry and the arms embargo. We thought then that America needed both of them to keep us out of war, and we still think so. We have been able to observe how greed can grow into a great power in the affairs of the Nation, how quickly a little privilege can become a vested interest, how readily, to be specific, the traffic in death can become not only respectable but arrogant.

We are a nation of people almost unanimous in expressing a determination to stay out of the European War. But of this great number there are some who are eager to help one side engaged in the European conflict to the extent of arming them with the instruments which war calls for. When will it dawn upon such people that, since modern war is conducted on two specific fronts, the military and the economic, one quite as important as the other, that we cannot be into a war on one front without expecting shortly to be into it on both fronts. If we are determined to fight this war with materials, we will inevitably end up by fighting it with men.

How many more wars do we have to have before we learn that lesson? It was written long ago, "Where your money is, there will your heart be also."

This pending decision by Congress on the arms embargo involves the question whether the United States will take the first step toward participation in Europe's war. I insist that we cannot conscientiously declare ourselves out of Europe's war when we go into Europe's war actively on the economic front in support of one side.

The people should be reminded that they have no vote on this question—no vote on the possibility that they will die in the mud in the Rhine for some cause to them unknown. They vote on everything else, but not on the most important matter in their lives. The administration refused the people that right last year when it pressured Congress to defeat legislation giving that right. Now, that same administration is engaged in taking away another safeguard against our involvement in war—the arms embargo.

In this situation Congress is the only protection from involvement. The debate will start tomorrow noon.

What is the fight about? It is about getting into a war situation by accident, or because of greed, or because one single man thinks we ought to get in. That is not democracy. The bill that is pending has some good and some very bad features. The good features are now or have been a part of our neutrality law. The bad features are those granting more power to the President.

The arms embargo is the real heart of the controversy, and I hope the window dressing in the bill is not going to be permitted to blind anyone to that fact.

We who fight repeal of the arms embargo will insist that to make our country the arsenal for one side in the European war is to make our country the target for the other side; that the embargo is pure neutrality; that repeal is the first step into the foreign war; that we can get along without the blood profits that are available through embargo repeal.

Those who favor repeal of the arms embargo will insist that the embargo is unneutral, that there is money in the murder business, that we need the returns from foreign war to bolster our economy, that we must choose sides, that the cause of democracy is involved in Europe's never-ending imperialistic struggles.

The arms embargo has become a kind of traffic light. If it is repealed, the light will turn green—"Go ahead"—along the road to war. Now the light stands at red, "Stop!" and we propose to keep the arms embargo there to hold that light at red, to let all and everyone know that the American people propose to stay out of this war.

The fight in Congress to keep the arms embargo on the books is going to be desperate. It is going to be desperately fought, because once that embargo were repealed, there will be no turning back and putting it back on the books—not until after another war.

The gloating dispatches from Washington expressing the administration's belief that they had the votes to repeal are probably doing some harm. They are discouraging some people from writing their Senators and Congressmen. I want to tell you that you will see within a very few days that a majority has not pledged itself to repeal the embargo, and I am confident that it will not be repealed. The very fact that the administration has taken time on the air every night for 2 weeks indicates that its forces are not sure of their ground.

There are some other contradictions, too. What of this representation that unless we sell war supplies to England and France those countries are going to be crushed, and then to know that the purchases by those two countries of munitions during the 5 months preceding the invoking of the arms embargo were insignificant? The truth is that England and France know that if repeal of the arms embargo can be accomplished they can anticipate with far greater ease, a little later on, repeal of the cash-and-carry requirements, repeal of the Johnson Act, and finally repeal of that resolve to keep American sons off the European military front.

Here in America eminent statesmen insist that the repeal of the embargo is essential if we are to stay out of Europe's war. Does anyone believe that England and France want us to repeal the embargo for that same reason? There isn't an American who doesn't know better.

And speaking of inconsistencies, what of the attitude of those who are now demanding repeal of the arms embargo as a thing necessary to keep us out of Europe's war, by comparison with their insistence only 2 years ago that unless we wrote an arms embargo to prevent exportation of arms into Spain the United States would be drawn into that civil war in Spain? Now, war in Europe has broken out, and the administration has turned a somersault and is asking that we repeal the arms embargo which in 1937 they considered so necessary for our own peace.

Here are many insisting upon repeal of the arms embargo as a step to keep us out of war, yet insisting in the same breath that we get into Europe's war to the extent of supplying one side with arms and making our Nation an arsenal for that side.

Eloquently men plead for an adjournment of politics on this issue, only to let us observe the leaders of the repeal cause summoning into conferences only that part of a committee bearing a certain partisan label and known to be friendly to the cause of repeal, and excluding all others.

We have had proclaimed a state of emergency here in our own country. In that connection let me point out that Congress was summoned into special session in the name of a limited emergency. Of course, if an emergency exists, the Congress ought to be here. But why must those who insist that there is an emergency be equally insistent that as soon as Congress has repealed the arms embargo it should hurry back home?

Contradictions? Who does not remember how, after Congress this summer refused to repeal the arms embargo, the President echoed a complaint to the effect that because we had not repealed the embargo we had lost our chance at a nice little trade boom? But now the President and his following are talking, talking, talking about how to prevent anyone making a profit out of this situation that has developed abroad.

I said before that many people think that the issue is one of choosing sides. It is awkward choosing sides in these days. You never know who is in bed with you when you wake up. Who expected to see the marriage of those supposedly bitter enemies, Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany? What assurance do we have that we would not wake up one moment to find England tied up with one or both of them?

And speaking of changing around, the changes of the President himself have naturally made many of us wonder where he will land next. They have made us wonder whether he has not embarked on a policy which may lead him on courses different from those he had in mind. The President today says that the existence of the arms embargo may be responsible for taking us into Europe's war; that it is unneutral to refuse to sell to all nations at war alike; that we ought to repeal it. This is the same President who in the fall of 1936 was heaping praise upon the neutrality law, including the arms embargo, as a "weapon to safeguard American neutrality" against the appeal of "fool's gold."

Let us be honest with ourselves and clear about our facts in this controversy. The neutrality law, with the arms embargo in it, was written for the purpose of keeping the United States out of other people's wars. Until last May that law carried within it, together with the embargo forbidding the exportation of munitions to any nation engaged in war, a cash-and-carry plan now being advocated as a substitute for the arms embargo. But let it not be forgotten that the administration that now wants the cash-and-carry plan permitted that cash-and-carry plan to expire last May. Here they come in the name of emergency to ask repeal of the arms embargo and establishment again of the cash-and-carry plan. They were for the arms embargo and are now against it. They were against the cash-and-carry when they let it die last April, and are now for it. All this switching around makes many of us sure that they may have less interest in protecting our peace than in accommodating our laws to a certain interventionist foreign policy and winning profits.

The appeal is made that though we have the arms embargo preventing the exportation of munitions to nations at war, there is no safeguard against traffic in other commodities being so challenged and jeopardized as ultimately to take us to war. Overnight some people have become most zealous in their determination to prevent American trade with nations at war which would risk searches, seizures, and sinkings that might take us to war. All right, let us agree that this danger does exist. What are we to do about it? Is the only answer to repeal the embargo and write the cash-and-carry plan to cover all commodities, including munitions? Certainly not. If we want the most thoroughgoing safeguard against that kind of chance, then what we want is an enlargement of the existing embargo that will forbid exportation of anything and everything to nations at war, or resort to a program which the administration once recommended—the maintenance of only a normal peacetime trade with nations at war. If that is not to be done, then let's have the embargo plus cash and carry to cover everything else.

The time to start staying out of Europe's war was before Europe went to war. Congress and the President made that start by writing the neutrality law. Now is the time for Americans, their President, and their Congress to hold fast to that kind of a start. We so desperately need today to be prevented from taking those steps which could so easily be steps straight to war. We ought to guard most jealously against the possibility of the United States gearing its economy to a wartime basis if we would avoid a repetition of that disastrous experience which is still with us.

We should decline to be fooled into believing that there is the faintest ideal of democracy involved in that European conflict today. The No. 1 issue is the maintenance of existing imperialism and empires, and the prevention of other imperialisms and empires being built to outshine them.

There is already some sentiment in this country to the effect that much as we may regret it, the time does seem to be at hand when we are going to have to clean up over there in Europe once again; that we stopped too soon the last time; that we have got to hop in there again and this time sweep clean; and that the way to start doing that is to move in at once on the economic front by becoming the arsenal for one side, which can be done only by repealing the arms embargo. This attitude, I might say, in light of what does prevail and will prevail in Europe for a long time to come, reminds one of the housewife who, during a 3-day duststorm out in the Dust Bowl, went out with her broom and swept her porch every half hour.

Say what you will, there were no causes more largely responsible for our entry into Europe's war in 1917 than foreign propaganda and our wartime trade. The record clearly discloses how true this was. Let us not repeat that experience. Let us not take the first step, which so easily paves the way to the next step, even to further steps involving declarations of war. Let us not do that, at least until we can have a clearer definition than now exists of what part we can play successfully, of what chance there is of going to war and remaining a democracy. Until we shall perchance have decided that Europe and her aches are really aches, let us not fool ourselves into believing that we can get half in and yet stay out of that war, for we ought to know that we are either going to be in or out—in or out.

An emergency exists or is declared to exist. "Repeal the embargo" becomes the hue and cry. Adjourn politics. Politics ought to be adjourned in this controversy. But there must be no adjournment of allegiance to the cause of keeping America strong, keeping democracy secure where we have a real chance to keep it secure, one place in all the world. There must be no adjournment of allegiance to that principle and policy dictating that America mind her own business, that America avoid entanglement in European power politics, about which we know so little and which we certainly cannot disentangle.

Speak up, Americans, make your voices heard. Don't for one minute permit yourself to believe that this cause of retaining the arms embargo is lost, for it is not lost. This fight is only just begun, and I say to you that it will be a matter of only a few days before there will be ample demonstration of the fact that a majority of the Members of the Senate have not pledged themselves to vote for repeal of the arms embargo.

Interparliamentary Union Conference

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN, AUGUST 17, 1939

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by me before the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Oslo, Norway, August 17, 1939.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fifty years ago the Interparliamentary Union came into being. The Parliamentary Union was the result of a great hunger of mankind to see if there were not ways and means of perpetuating parliamentary forms of government, to the end that men might tap the "untapped sources of power" that William James speaks of.

An English thinker once said that "life has meaning and to find its meaning is my meat and drink." A great German once said: "Life means to transform into light and flame all that we are or meet with." When the Interparliamentary Union came into being, parliamentary form of government was on the "upgrade" and there are those among us now who still believe, in spite of recent events, that parliamentary form of government is still on the "upgrade." We believe with that distinguished statesman, who was mentioned by one of the British members yesterday, that this is a "dawn period."

Unless reason and common sense prevail, we may have to go through another Gethsemane, but no matter what the immediate future holds, we will not be "downed" either by fear or discouragement. I have faith that there are silent, unseen, beneficent forces that are working. "There is no place where His voice is not heard."

While under the agenda we are speaking upon the general political situation of the world, yet many great thinkers have reached the conclusion that the crisis is a moral one. Great movements recognize that to be the truth. This country, the land of my fathers, has felt the stimulating influence of "moral rearmament." Mr. President, we have tried many panaceas, but are we ready to face our problem and say that we will fail until we apply to international affairs those moral standards of honesty and unselfishness which we were taught from our pulpits? We know that nations have been inoculated with the disease germ which in the name of expediency, policy, destiny, teaches them that they can repudiate their word, break treaties, defraud creditors, etc. Which among the great nations has not forsaken its obligations? Which one now can be trusted to keep its word? In human society, if an individual carried on as nations have been carrying on, he would be considered immoral, a criminal. Just as with individuals, however, it is possible for nations to set a loftier standard. Switzerland and the United States show the way. In these countries all nationalities live in harmony.

I had not intended to speak, but when it was suggested by the chairman of our delegation that I say a few words, I was especially happy to comply with that suggestion for two reasons:

First, there was a sentimental one. I wanted to speak from the rostrum of the Storting. My parents came from this land. They have both gone on ahead in the journey. If they were alive, they would be happy to see me, a representative of America, in their own homeland.

My first reaction was not to speak, because I remembered that on one occasion one of the great statesmen of this country over a century ago, in the great international crisis when Napoleon was stirring up affairs in Europe, said in response to an inquiry, "Nu er det tid til a holde kjeft," meaning that now it was time to keep your mouth shut. But again I realized that in a meeting of this kind—a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union, the only institution of its kind on earth, dedicated to the perpetuation of parliaments—it was my duty to speak..

The second reason, then, for my speaking I have already referred to. It is this: To bring to this body of serious-minded men—many of whom have dedicated their lives to this work, men who have come year after year to the meetings of this organization to exchange their points of view to the end that the great parliamentary systems of the world may be preserved—to preserve the great freedoms of mankind—to bring to this great body a reiteration of the old, old need—a quest for God. It is the supreme need of the hour. Goethe called it "more light." Others call it a "spiritual rebirth." The history of nations is replete with instances when men and nations returned from their waywardness to find inspiration, courage, vision, guidance, and rebirth in the "things of the Spirit."

You men know that integrity of the individual man is the great need of mankind today. You men know that it is the "great business" of parliaments and of the members thereof not only to pass laws but to provide moral leadership in this changing world.

I have been very much interested in all of the talks given, and I want to compliment the personnel of this convention for the spirit of equanimity, of friendliness, courtesy, and understanding, that has been manifested. I was very much interested in the remarks of the distinguished statesman from Great Britain, Lord Davies, when he spoke on the subject, "Peaceful Change." He has suggested one of the many subjects that must be considered by the nations of the world if we are not going to keep on finding ourselves in a volcanic crater that continually threatens to erupt.

A number of years ago, another distinguished Norwegian statesman used this expression: "Med lov skal landet bygges." That is, "By and through law the land shall be built." Lord Davies reached that conclusion when he said that "Everything depends on willingness of the nations to submit themselves to the rule of law," and this distinguished statesman supplemented his statement with a further conclusion that "Durable peace can only be founded on justice." Now, may I suggest that both the rule of law and justice are the attributes of the Infinite One, without whose aid and guidance it is apparent that mankind has by its own willfulness wandered in the wilderness of international friction and hatred.

There is a germ at work among the peoples of the earth known as international fear, hatred, jealousy. We must counteract this with the brotherhood of man built upon the rule of law, justice, and understanding. I know to many people such an expression sounds almost superficial, but some of us are beginning to see that the saving power in civilization is to be found in an awakening of mankind. That means an appreciation of the things of the Spirit.

My friends, an ancient philosopher, looking up at the stars at night, appreciating something of the glory of heaven and the insignificance of his mortal self, asked the question, "What are we here for?" Perhaps we can paraphrase that situation and question and look out upon the troubled world and ask, "What are we here in Oslo for?" The thinking of mankind today determines its course tomorrow. The chairman of our delegation quoted the scripture that, "For lack of vision the people perish." With vision, then, the nations of the world will succeed. What we need is perspective, fearlessness, and even a saving sense of humor.

We are here "but for a day," and after we have moved off the stage the show will go on; but as long as we are here, let us play our parts like men. I personally believe that when the "comets" on the political sky today are dim, the parliaments of the nations will shine forth brightly and new parliaments will come into being. I have faith in the upward march of humanity. We may be in a temporary dip now, but up ahead there will be a turn and the race will succeed in climbing higher. We cannot maintain the status quo in things material, and it cannot be done, either, in our perception of things spiritual.

I have spoken for myself. I have not had an opportunity to submit my thoughts to either the chairman or the members of our delegation. However, on behalf of the delegation and myself I want to express our appreciation to this country for the magnificent reception that we have received.

Mr. President, it was a great pleasure to hear the distinguished statesman, Stortingspresident Hambro. I agree with him that America owes much to Europe. From every land in Europe America has received its bloodstream. Your great culture has enriched our lives. Your music, your literature, your drama, some of your great ideas in economics, philosophy, and religion we have made our own. But, Mr. President, you have something we do not want. I refer to those barriers analyzed by the psychologists as fear, hatred, and distrust. Yes, we owe you much. We know the world is small. We are neighbors. We want to help. Your problems are intricate. There are many equations that we do not understand. I say we want to help, but we want to help you to help yourselves to the end that your problems may find solution through you.

I agree that the refugee problem is a political one. If war comes, it is very apparent we shall see after its close another large refugee problem. If we permit the idea to grow that it is the business of other nations to take over the defeated groups in a conflicting nation, then we may find ourselves having to look after the groups that are now in control of their governments.

We want to be helpful, but America does not want to meddle in Europe. The role of a meddler I do not crave for my country.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK SUN OF SEPTEMBER 4, 1939

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the advantages of living in a country at peace with the world, where citizens enjoy liberties to the fullest extent, is probably more greatly welcomed now than ever before in all the days of civilization. A recital of these blessings is very opportune, as it gives all of us a chance to feel the full scope of our exceptional opportunities.

The New York Sun of September 4, in an editorial which I believe is deserving of national recognition, well expresses the general view of the accepted advantages of our great country. I hope the editorial may be given wide distribution, as it is worthy of our best attention and is a pleasant reminder of our unhampered, profitable activities.

It is with distinct pride that I have been party to an administration that has helped to attain the great privileges of our country and has established policies to maintain these privileges. The people may be assured, as I am, that President Roosevelt will always endeavor to preserve our blessings and keep us out of war.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun of September 4, 1939]

HE IS AN AMERICAN

He is an American.

He hears an airplane overhead, and if he looks up at all, does so in curiosity, neither in fear nor in the hope of seeing a protector.

His wife goes marketing, and her purchases are limited by her needs, her tastes, her budget, but not by decree.

He comes home of an evening through streets which are well lighted, not dimly in blue.

He reads his newspaper and knows that what it says is not concocted by a bureau, but an honest, untrammeled effort to present the truth.

He has never had a gas mask on.

He has never been in a bombproof shelter.

His military training, an R. O. T. C. course in college, he took because it excused him from the gym course, and it was not compulsory.

He belongs to such fraternal organizations and clubs as he wishes.

He adheres to a political party to the extent that he desires—the dominant one, if that be his choice, but with the distinct reservation that he may criticize any of its policies with all the vigor which to him seems proper—any other as his convictions dictate, even, if it be his decision, one which holds that the theory of government of the country is wrong and should be scrapped.

He does not believe, if his party is out of power, that the only way in which it can come into power is through a bloody revolution.

He converses with friends, even with chance acquaintances, expressing freely his opinion on any subject without fear.

He does not expect his mail to be opened between posting and receipt nor his telephone to be tapped.

He changes his place of dwelling and does not report so doing to the police.

He has not registered with the police.

He carries an identification card only in case he should be the victim of a traffic accident.

He thinks of his neighbors across international borders—of those to the north as though they were across a State line rather than as foreigners—of those to the south more as strangers, since they speak a language different from his, and with the knowledge that there are now matters of difference between his Government and theirs, but of neither with an expectancy of war.

He worships God in the fashion of his choice, without let.

His children are with him in his home, neither removed to a place of greater safety, if young, nor, if older, ordered ready to serve the state with sacrifice of limb or life.

He has his problems, his troubles, his uncertainties, but all others are not overshadowed by the imminence of battle and sudden death.

He should struggle to preserve his Americanism with its priceless privileges.

He is a fortunate man.

He is an American.

Editorials From Chicago Daily Tribune

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

EDITORIALS FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE OF SEPTEMBER 22, 1939

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 22, 1939, entitled "The War Parties," and another editorial from the same issue of the Tribune entitled "Dying for Danzig."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 22, 1939]

THE WAR PARTIES

If Congress were starting from scratch to determine what, in the event of a foreign war not yet begun, would be the best neutral policy for the United States to adopt, there could be an honest difference of opinion. Some people might, and some honestly do, argue that the cash-and-carry plan of selling goods and materials, including implements of war, would be the best method of dealing impartially with all the belligerents. The one which could control the sea or protect its shipping could reach our markets and we would have no other part in the business except to sell to cash customers who took away the goods in their own ships.

Other people, with an equal show of reason and with an even greater stress on the ethics, might argue for the present embargo on specified implements of war, although these include only a few and probably not the most important articles needed by a country at war. Still other people might think it best that there should be no special legislation whatever and that the Government should act under old international usage and law regarding neutral trade and rights.

The circumstances in which such a discussion might be had in Congress do not, however, at this time exist. They did when the Neutrality Act was passed in '37. The purpose in passing the act at that time, before there was a war, was to establish in times of peace the rules which would govern America if other countries went to war. The fairness of this, it was argued, was to be found in the fact that all nations knew what to expect of the United States and none could justly say that America had adopted certain rules after the outbreak of war and that these rules purposely made discriminations contrary to true neutrality to do injury in one direction and give aid in another.

Discrimination, it was said then, would not be neutrality. It was generally conceded that the virtue of the rules lay in their predetermination. Whatever the opinion was as to the precise merits of the laws passed, there was general agreement as to its fairness, and people thought at the time that it would remove some of the danger that in a general conflict Americans could not maintain their neutrality.

Certain elements of the people now want to repeal or modify the embargo and permit the sale of munitions.

Some of these people sincerely believe that modification will give added security to our country—protecting it against war. Other proponents of cash and carry are moved primarily by a desire to help the French and British win the conflict. That element wants to abandon neutrality, while saying they wish to preserve it. This is a hypocritical or a foolish inconsistency. It follows the theory that a nation can pick sides in a conflict, select the nations it will aid, take all steps short of war, and still be regarded as a neutral noncombatant. That, it must seem to many sensible people, is muddled reasoning and a dangerous line of thought.

Some of the people who favor this choosing of sides are guided by sentiment and some of them by more specific intents. There are three war parties in this country and they combine to seek action increasing the probability, if not inviting the inevitability, that a war of a year or more in Europe will find an American Army overseas again.

One of these war parties contains persons who think their continuance in public office and authority will be guaranteed by military intervention in Europe. They figure that not only the party in power but the persons in authority when a war begins will be carried over into another term to prosecute it. They think that a successful appeal to the country can be made to continue a war government. People would hear a great deal about adjourning politics and about the dropping of party labels. It may be noted that in the British war dictatorship all byelections for Parliament have been canceled and that it is planned to cancel the full election of November 1940 if Great Britain is at war at that time. One American war party thinks that the tradition against the third term would disappear if the United States were fighting overseas.

There is another war party which believes that war would bring about a permanent change in American social, political, and economic conditions. The milder minded of this party refer back to the temporary changes in national activity made by the World War and to what they call the unselfish, unified national efforts which for the time changed the national psychology and made possible an approach to the collectivized state. This, they think, would be repeated with permanent results if the Nation were thrown again into a tremendous war. The tougher-minded gentry go beyond this hopeful idea and believe that if the United States were involved in a general world catastrophe the American form of government would be completely overthrown, capitalism destroyed, and the Communist state placed upon the ruins of representative government and private enterprise. That is the hope of all "reds."

The "reds" believe that if the capitalistic world can be thrown into another conflict more exhausting than the one it barely survived in Europe the last time, it will be forever finished—not, however, if the United States remains out of the wreckage. Our own American "reds" are even redder in the face than they are in their doctrine these days. They are giddy with whirling about trying to follow the Moscow line, not knowing from day to day where it is. Wherever Stalin is going they are following, difficult as it is to imagine what he is doing and why. It is hard to be orthodox to another man's shifting heresies but our Communists are doing the best they can.

The third war party is composed of our colonials. They believe that it is even more the duty of the United States than of Canada to assist Great Britain, forever the mother country to them, in its wars. When Mr. Chamberlain decided that Poland should not be asked to consider the return of Danzig, he decided the issue for his American followers. When he decided that this time he would go to war, he decided for them also. There are reservations to their subscription; not all of them intend to offer themselves. Very few of them would be found in the front line. They think of war as something fought by young men they do not know, who appear out of the vast population and agree to sacrifice themselves for causes which the colonials adopt. Somewhere in the hinterland there is a great peasantry which can be conscripted for battle service.

The fact that these three American war parties have backed the repeal of the embargo is a weighty argument against it.

DYING FOR DANZIG

Some Poles are still fighting courageously, desperately, and forlornly—but not with the support of their Government or under the direction of their army commander and his staff. Marshal Smigly-Rydz and the high command skipped to Rumania. President Ignace Moscicki, Foreign Minister Josef Beck, and the other high officers of the Government are in the same sanctuary.

The gentlemen who made the war were not "bitter-enders." Survivors of the shattered troops—peasant boys and young officers—may fight on, but the gentlemen of government, whose chests were out toward the enemy in the preliminary test of nerves and the diplomatic exchanges, departed while the roads and frontiers were open, and they took plenty of this world's goods with them. They can survive the wreckage of Poland and may hope to make another war.

When Franco suddenly smashed all resistance in Catalonia and then turned on Madrid, he did not catch any high government officials of the regime he had overthrown. They had made good their departure to France with plenty of gold. Soldiers were in the surrender, but not statesmen who would fight as long as they were safe. King Zog was the first fugitive out of Albania. He did not even wait for his wife and new-born child.

The Emperor of Ethiopia need not be regarded as a timid person, but he did not fall with his capital or make a last stand as the Lion of Judah with his troops. He was too important, as the symbol of the state to grace a Roman triumph. It comported more with his dignity to grace an English country house and draw on a substantial bank account.

But why mention minor characters when greater figures provide history with notable escapes from the downfall of their own great war adventures? The old gentleman at Doorn did not die in a suicidal charge of the Death Head Hussars. They looked very formidable in their mortuary uniforms, but the Kaiser rode hard to Holland. It is better for an all highest to saw wood than to face a victor, whatever happens to the people. And Napoleon's coattails were straightened out in the wind every time he thought some other place than the place he happened to be was the place he ought to be.

He deserted his army in Egypt and beat it for France—for reasons of state. No good advice could keep him out of Russia, and no consideration for his troops could keep him in it. The fastest horses and the best sleigh split the freezing Russian winds—for reasons of state—on the way to safety, while his army died in the snow. The Old Guard perished at Waterloo, but not Napoleon. He was on his way again on a charger riding fast for Fontainebleau.

The gentlemen who make wars do not fight them. They take the glory of victory and skip from the miseries of defeat. Many a Polish boy who probably did not care a damn about traverses in the corridor and who might not have been able to find Danzig on the map has died since his great marshal and his high officials decided to accept the hospitality of Rumania.

Arms Embargo Repeal Proposal

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS, SEPTEMBER 29, 1939

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD remarks of mine over the Columbia Broadcasting System on September 29, 1939, relating to the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am opposed to the United States taking any part in this European war.

It is not our war.

I do not want the United States dragged into this war, or bribed into this war, or led into this war by the mistaken enthusiasm of some of our own leaders. There is just one safe place for us, and that is the United States. The surest way for us to keep out of trouble is to stay on our own ground and mind our own business.

I believe the people of the United States are overwhelmingly opposed to the United States becoming involved, and I think they will hold their elected representatives in the Senate and the House of Representatives responsible if they take action that leads us into war.

The crux of this whole question is the President's demand for the repeal of the arms-embargo provision of the existing Neutrality Act.

I am most emphatically opposed to repeal of the arms embargo, and will fight against repeal to the last.

I take this stand because I believe repeal of the arms embargo is a definite and certain step toward war.

I am not taking a step toward war—I want to keep the United States out of war, not push it into war.

I am convinced our chances of staying out of the present war will be much better if we let the existing arms-embargo provision of the Neutrality Act alone.

I might call attention to the fact that this Neutrality Act in 1937 was approved in the Senate by a vote of 63 to 6. It passed the House 376 to 13. The President signed the act just as he had signed practically the same act in 1935—and pointed to it as a great step toward peace in his campaign for reelection in 1936.

This Neutrality Act as it now stands is not a Democratic act. It is not a Republican act. It is an American act, and should not be wiped out as a neutrality act by repeal of the arms-embargo provision.

I said a moment ago that this is not our war.

I think all of us ought to bear that in mind—this is not our war. The war issue in Europe is boundary lines, spoils, power politics—not humanitarianism, not democracy.

Let us not be misled, nor mislead ourselves into believing, that the Allies in Europe are fighting in some unexplained way for democracy, for civilization, or fighting for the United States.

You know and I know this war is rooted in European power politics. It is not a war for democracy. So I say again we should keep out of the bloody fracas.

I can remember a quarter of a century ago when the propaganda was started that these Allies were fighting to make the world safe for democracy; later we were even told that we would take part in the war that was to end war.

We believed that in 1917. Our leaders believed it. Our people believed it. Our young men believed it. No nation ever went forth to war with higher ideals than did the people of the United States in 1917.

The disillusionment that started in 1919 was a bitter one. The millions of boys, the billions and tens of billions of dollars that went to Europe to fight for democracy in 1917 and 1918 won the war for those who talked of democracy—but they didn't save democracy. In fact, the World War just about ended democracy except in the Western Hemisphere.

I am opposed to the United States sending our boys overseas again to complete the job of replacing democratic government with dictatorships all over the world, for that will be the result, win or lose, as I see it.

Let us save our boys and young men for something better than fodder for Europe's battlefields during one of the long succession of wars that Europe has fought over boundaries and power.

Now, I say to you that repeal of the arms embargo will be taken in Europe and will be regarded by our own people as a definite abandonment of a program of neutrality and as a definite step toward participation in Europe's latest war for spoils and conquests.

And right there is reason enough to oppose the repeal of the arms embargo.

I hold that our chances of standing clear in the European conflict are better if we remain neutral than if we take sides.

It will be a terrible mistake if we blunder ourselves into an unneutral position. And, frankly, I say this as one whose sympathies are with England and France.

Repeal of the arms embargo at this time cannot and will not be interpreted anywhere except as an unneutral act.

During time of peace we enacted the arms embargo for the purpose of making it easier for the United States to keep out of Europe's wars. The arms embargo put Europe on notice—notice that the United States expected to remain neutral.

The United States could have established a cash-and-carry law for the sale of munitions at that time without any question of unneutrality being raised.

But now the situation has changed. Europe is at war. If we repeal the arms embargo, it admittedly is done for the purpose of helping Britain and France against Germany.

That certainly would be an unneutral act.

It would be serving notice on Europe that the United States, instead of remaining neutral, is taking sides with the Allies.

Now, admitting our sympathy with the Allies, we may as well be realistic.

If we start selling munitions on a cash-and-carry basis and build up a huge industry with only two customers, this is what is going to happen:

When the cash runs out, rather than lose our customers and dislocate our domestic business structure by allowing the munitions industry to collapse, we will substitute credit for cash.

The next step will be to make loans to the Allies to protect the credit that has been advanced.

And then, finally, we will send American boys overseas again, just as we did in 1917. That would be a terrible mistake.

Once we set our feet on that path the result is inevitable, my friends. First, make war profits from cash sales, then give credit, then make loans, then send our men.

I am against any program of loans or extensions of credit by the United States Government or its citizens to any nation engaged in war. I am very much opposed to the 90-day-credit-allowance clause in the pending legislation.

Realizing that repeal of the arms embargo means just one thing, that we will enter the European war now raging; knowing that the people of the United States feel as I do, that we ought not, must not, get into this war that is not our war if we possibly can avoid it, I am going to continue to oppose repeal of the arms embargo with all my might. When we lift the arms embargo and start selling war supplies it is almost equivalent to a declaration of war.

I am for a strong Navy, a large air force, and adequate national defense, but not for fighting Europe's battles for any European nations or set of nations.

Holland, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, Norway, and a half-dozen other countries next door to the trouble in Europe are showing their good sense by keeping out of this war and remaining neutral. Why should we travel 3,000 miles across the seas looking for a fight? I say let them alone.

Our Neutrality Act was enacted in the belief that Europe's wars are not our wars. The belief is just as well grounded today as it was 2 years ago when the Congress enacted it and the President signed it. So I am for keeping the Embargo Act as it is. Good sense, morals, material well-being, and devotion to the principles of democracy all sound the warning—"America, stay out!"

We have between us and the trouble abroad a natural barrier potentially more powerful than a dozen navies. Our immediate duty to ourselves and our sister republics is to keep on this side of the world and set an example for the other side to follow. We can't keep the peace by involving ourselves in somebody else's war.

My sympathies are with the Allies; but when it comes to taking part in a foreign war, I am neither German nor British. I am American.

I am sorry I cannot go along with President Roosevelt in his high enthusiasm for the welfare of the entire world, but I believe the Members of the Senate are free men, with the right to their own beliefs and the duty of living up to those beliefs. Furthermore, I am opposed to giving the President more discretionary war powers. I think Congress should remain in session as long as the emergency exists, and should perform its duties as the Constitution requires. I am glad to stay here and do my best to keep America out of war.

I intend to continue to stand for what I believe is best for my country—and that includes keeping the arms embargo in effect indefinitely.

I have my personal sympathies for England and France, but I think vastly more of the United States than I do of any European country. Whatever we do, let's be sure that we are thinking of the future welfare of this country first.

If these Europeans are determined to have wars, let them fight their own wars. Our problems are right here at home, not in Europe.

I hope we have learned something from history. Our experience in the World War should teach us that it is a good thing to keep out of European wars. We lost the lives of 126,000 of our finest American boys; it cost us $41,000,000,000. We got nothing for it—not even thanks. We loaned them $14,000,000,000. They still owe us and will never pay.

We also made 23,000 new millionaires in the United States through World War profiteering. The big fellows who make huge profits in wars are anxious to get in the game again. I am opposed, and the masses of the people in this country are opposed, to giving these merchants of death a chance to pile up their millions as they did before. For this country to supply munitions and armaments to either side makes us the worst profiteer of all—the one who profits by the death and suffering of millions of human beings. We must not do it. Blood money will bring neither happiness nor prosperity to the people of America.

Just what good the United States, and in the long run the world, would get out of United States intervention in this war is more or less doubtful.

But here are some things I know the United States would get:

First. A dictatorship.

Second. A further increase in the national debt of tens of billions of dollars.

Third. Losses of life running perhaps into millions; destruction of property running into the billions.

Fourth. After the war, a depression worse than the last one—and very likely a continuation of the dictatorship, and then some more European wars.

I say we ought to keep these things in mind and stay out.

I say again the way to stay out of the European war is not to take the first step that would lead us into it—repeal of the Embargo Act. When we start selling munitions we start entering this war, which is not our war but just one of Europe's many wars. And if we enter one more of Europe's wars, we probably will participate in every major European war from now on.

Now I have given you the main reasons, my friends, why I have joined forces with Senators BORAH; HIRAM JOHNSON; CLARK of Missouri; VANDENBERG, of Michigan; NYE, of North Dakota; Senator FRAZIER; Senator LA FOLLETTE, and at least two dozen other Senators, in unfaltering opposition to the repeal of the arms embargo and against any further grant of power to the President to handle foreign relations.

That is the way I feel about it.

And judging from the letters and telegrams that are coming to Senators and Representatives that is the way the great majority of Americans feel about it.

I have received more than 11,000 letters and telegrams since Britain and France declared war. And there are at least ten urging that the United States remain neutral for ever one that would repeal the arms embargo. The Members of Congress from New Hampshire and Massachusetts—from States clear across the country to California—tell me that their mail is preponderantly the same way.

It's very plain to me the people of this country don't want to go to war for Europe's boundaries. I think that feeling is almost unanimous.

The great majority of our people believe, and I believe, that the sale of munitions will lead us directly into the European war.

The great majority of the people of this country—the ones who will have to do the fighting if war comes—want the arms embargo kept in effect. They don't want the Neutrality Act amended to make it any less neutral.

And I say to you that these people are right. I believe the American people will keep their heads and resist all the propaganda designed to lead us into war.

It is not our war. We must not allow ourselves to be stampeded into it. We learned our lesson 20 years ago. We cannot bring peace to Europe by taking more war to Europe.

And if we start selling munitions to the warring nations of Europe, then most assuredly we are on the way to sending our boys to Europe again.

My friends, it is up to you, it is up to the people of the United States to insist that Congress reject the pleas to allow the sale of munitions to warring Europe, no matter how eloquent these pleas are; no matter how well intentioned the people who would follow the course that led us to war in 1917—and will lead us there again unless Congress stands firm in this grave emergency.

My friends, Europe is the land of the double-cross, as well as of the little white crosses. Why should America go abroad looking for either?

When the whole country is aflame we should not be hasty in taking action. We do not need to, and certainly ought not to repeat the mistake we made in entering the previous World War.

In conclusion let me assure you I shall protest in the Senate with all the energy and earnestness I possess against weakening the Neutrality Act by amendments making it less neutral. I shall insist on retaining the Embargo Act which will stop the profiteering in war supplies.

And before I close, let me say also that I am strong for a war referendum in the Constitution of the United States. I say the men who will do the fighting and the people who will pay the bills should have something to say on the question of going into foreign wars.

I promise you right now that as a United States Senator I never will vote to ever again send American boys across the seas to fight someone else's war. I say the life of one American boy is worth more than Poland or any other land they may be fighting over.

Proposed Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA, AUGUST 24, 1939

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by my colleague, Senator NYE, on August 24, 1939, on the subject Save American Neutrality.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the Republican Party looks for success in 1940, it must first look to the affording of platform and candidates winning the confidence of that great majority of Americans who wish to see their Government meet present-day challenges with intelligence and without quackery.

We shall get nowhere as a party if our outlook is merely that looking to victory. We shall be woefully defeated if we choose to assume that victory will come alone on the strength of the growing unpopularity of the opposing party's administration. We shall die as a party if we choose to pursue a policy of government that ignores the tremendous challenges presented these days. We shall be overwhelmingly defeated if our program is to be merely that of destroying the so-called New Deal without a thought to the worthy accomplishments that ought to be retained.

For 6 years we have had government by leadership that clearly was without a goal, without much more than an ability to cash in on immediately popular processes that have won no permanent remedy or good. It has been too much a government of witch hunters and medicine men pursuing illusive evil connections and influences presumed to be the root of all evil, a government that seemed to be strong in leadership but leading nowhere. For more than 6 years we have heard representations of purpose which all too infrequently have been accomplished. Republicans should be ever mindful of the fact that the people want leadership with purposes that will be accomplished, with vision that acknowledges a genuine place for government in rebuilding the economic structure in a way that affords largest measure of opportunity for the greatest number.

For 6 years we have had a government by leadership that obviously has been hoping for a normal economic recovery to be credited to that leadership striking in the dark, guessing, and wild spending policies. The result of those 6 years is the economic status of 1931, plus a drifting and waiting and trusting to luck, plus a futile resignation to the order prevalent that gets nowhere. It leaves us with an air of defeatism and a policy of despair, a condition brought most definitely to a head and into plain view by the President's attitude toward the international situation. The Republican party ought to know that the people are not going to be content with a substitution for this policy in the form of a let-things-right-themselves policy.

The Republican Party must, and will, pursue a policy that corrects our domestic ills by carrying to the American farmer assurance of cost of production, plus a profit for that part of agricultural production that is consumed by Americans; and to the American people in need, of an honest measure of security. But, all of this avails us little or nothing if the country is to be plunged into another foreign war that will thoroughly disorganize any program of economic recovery even before we have won it. The Republican Party must accept the challenge which the present administration lays down; that challenge which would have us involve our country in the power politics of the world and forget or ignore those serious problems which threaten us right here at home.

One does not discuss the Roosevelt foreign policy without first asking what it is. For my own part, I cannot define it except to say that it seems to be one of thrusting and lunging and parrying and playing the game of poker at the international table where more experienced gamblers have been playing for years, without anyone winning from them a pot deserving the name. It is a policy which finds an administration preaching a determination to keep this country of ours out of war, but pursuing a course of activity that can only be inviting ourselves to another war even before we know that about which the next war will be fought, whom we will be fighting with, whom we will be fighting against.

America wants to be free of another foreign war. Americans have made that particularly plain again and again. America wants peace. Americans have made it plain that they want nothing of involvement in those hates and prejudices which are so exclusively Europe's. We have assumed that we learned a lesson 20 years back that was going to last.

While we are most emphatic in declaring a determination to stay out of foreign wars, we are equally confused about the methods whereby we will help ourselves to stay out of other people's wars. Today the American people, millions of them, are believing that the present national administration wants a neutrality law to help us keep out of war, when, in fact, that same administration really wants to do away with the all-important part of the neutrality law.

Let us, first of all, get the facts straightened out. To hear and see the Roosevelt administration at work today, as it has been for a year, the people are left to believe that Congress put something over that the President did not like when the Neutrality Act of 1937 was passed. That was the law that forbade American exportation of arms, ammunition, and instruments of war to nations engaged in war, forbade loans and credits to nations at war and forbade Americans upon the vessels of nations at war. The President not only signed this act and made it the law of the land, but his administration did more than that and asked for the law in its present form.

Let the whole background of the neutrality picture be made clear. True, a neutrality law was first given life by the Senate Munitions Committee. It drafted and introduced three resolutions covering the ground now encompassed by the law. The administration combined these three resolutions and introduced new legislation which differed from the Munitions Committee program, only as relates to the discretionary powers given the President under the law. The Munitions Committee program was much more mandatory than is the present law. But what should be made clear is this: The present neutrality law was asked for by the Roosevelt administration. That is the same law that the same administration now condemns and asks repeal of in part.

The President has been demanding change in the law, particularly as respects that feature of it which forbids the sale and exportation of arms, ammunition, and instruments of war to nations at war. He demands this change in the name of a truer neutrality. He wants the change made in such a way as will let the law operate to favor of those nations which have command of the sea in time of war, those nations that can come and get what they want in the way of war supplies. That would be, as things stand right now, England and France. It also means Japan. The law the administration wants is one that would favor one group of nations as against another group. And they want the people to accept that kind of law under the title of neutrality.

The administration hasn't yet got what it has so insistently demanded, this repeal of the arms embargo in the neutrality law, the embargo that does deal alike with all nations in time of their wars. Both the House of Representatives and the Senate have denied the administration its request. These denials came in the face of terrific pressure. The action of Congress in this respect has been severely criticized, even to the extent of calling Congress pro-Fascist. What Congress was really doing was denying power to a President to involve us in war. Congress was striving to maintain the laws that would help us keep out of other people's wars. The administration was bitter about the refusal of Congress to grant the Presidential wish and repeal the arms embargo. I expect that any of us would have been equally bitter if we had been in the President's shoes and gone as far as he seems to have gone in assuming a leadership in the European squabble.

The pretentions and the actions of President Roosevelt with respect to war and peace have been so utterly contradictory that there must quite naturally be confusion in the public mind about this whole neutrality consideration. Why would the President be so angry about the refusal of Congress to repeal the arms embargo—the arms embargo his administration once asked for—the arms embargo he himself once praised? Let us see if the answer to that is to be found.

It will be remembered that up to a certain point the President consistently preached the doctrine of "keeping out of war." If the people want one picture of the President upon this and the question of neutrality, they will find it in that famous campaign speech of his delivered at Chautauqua, N. Y. Other most contrary pictures are available of him since.

This administration has drifted from a strict "keep out of war" policy, and the drifting started at precisely the time when that administration saw itself failing miserably in its domestic policy. The drift started and continued through those days when a war boom might save the face of the administration. The administration will deny this most emphatically. But the President himself let the cat out of the bag, and let his tongue slip during those hours when he was spitting cotton because Congress would not do his bidding and repeal the arms embargo. Surely we are not forgetting his words to the effect that failure to repeal the arms embargo had prevented a war boom.

The acrobatics of the President in the foreign situation during the past year would be funny, if it were not for the fact that these moves have carried such complete danger to the future of a nation that knows that American democracy can be so easily destroyed if America lets itself be played into another frightful world war. The administration has actually been playing "sickum dog" on England and France during the past year.

England and France no more want war than we Americans want our country in war. Both nations were doing a good job of avoiding war. They were permitting an adjustment in Europe of the injustices that they had helped to inflict at Versailles. And up to a certain point we encouraged this. It will be remembered that there were more administration voices than one taking for President Roosevelt credit for what was done at Munich, credit for the avoidance of war there by reason of his letter to the Italian dictator. The administration was proud of the Munich Pact up to the hour when there was discovery of the displeasure of the American people with what England and France were doing in surrendering the small democracies to Hitler. It was then that the administration began making faces at England and France, demanding that they stand by their guns and by democracies if they expected to retain American sympathy and respect. It doesn't require much imagination to see Ambassador Bullitt representing our displeasure. It requires even less imagination to see England and France wanting our respect and our help, wanting to know what America would do if they did stand by their guns and demand a halt of Hitler operations in eastern Europe; to see them being assured by American spokesmen that in the event such a demand led to war, surely they could count on American cooperation, because America wanted to save democracy. Naturally, England and France would want to know, "Well, what of your neutrality law that forbids access to American war supplies; what of the Johnson Act, that forbids more loans to those of us who have not paid up on our last war debt?" Is it difficult to believe that American spokesmen and Ambassadors would be caused to assure France and England that these laws would be surmounted at the proper time, that already the arms-embargo repeal was pending in Congress? Do we forget that during that very time the administration was publicly prophesying that the House of Representatives would vote the repeal with a majority of a hundred or more votes? Surely England and France were being given every reason to believe that the United States was making ready to give them every possible help. President Roosevelt was being made to stand out as the leader in settling Europe's mess. The "leader" was left in a most undignified position when the House of Representatives, instead of voting the arms-embargo repeal, as prophesied, voted against the repeal with a majority of more than a hundred votes.

Then followed the terrific pressure upon the Senate to undo the damage that had been done and save the face of the President, the Nation, and even democracy—a face that had been injured because one lone man had stuck his nose into affairs that the American people have insisted we shall keep out of. The Senate response to demands for arms-embargo repeal only made a bad matter worse, and England and France are given notice that if any American pretends to be able to commit America to a given course of action in Europe, he is speaking only for himself, and himself alone.

Now, let's be honest with ourselves. Law, embargoes, and all the resolve in the world to stay out of Europe's wars may not keep us out of those wars. It is possible that a state of affairs might arise in Europe that would very definitely challenge our own country, and that would make necessary our getting into that war. Frankly, I do not see possible a state of affairs there that would deserve the wasting of one more American life on European battlefields. But I'm ready to acknowledge that the condition might develop. Suppose it does. Who shall determine when that time comes and whether the cause is worthy? Shall it be the Congress of the United States, or shall it be the President?

In that question is embodied the real nub of the neutrality controversy. It is a question of Presidential power, Presidential discretion, Presidential chance to commit the country in a way that makes staying out of war exceedingly difficult.

The neutrality law was the result of a complete demonstration of the ease with which American appetite for profit from other people's wars could, and did, lead us to war in 1917. However much we may like to think we rallied to the cause of democracy in 1917, the truth is that democracy became the rallying cry only after decision to go to war had been reached. Up to that time the condition that was leading us to war was our war trade and the security of our war-boom trade. Read the communications of the President, his Cabinet, and his ambassadors during the many months leading up to 1917 and you will find little or no solicitation about the well-being of European "democracy." On the contrary, you will find much solicitation about our trade and profit from Europe's war, about American banker loans to the Allies, about changing our neutrality policy so as to permit larger help to the Allies, so that the Allies in turn can continue buying our goods and maintain our American prosperity.

Don't forget, fellow Americans, don't ever forget those lessons of 1914, 1915, and 1916, lessons of how our actual direction can be straight to war even while our leadership is talking peace and pretending neutrality. Don't ever forget those letters and conversations which found our Lansings and Pages driving away at and breaking down Presidential resolve to maintain a real neutrality. Don't permit anyone to ever cover up and blind us to the fact that American bankers, having bet extensively in the way of investment in the allied cause, prompted English leaders on the program to pursue if they wanted to overcome the determination of the American Government to stay out of war. For example, remember how one firm of American bankers advised England by cable to make it clear to America that England would immediately curtail its purchases in the United States unless the United States changed its foreign policy, a policy which, at the moment, was finding the Federal Reserve banks advising Americans to get security for what they were selling abroad.

There must be no forgetting that all that time, while the people were being given to believe that their Government was conducting a strictly neutral policy, the United States Government was actually committing itself to policies that could not lead to anything other than participation in that European war.

Don't ever forget the picture painted by Ambassador Page in his ultimate cablegram to President Wilson, when Page said, "Our going to war is the only way in which our trade position can be maintained and a panic averted," and further that "the pressure of this approaching crisis has gone beyond the ability of the Morgan financial agency for the British and French Governments." There is nothing about saving democracy involved in these communications, and yet it was only 30 days after this cablegram that the leaders of the American Government and all the rest of us were declaring war to save democracy.

If America really means to stay out of foreign war, she needs to remember how easy it is to get in. We need the neutrality law. We need the restraints upon a President. We need to leave the decision of going to war or doing that which will take us to war with the people; if not with them, then with the Congress.

We have our sympathies and our prejudices respecting Europe, of course. Certainly we cannot like some of the things that take place there. But we have not learned a thing as a result of the last war if we have not learned that European purpose, causes, and wars are not ours, or that it does not lie within our power to inflict our ideals and our purposes upon Europe even after we have helped a part of Europe in the winning of its wars.

The country has been flooded by foreign propagandists for many months. Those from one land are no more deserving of our hearing and our confidence than those of another. They are still propagandists, and should be registered as such. British propaganda is being woven nicely into what seems to be American foreign policy under Roosevelt. One British authority wrote that perhaps the only way that England could get the United States on her side actively in another war would be for England to make certain that Japan was against England in that war. Is the present situation in Asia at all significant in light of such an expression of purpose? Lord Baldwin comes to our shores and only a few days ago in New York declared: "A democrat should be prepared to die for his ideals," and his American audience applauded the thought of rallying their sons to European battlefields to save whatever might be labeled "Democracy" there, once again. Significant, is it not, in light of the written plans for British propaganda, to again appeal to American love for democracy in order to involve us in European wars?

Democracy! Oh what sins are committed in thy name, what crimes upon the American people, what injustice upon American sons.

In the present European controversy the cause of democracy is no more involved than is the cause of American women's suffrage or liquor prohibition. The cause there is that old, old one of power politics. It is a cause that we cannot meddle in unless we are ready and anxious to jeopardize the life of the one remaining great democracy, our own.

For the reading of those Americans who believe that democracy calls us to Europe again, I recommend that article published in July of this year in a French magazine—that article written by André Tardieu, former French Premier. The translation of this article before me has this French leader saying that in America "the 'great democracies' of Europe have been accused of not being democratic at all in reality—that opinion is not wholly without foundation." Quite a concession, this. When will we Americans learn to resist these appeals from abroad in the name of democracy? We had better be doing that quickly if we would avoid a course that will have us marching men and dollars once again onto bloody foreign fields to win a war for someone else, only to discover finally, and after it was too late to do anything about it, that every cause for which we had thought we were fighting had been lost.

A policy of minding our own business is good American policy today. That ought to be our policy at least until we can know what that thing in Europe is all about. It is especially good policy, since we have so very much of important business to mind right here at home, too.

We should be ever ready to help the world to peace without jeopardizing our own peace. We have nothing to gain by throwing our resources into the European hopper even before we know what the next European war is going to be all about.

Mind our own business! America first! That seems to sound cheap to some patriots. We are told that it constitutes an extreme nationalism, an all-time high in selfishness.

Why not America first? Is it selfish? Not one small part as selfish, certainly not more selfish, than are those European causes which would seem to invite us to participation. It is no more selfish than the attitude of the father who thinks first of his home and his family. If that be selfish, then even things which touch the divine are selfish, too.

And, more than that, if America doesn't provide for America, who will? England and France perhaps? We ought to know that if America is going to be saved, America is going to have to do the saving. That being the case, then who are more important to America than Americans? Where in all the world is there 1 foot of soil so important to us as American soil? Where in all the world is there a cause sufficiently great to invite the shedding of the blood of American boys on foreign battlefields where hates of thousands of years look down and rejoice at the reenacting of a carnage which has been going on without determination for generations beyond count and will be going on in spite of us and what we do.

When leaders fail at home, they take their people into foreign wars, but let that not be true in America. Some dictators find it possible to continue their days of power by creating a war psychology and an armament economy, but that can never be true in America. Or can it? Not if we will hang fast to America-first causes. Not if we can maintain a neutrality in other people's wars. Not if we can keep American leadership from committing us to foreign causes.

We Are Right to Be Safe

HON. JESSIE SUMNER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JESSIE SUMNER, OF ILLINOIS, OCTOBER 2, 1939

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Republican League of Women:

Madam Chairman, fellow Republicans, our party has been making a notable contribution toward the progress of popular government. Republicans have waged an effective campaign to preserve certain principles of American Government which, until 1932, were considered so fundamental that they were never permitted to become an issue between two leading political parties.

Republicans have fought steadily for thrift in government, for adherence to the Constitution, and for independence of the courts, of the Congress, of the people.

A portion of the opposite party has fought with us.

Business began to be encouraged this summer, because a little band of Democrats and Republicans in Congress had knees which did not buckle under political pressure.

It takes a hero to brave party reproaches. But we need not forget that those heroes of the other party rose upon the shoulders of a solid Republican bloc.

Now, many of us fear that another fundamental, time-tested American principle is in jeopardy. A principle which is most important because it involves the lives of you and your children. That principle is the impartial policy in dealing with foreign nations even when they are at war with one another. Washington initiated that policy which, to be sure, is the policy of England and other nations, when neutral. Every American President adhered to that impartial policy during neutrality until after 1914.

In the World War he who was called the Great Commoner, William Jennings Bryan, heroically proved that he deserved his title. He resigned as Secretary of State because he refused as an officer in a neutral Nation to lend his support to partiality—to the violation of what he regarded as a vital American principle.

Bryan, apparently, believed, like President Adams, that a neutral America had no business trying to pass upon the merits of a war in which America was not a participant, to favor one side as against the other. He saw his superior waiving precious rights it had taken a century to build up. Even going so far in partiality to Great Britain as to refuse to warn Americans that, under international law, in traveling upon ships of Great Britain, then a belligerent, such Americans were subject to the same destructive war tactics as if they themselves were belligerents. Had the warning Bryan demanded been issued, there would probably have been no Lusitania "incident."

You are aware of the casual attitude so many politicians entertain toward women voters, saying, "Women are no real force in elections. They won't get out and pay your way."

In 1916, however, women worked strenuously for the Presidential candidate whose campaign slogan was, "He kept us out of war."

Nothing, perhaps, has so disillusioned women with politics as the deliberate and tragic deception which subsequent investigation shows to have been the basis of that campaign. Two months before the November election, it appears, the administration had done everything short of war except ask the Congress to declare war.

Women are not cowards. Women gladly risk their lives to give birth to the citizens of tomorrow. Women train the world of tomorrow. But they do not wish, without real justification, to sacrifice the lives of those for whom they so readily sacrifice themselves.

Last winter there was a "peace" meeting here with women delegates from all over the Nation. Startling sentiments were expressed. Speakers from foreign countries urged that the American President lead the (more or less) democratic allies (which in the World War included Japan) in a united front against dictators. An American urged those present to go home and rouse their neighbors. To ask the people in their home communities, "If it is always right to be safe?" concluded, "If we want peace, we must fight for it."

Today the fight for peace is going on all over America. War hysteria is being fought with hysteria for peace—but hysteria for peace won't maim and kill any American youths.

The League of Nations theory is again being preached. So far all it has done for America is get us into war. It may be fine for Europe, though it has caused furious rearmament against those nations said to dominate the League. For America, however, it is a device which would virtually throw away our three impregnable defenses: (1) 3,000 miles of ocean; (2) a vast self-sufficient area more difficult to invade and subjugate than impenetrable Russia; and (3) a nation of individuals so cosmopolitan in their sympathies and so energetic that nothing can conquer us, unless, like Samson, we let ourselves be inveigled into surrendering our source of strength.

After all, we've already done much for democracy and peace. The American Revolution inspired the English to seize further liberties from the King and encouraged the French democracy. It was American insistence upon neutral rights to "do business as usual" during European wars which built up the rights of all neutral nations and thus made a wonderful contribution toward world peace.

We know now that the cause of popular government lost prestige when we abandoned our traditional policy in 1914. We virtually abdicated the Declaration of Independence. We gave away enough money to pay for all relief since 1932. We made fools of ourselves and corpses of American young people. We offered a 14-point peace to Germany, which we ought to have known we could not get for them at the peace table. We became a party to a hideous revenge which made another war inevitable.

It was wrong that America did not remain safe in 1914. If America enters this war—and your money and your boys follow your sympathies—it will be only because we have acquired a bad habit of losing our heads, a habit which will be our undoing every time a European war occurs—and these wars over territory and resources flame up in Europe every time a new generation grows old enough to fight.

In 1917 we were unprepared for war, still less well prepared to maintain that stoic calm which is a nation's chief bulwark against war. New means of communication made that war seem nearer and more dangerous to us than previous wars. Today, however, we are fortified by congressional investigations showing the real cause of the last war.

In 1914 the American people were taken unawares. The dangers of having their safety in the hands of one human man did not occur to them. They did not realize that they needed to be vigilant against that man's lack of judicial temperament. They did not imagine that a President of the United States might talk impartiality in public and, perhaps, not realizing that he did so, connive with foreign belligerents in private. Inch by inch Americans succumbed to the idea that somehow that European war was no mere boundary dispute. They let their own sympathies betray them.

If you believe that it is a dangerous risk to repeal the embargo, read Borchard on Neutrality for the United States. Your instinct for self-preservation is based upon sound international law.

According to Washington, Adams, and Bryan, and today's leading international lawyers, the essence of neutrality is a spirit of impartiality. Peace depends upon our keeping an "impartial, friendly" attitude toward all belligerents. That's what it takes to save the lives of countless Americans. We love England, we love France. Surely, with so much at stake, we can find it in our hearts to pity our German cousins, who were led into the World War by the Kaiser and have been led since then by a philosophy of desperation.

The Congress is in session to vote for or against repeal of the embargo. It is proposed to substitute a cash-and-carry provision.

The proposed bill is easy to evade. Should it be administered with that divine recklessness with public money which has so failed as a national policy we will again be giving away large sums to nations who don't pay us back the money they borrow in wartime—try, instead, to draw our money and soldiers after our money. That in a country where money is so far from plentiful that right here in the Nation's Capital people tell me of seeing little children eating out of garbage pails.

The danger which is said to threaten us this time is the spread of dictatorship toward America.

It is just as well to remember that Germany was a democracy after the war. But debts piled up. Inflation became necessary. The people were in despair. Then came the voice. He had courage. The people had lost theirs. He was a star. They hitched their wagon to his coattails.

We, too, are headed toward insolvency, not knowing when it will come. Since 1932 we have gone a long way back down the road to one-man government. If we remain neutral, if we are not above thinking of national security in terms of the pocketbook and our own skins, there is a good chance to recover. Otherwise lack of neutrality may bring upon us the very dictatorship we are urged to help prevent in European battlefields.

Underneath the resounding slogans thought up by war propagandists European wars are usually motivated by economic conditions. They are struggles to keep what you have and prevent your opponent from getting some of it. Our only chance to keep what we have is to refrain completely from participating. In every European war in which America takes part—even to the extent of sending money—there are two losers—the official loser and America.

It's time, I think, that we gave the deposed William Jennings Bryan a vote of confidence. That we serve notice upon belligerents that we will not participate in this war. That we intend to preserve all the neutral rights relinquished since 1914. That in the future, as before 1914, we will—at the end of the war—present a bill for every damage to our neutral rights and insist upon payment. That if any nation wants to borrow from Uncle Shylock it can first make its credit good by tendering to us territory equivalent in value to its war debts.

That's business. That's neutrality. That's the traditional American policy without which Bryan refused to assume further responsibility for maintaining American peace.

A petition sent me from Danville, Ill., was signed, I am told, by the local commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. His hip was shattered in the World War. The bullet which did that job, they wrote me, bore the label "Made in America."

Some of us who, like Bryan, believe in an embargo of arms believe that our historical experience warns us that we cannot safely become an arsenal for belligerents. That it is unsafe to encourage much beyond our own great needs of defense this particular industry. In the safety of America, we believe, lies the real promise of future safety for the world.

"MATTERS OF FACT"—THE EMBARGO AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

(By Ernest Lindley)

If the arms embargo is lifted it will be in spite of a great many of the arguments made by opponents of the embargo. Some of the arguments are palpably absurd. Some are based on downright misinformation.

This column is always reluctant to challenge the facts of a fellow-columnist. Every writer makes a certain number of mistakes about his facts, no matter how careful and conscientious he is. However, some of the statements now being put forward as "facts" are so obviously wrong that it seems worth while to devote this space to examining a few of them.

1. The assertion that international law requires the repeal of the embargo. This was implied by the President in his message to the current special session of Congress and has been asserted flatly by numerous writers. A few days ago Miss Dorothy Thompson wrote to the effect that "nearly everybody who knows anything about international law" favors lifting the embargo.

Maybe so. But nearly everybody who knows anything about international law concedes that an embargo on the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war is entirely consistent with international law. On that point this column has several times quoted various authorities. Last Thursday the similar conclusions of still other authorities were printed by Arthur Krock, of the New York Times, who, like his paper, favors repeal of the embargo. Mr. Krock found it necessary to dismiss the President's assertion that return to international law is the "crux of the issue," because "the authorities do not support him (the President) in this position."

2. Certain statements in Mr. Walter Lippmann's column of last Thursday, "New Embargoes for Old." Mr. Lippmann said the defenders of the arms embargo have been telling us that it is "'unneutral' to change the rules of the game once war has been started. Well, the embargoes which they like and approve in the Pittman bill change the rules of the game. They lay embargoes which prevent the Allies from buying transportation and credit. These two embargoes are of great importance. They did not exist when war broke out, and if it is unneutral to repeal the embargo against selling arms, it is just as unneutral to lay two new embargoes against the sale of transportation and credit."

Of course, the argument that it is "unneutral" to change the rules in the middle of the game is fallacious. It is the neutral's privilege to change the rules whenever and as often as he pleases, provided he does so for the purpose of remaining a nonparticipant in the war and provided that he enforces his rules against all belligerents alike.

Mr. Lippmann, however, is wrong in writing of an "embargo" on credit as a new rule which is to be introduced in the middle of a game. The embargo on credit exists already. In fact, it is a double embargo, because it is required by two separate laws. The first of these is the Johnson Act, passed in 1934, forbidding credit to nations which defaulted on their war debts. The British and the French embargoed themselves under this law by failing to make payments due on their war debts. (Incidentally, they pleaded inability to obtain dollars with which to make their payments. It now appears, however, that they have plenty of dollars—billions of them—with which to buy war supplies in this country.)

In the second place, the existing neutrality law, passed in 1937, forbids loans to nations at war. The new Pittman bill merely carries forward this prohibition with certain minor changes.

Fifty percent of Mr. Lippmann's argument on this point is, therefore, based on an error in fact. The other half is concerned with the embargo on transportation; the requirement that belligerent nations take full responsibility for the transportation from our shores of goods which they buy here, plus the provision for keeping American ships completely out of war zones. Mr. Lippmann seems to think this is a kind of penalty to the Allies.

It is a penalty, but at the same time it is a benefaction. It means, in substance, that we will not protest against their all-inclusive contraband lists. It means that we will not attempt to ship goods in American-flag ships to such neutral nations as Holland, Belgium, and the Scandanavian states. It means, in effect, that we will not interfere in any way with the allied blockade of Germany, which presumably is the strongest weapon which the Allies have.

Contrary to Mr. Lippmann's assertions and insinuations, the cash-and-carry or come-and-get-it plan does not work to the disadvantage of the Allies; it is to their great benefit. In this column's opinion, it is much more to their benefit than they have any right to expect from this country, especially since their cash, their capacity to buy, exists largely because of their failure to make reasonable settlements of their debts to us on account of the first World War and because of our ostrich-like readiness to take gold and silver for burial in the ground in exchange for useful American goods.

3. The efforts to portray Great Britain and France as poor, weak countries, in contrast with the might of Nazi Germany. As an example, take Miss Dorothy Thompson's column of last Wednesday, in which she wrote of the Allies as dependent upon their ability to "purchase machine power in this country."

Miss Thompson wrote:

"Now, if nations small in area and low in resources, which are primarily commercial—which depend for their existence on trade—are going to be shut out of normal markets at the moment when those markets are absolutely vital to them, such nations will either disappear or the most ruthless imperialism will have to be revived and colonies subjugated and absolutely owned. Otherwise it will not be possible for sea-going countries small in area and poor in natural resources, like Great Britain, to exist, except on the terms of great land powers which have all resources inside their borders."

From this statement no one would suspect that Miss Thompson had ever heard of the British Empire. Without reliance upon us or any other neutral nation for a single dollar's worth of goods, the British Empire has two or three times the resources of Germany in raw materials. The manufacturing capacity of Great Britain and France combined, apart from their empires, exceeds that of Germany. Grant Germany free access to the iron ore of Sweden, to the coal and oil of Poland, to the oil of Rumania, and to the foodstuffs of Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Denmark, and Scandinavia, Germany is still a poor country in comparison with the British Empire. Add the French Empire and the contrast is even more striking.

If Germany should obtain unrestricted access to the resources of Russia, the balance would be changed, of course—although it might be 2 or 3 years before those resources could be developed sufficiently to meet Germany's requirements. Meanwhile, if the British and French can keep the sea lanes open, in the face of submarine and aerial attacks, their resources are immensely superior to those of Germany. It is because of that that they are resorting to blockade.

The French and the British may be behind Germany in certain phases of rearmament, but that is due to no lack of materials or of industrial capacity. Nor, it should be noted, are they deficient in manpower. Without counting their empires they have, between them, nearly as large a population as Germany has. Including their empires their numerical superiority is tremendous. The French have trained and armed as fighting troops large numbers of their colonial subjects. The British have done so on a much smaller scale.

However, in one British dominion alone—India—there are more than 350,000,000 people, between two and three times as many people as there are in the United States. There is the greatest reservoir of manpower in the world outside of China. If the Indians cannot be mustered to fight to save the Empire of which they are a part, we might at least pause to inquire why our resources, and perhaps eventually our manpower, should be called upon to save the British Empire, including India, for the British.

If the British and French Empires should be subjected to simultaneous attack by three or four other armed powers—Germany, Russia, Japan, and Italy—they might be overwhelmed. But that has not come to pass. In any event they are no weaklings. Their resources in materials, industrial capacity, and manpower are vast, without calling upon us for any assistance whatsoever except our normal peacetime exports to them.

City of Minneapolis—Centennial

OF

HON. OSCAR YOUNGDAHL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

HISTORY OF MINNEAPOLIS AS PREPARED BY THE CENTENNIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago this year, under an action of the Congress of the United States, the first legal claim to private property in which is now the city of Minneapolis, Minn., was perfected.

Today Minneapolis, a great city of a half million souls, begins the celebration of its hundredth birthday. It is fitting that a great industrial center such as Minneapolis should pause to pay tribute to that spirit of courage and foresight which in a short hundred years has turned this pioneer's homestead into the great metropolitan center of the Northwest, which has developed from this pioneer's humble abode a great city of beautiful homes, parks, playgrounds, and industrial institutions.

And so, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to record here in the RECORD of the Congress that made that first claim possible, the thrilling history of Minneapolis as prepared by the centennial committee.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The exact date of a city's birth is not always easily determined," says Horace B. Hudson in his History of Minneapolis. "There is often a choice between the date of the erection of the first temporary dwelling or camp and the first permanent settlement. Minneapolis enjoys a full measure of uncertainty surrounding its birthday."

As a matter of fact, any one of several dates might be selected as the birthday of Minneapolis, but the year 1839, when Franklin Steele, early pioneer, took over the claim that later developed into the first legally owned piece of property on the site of what was to become the city of Minneapolis, very probably has a right to the honor.

In 1836 Major Plymton, who was the commandant at Fort Snelling, staked out a claim and built a cabin on the east side of the river adjoining St. Anthony Falls. In 1837 Sergeant Carpenter, also from Fort Snelling, staked out a claim on the west side of the river. Neither man had legal claim to the land because at that time the land east of the Mississippi River had not been ceded by the Indians, and the land on the west side of the river was still a part of the Fort Snelling Military Reservation.

In 1838–39 Franklin Steele arrived from Pennsylvania and took a half interest in the Major Plymton claim and he also took over what rights Sergeant Carpenter had to his tract of land. Steele then went to Washington in order to lobby for a bill that proposed to restrict the area of the Fort Snelling Reservation and open the St. Anthony area to settlement. The passage of the bill enabled Steele later to successfully claim legal title to the land. Steele returned to Fort Snelling and St. Anthony from Washington on June 13, 1839, and formally asserted his claim to the land. The ceding of the lands east of the Mississippi to the St. Croix River by the Indians in 1837 gave the basis for legal title to the tract on the east side of the river that Steele had taken over from Major Plymton. Hence it is that the year 1839, marking as it did the date when a settler first got legal title to lands on the site where the city is now located, may be properly recorded as the first permanent settlement.

It was in 1839 also that the first trading post was established on the site of the present Minneapolis. On November 5, 1839, Roswell P. Russell arrived at Fort Snelling with Henry M. Rice. They began immediately to trade with the Indians, settlers, missionaries, and soldiers, and established a post at the falls. Thus they became the first storekeepers of the locality. Henry M. Rice later became prominent in the early affairs of the Minnesota Territory and State. He was chosen a Delegate to Congress and then United States Senator when Minnesota was admitted to the Union. He was also a member of the first board of regents of the University of Minnesota.

In 1834 Samuel and Gideon Pond, natives of Connecticut, arrived at Fort Snelling and prevailed upon the post authorities to permit them to build a house on the shore of Lake Calhoun and do missionary work among the Indians. The house was built on a wooded knoll on the east bank of the lake and in the midst of an Indian village of 20 tepees. The next year, or in 1835, Rev. J. D. Stevens arrived and, assisted by the Pond brothers, built a house on the west shore of Lake Harriet and opened a school for Indian children. Neither of these structures survived to become a part of the settlement, because later when the Indians were removed the missionaries accompanied them and the houses were destroyed and lost.

If one desires to go back to the time when a white man first saw the Falls of St. Anthony, he could select that day in the summer of 1680 when Father Louis Hennepin, Franciscan priest, carved the arms of France on an oak tree that grew on the brink of the falls. This was only 60 years after the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. The intrepid priest had traversed the unbroken wilderness to the future site of Minneapolis and named the tumbling waterfall "St. Anthony," only this comparatively short time after the early colonists reached the Atlantic shore.

Father Hennepin was a member of the La Salle exploring party that had been commissioned by the French King to explore the upper Mississippi River. La Salle remained in the Illinois country and sent Hennepin to complete the exploration. Hennepin ascended the river to a point below Fort Snelling and then abandoned the river to follow an Indian trail to Mille Lacs Lake, then the home of a large band of Indians. The Indians took him prisoner and subjected him to numerous dangers and hardships. On the plea that he wished to go down the river to learn if La Salle had left supplies that he had agreed to leave Hennepin gained permission to leave Mille Lacs. Reaching the Mississippi River from Mille Lacs Lake, he and a few companions traveled down the river until they came to the falls, which he named St. Anthony, and there pitched his camp. He was the first white man to visit the site of Minneapolis.

There is no record of any other white man visiting the falls until 1766, or 86 years later, when Jonathan Carver, of Connecticut, on an exploring expedition journeyed from Mackinaw to Prairie du Chien. He paddled up the river to St. Anthony Falls, arriving there on the 17th of November 1766. In his journal he made an extended reference to the falls describing their beauty and location.

"In the middle of the falls," he wrote, "stands a small island about 40 feet broad and somewhat longer, on which grew a few cragged hemlock and spruce trees, and about halfway between the island and the east shore is a rock lying at the very edge of the falls in an oblique position that appeared to be about 5 or 6 feet broad and 30 or 40 feet long. At a little distance below the falls there is a small island of about an acre and a half, on which grow quite a number of trees.

"The country around the falls is exceedingly beautiful. It is not an uninterrupted plain where the eye finds no relief, but is composed of many gentle rises, which in the summer are covered with the finest verdure, and interspersed with little groves that give a pleasing variety to the prospect. On the whole, when the falls are included, which may be seen at a distance of about 4 miles, a more pleasing and picturesque view, I believe, cannot be found throughout the universe."

Early pictures and drawings of the falls and the views adjacent confirm Jonathan Carver's description of the landscape and the territory which is today the site of Minneapolis, with its beautiful lakes, parks, and boulevards.

At the close of the Revolution that part of Minnesota east of the Mississippi passed from England to the United States. The part west of the Mississippi was Spanish territory but later became French, so in that early day what is now the east side of Minneapolis was a part of the State of Virginia, while across the river on the west side, and where the principal part of the city now is, the land belonged to the French. However, in 1803, as a result of the Louisiana Purchase, the territory west of the river became a part of the United States. The east side of the river remained a part of the State of Virginia until subsequently it became a part of Indiana and then of Wisconsin. The area did not become Minnesota until the Territory of Minnesota was organized in 1848.

Other early visitors to the future city of Minneapolis were Lt. Zebulon Pike, who journeyed up the river in 1805; and Maj. Stephen H. Long, Army engineer, who visited the site and camped on the east side of the river July 16, 1817. On August 24, 1819, Colonel Leavenworth, with two companies of the Fifth Regiment of the United States Infantry, arrived to establish a military post at the mouth of the Minnesota River. In the party were 98 officers and men. Three days later, Colonel Leavenworth and his small party rowed up the river to view the falls. The next spring the fort was located on its present site and was completed in 1821. Colonel Leavenworth named it Fort St. Anthony, the falls at that time being more famous than anything else in the Territory. In 1824, however, Gen. Winfield Scott visited the fort on a tour of inspection and suggested that the name of the fort be changed to "Snelling" in honor of its early commander.

In 1821 soldiers from the fort built a small sawmill on the west bank of the river just below the falls in order to saw out lumber for the fort. Water from the falls furnished the power. In 1823 the mill was fitted up to grind flour. Thus it was that the two industries, lumber and flour, which were to make the name Minneapolis known throughout the world, came to have their beginnings beside the Falls of St. Anthony.

Aside from trappers and half-breed squatters, there were no settlers, however, in the neighborhood of the falls until some dozen or more years later. Settlement was discouraged by reason of the fact the Indians still owned the east side of the river and the Fort Snelling Reservation included the lands on the west side so that title to lands could not be secured.

The Franklin Steele claim, the legality of which was established in 1839, became the first permanent settlement on the present site of the city of Minneapolis. There was not much activity in the neighborhood for about 8 years, or until 1847, when Franklin Steele began the sawmill development that marked the real beginning of the settlement, and when, in 1848, W. A. Cheever platted the town of St. Anthony, which he called St. Anthony City. At that time there were about 300 half-breeds, squatters, and trappers in the neighborhood. Practically all activity was on the east side of the river. Steele established a ferry above the falls in 1847 in order to enable easier access to the west side of the river. At that time there were less than 50 persons who lived on the west side, most of them half-breeds. The first bridge over the river was built by Steele 7 years later and was open for traffic in 1855. It was a toll bridge, 25 cents being charged for a wagon and 5 cents for a foot passenger.

It was the Falls of St. Anthony, with its possibility for water power, that of course drew the first settlers and started the first industry. A sawmill was the first structure erected by white men within the limits of present Minneapolis. This was the Government mill built by soldiers from Fort Snelling in 1821. Two years later, or in 1823, the first gristmill was built, also by the soldiers. Neither of these, however, were commercial mills and each operated spasmodically for short periods.

The immense forests to the north offered the raw material for the great sawmills, which began to spring up after Franklin Steele built his mill in 1847. During the next 40 years the larger part of the forest area was converted into lumber in Minneapolis mills. The rivers and streams to the north provided ideal means of transportation. There was hardly a section to the north from which logs could not be brought to the city by water. The Mississippi River also provided an easy and cheap transportation outlet for the finished lumber to the south, and great rafts of sawed timber were regularly floated down the river to St. Louis and other cities.

When Franklin Steele built his commercial sawmill at the falls in 1847, he laid the foundation for the industrial development that was to build a great city. Two years later, in 1849, other men began to arrive whose names are also associated with the early development of the sawmill industry in Minneapolis. Among these sawmill pioneers were Arnold W. Taylor, who arrived from Boston in 1849, Caleb Dorr, Charles Simpson, S. W. Farnham, Loring Lovejoy, Samuel Stanchfield, John Martin, T. B. Walker, H. C. Ackley, W. E. Jones, Jonathan Chase, the Chute brothers, John Rollins, Joseph Dean, Tuttle & Lane, Mayo & Clark, and others.

In 1870 the whole row of sawmills were destroyed by fire. A new dam, 300 feet below the old one, was then constructed and five of the mills rebuilt. Following the completion of these mills on the west side of the river came others erected by Leonard Day, W. E. Jones, Doilus Morrison, W. D. Washburn, and Robinson & Clement. In 1862 Joseph Dean startled the community by purchasing an entire block, bounded by First and Second Avenues, South and First and Second Streets, at a cost of $500 per lot, for use as a lumber yard. In 1866 the Pacific Mill was erected at the foot of First Avenue North. This was the largest and best equipped mill in the city. In 1876 it was sold to Camp & Walker. It was the first successful steam mill.

The story of the sawmill development in Minneapolis is not complete without a reference to Ard Godfrey, who came to the falls in 1847 from the State of Maine to build the first mill for Franklin Steele. He took a prominent part, not only in the building of sawmills but later in the building of flour mills. His home that he built in 1848 is said to be the oldest frame building in Minneapolis. It has now been moved to Richard Chute Square, north of the old Exposition Building, and is occupied by the Hennepin County Territorial Pioneers Association.

The sawmill industry continued for about 50 years, when the depleted forests deprived the mills of their raw material, and they gradually closed down. By the year 1900 the sawmill industry in the city had begun to disappear.

The second great industry that developed here because of the falls and which helped to lay the foundation for the city's greatness was the flour-milling industry. This industry differed from the sawmill industry because it grew as the Northwest developed. As the farms opened, a market for wheat became necessary and the flour mills of the city supplied the market. Some of the men famous in the early history of Minneapolis are the men who established the city's flour-mill industry.

The old Government flour mill was purchased in 1849 by Robert Smith, of Illinois, who remodeled it. In 1879 this mill was razed to provide the location for the Northwestern Flour Mill. Two years after Robert Smith bought the Government mill Richard Rogers built the first commercial grist mill. It was located between First and Second Avenues SE. This mill was powered from the Steele-Godfrey dam that had been built 3 years earlier. In 1852 Rogers formed a partnership with Steele and enlarged the mill. In 1858 Ard Godfrey built a flour mill at the junction of Minnehaha Creek and the Mississippi.

According to a study of the development of the flour-milling industry in Minneapolis made by the Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association in 1930, the year 1854 marked the beginning of the real development of the industry. Before that time mills had been combination affairs—part sawmill and part grist mill. In 1854 John W. Eastman, Capt. John Rollins, and R. P. Upton built a $16,000 mill devoted exclusively to the manufacture of flour, and in 1858 this mill shipped the first consignment of flour from Minneapolis to eastern cities. In 1863 the mill was rebuilt, and its name was changed to the Island Mill. It was destroyed by fire in 1872.

From this date the industry developed rapidly, and men came to be identified with it who later made the industry famous throughout the world. These men included George H. Christian, Charles H. Pillsbury, John S. Pillsbury, Cadwallader C. Washburn, James S. Bell, and John Crosby, and others. In 1876 Minneapolis had 18 flour mills. The industry continued to increase until it made Minneapolis a world center for flour milling.

America's Destiny

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

[From the New York Daily News Record of September 7, 1939]

AMERICA'S DESTINY

Again the tocsin of war resounds in Europe. Once more a resort to arms startles the world. America stands aghast at the fearful consequences which must follow a recourse to the most primitive method of disposing of international problems. Whether the impending carnage was precipitated by lust of conquest on the part of the dictatorships or was the outcome of the determination on the part of the so-called democratic powers to maintain the status quo in Europe—every American is entitled to his own individual opinion. As a nation we should proclaim none. It is not our quarrel. We have no part in European intrigues to maintain or to upset the balance of power. We have no place in imperialistic embroilments.

Armed intervention on our part could not end imperialistic aims abroad, nor stamp out the greed of gain and lust for power which perennially agitate Europe. America's role must be that of peacemaker—not participant.

Nevertheless, the old shibboleth * * * "A war to end war"—"To safeguard democracy"—"To save civilization" * * * will ring through our land again, as alien propagandists and reckless politicians strive to ensnare us in the web of international involvement.

As a peace-loving Nation we desire to see an end to war; but we know that it will not be eliminated by force of arms. Conquest breeds animosity, and the spawn of hate is violence. There can be no peace—no lasting order—until the older nations of embattled Europe learn that "They who live by the sword shall perish by the sword."

The American people do not want war, or the spoils of war, and they must not be dragged in either by accident or design. America can and should work for the restoration of peace, a peace based on equity as well as legality, but she can assume the role of peace maker only so long as she is nonpartisan. Hence, any course other than strict neutrality would be fatal.

America's destiny lies within America. She must be free to work out her own destiny. By solving her pressing social and economic problems and by affording to all her citizens an opportunity to share in the blessings which peace and prosperity bestow, America can set an example of tranquillity and progress that may yet serve as a guide to a war-weary Old World.

Let America work out her destiny in peace.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BERGEN EVENING RECORD OF HACKENSACK, N. J.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bergen Evening Record, of Hackensack, N. J.:

[From the Bergen Evening Record, of Hackensack, N. J., September 27, 1939]

JUST WHAT IS THIS NEUTRALITY?

Probably 90 percent of the American people and possibly 99 percent of both Houses of Congress have a sincere desire to keep this Nation from involving itself in the current Armageddon between Europe's holy havers and unholy grabbers. Most of them realize, as do all history students, that the second world war will not permanently settle the economic pressures and the national hatreds of that blood-soaked continent any more than did the first.

Psychologically nearly all Americans hate dictatorships—Nazi, Fascist, Communist, or Japanese alike. Americans believe in the orderly processes of law and that right is might. Many of them have learned to complement their national altruism with international realism. As a result, they believe that even the victors of the current to-have-and-to-hold holocaust in Europe will be bled white in men, materials, and money when it has reached its history-making and devastating conclusion. Experience compels the conviction that Britain and France under such conditions are unsound international credit risks. That experience was gained 22 years ago when our idealistic emotionalism, set aflame by British-French propaganda, plunged us into a foreign partnership to make the world safe for democracy.

Although the partnership was victorious, it failed to entrench democracy because the two European partners subordinated sane American altruism to greedy European realism. They got rid of a fearsome Kaiser, they expanded their empires, and they hamstrung 60,000,000 hopeless and leaderless people. These hapless 60,000,000, seeking for 15 years a savior, got one 5 years ago in madman Hitler. Now he and they confront our former partners with a grave situation which means dismemberment if they lose the war and bankruptcy if they win it. In 2 short decades the losers have risen from national despair to glory while the winners have fallen from national glory to despair.

Thus European history is again being written on the sands in blood, and America 3,000 miles away is taking an inventory of itself. Experience dictates its course this time, and its name is neutrality to the bitter end. Whether an arms embargo or a cash-and-carry plan is the more neutral will be extensively debated in Congress. The best definition of neutrality is: To lend no active aid to either or any belligerent. Granting long-term credits to any of them might violate our neutrality by giving us a direct interest in the debtor's future success and solvency, but this is prohibited by existing law against defaulting debtors, among which are Britain and France. If loopholes exist, they should promptly be plugged tightly.

If the existing embargo law on munitions is retained it must logically be expanded to include practically everything grown or manufactured here. Munitions are a vital concomitant of war, but so are the foodstuffs which nourish the soldiers in the lines and keep up the morale of the peoples behind them. So also are all the necessities that keep bodies warm and fit for fighting and working. If our embargo law was designed to prevent a European war, it has proved to be a failure. It should therefore be repealed in its present form, or it should be amended to prohibit the sale of anything and everything by citizens of the United States to belligerents anywhere.

The alternative is a cash-and-carry law containing every possible safeguard to prevent our involvement on either side. The sale and delivery in the United States of our products to any belligerent who wants to buy, pay cash, and carry home his property cannot be considered unneutral, provided all belligerents have the same opportunity here to buy, pay, and carry at their own risk. Such a policy would doubtless benefit Britain and France, which control the Atlantic, against Germany and benefit Japan, which controls the Pacific, against China. The evidence of its impartiality lies, however, in the fact that while private American sympathies are preponderantly with Britain and France in Europe they are just as strong for China in Asia.

Our grave question is whether such a plan would ultimately involve us in a foreign war. Directly the sale of American merchandise and its delivery to foreign ships in American ports to be transported overseas at the purchaser's risk should not involve us. It would help us keep out if all Americans were forbidden to sail as either passengers or crew on vessels of belligerents, and it would also help if all American ships were forbidden to carry supplies directly or indirectly consigned to belligerents either in or out of war zones.

In the last analysis, it's not what Americans do here that will get us into or keep us out of the war. It's what Americans think here that will get us in or keep us out. If they permit themselves once more to be deluded by clever propaganda from without and, more dangerously still, from within, they'll get in. But if they'll stop to think that American involvement means immediate regimentation of all men and machines throughout the land they'll think harder; and, if they'll reason it out to a logical conclusion, they'll realize that national regimentation means national dictatorship, sugar-coated at the start as for the duration of the war. After that dictatorship and regimentation may be deemed desirable or be enforced during a post-war reconstruction period of unlimited duration. Then the deluded Americans who wanted to travel a military road to glory may well exclaim: "O war, where is thy victory; O victory, where are thy profits; O Constitution, where are our liberties?"

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON, SEPTEMBER 27, 1939

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, although there is unanimity that this country should remain out of the European war, there is a difference of opinion regarding how this may best be accomplished. Many support the arms embargo, while others contend we should repeal the embargo and aid Great Britain and France, thus obviating the likelihood that we shall be called upon to furnish manpower later.

In such a crisis it is regrettable that so many Americans distort their vision. We cannot be neutral and yet take sides in this conflict. If we believe that Britain and France are fighting our war, and if we have a direct interest in the outcome of century-old fueds and boundary quarrels, then we should not deceive ourselves, but should permit our personal sympathies to influence the policies of our country. We cannot be partly in and partly out of this war. If it is our war, we should get in immediately; but if it is not our war, then we should do everything to preserve our neutrality and prevent involvement of this country in the conflict.

During the past quarter century the United States has had some experiences in world affairs and therefore should have a realistic background from which to approach the present war. Surely an impartial review of past events will serve to forewarn us regarding foreign policies now and help avoid a repetition of costly mistakes.

Therefore I direct your attention to the address delivered by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson before the Twenty-first Annual National Convention of the American Legion, at Chicago, Ill., on September 27, 1939, which follows:

I am proud to be invited here by my comrades, ex-makers of the world safe for democracy, ex-warriors to end all war. Proud, but timid, too. I'm the guy who ballyhooed just under 2,000,000 of you into uniform to fight the holy war. It was my job to play that tune. Please don't shoot the professor.

Well, we all have an alibi. Twenty-two years ago and we were very young. We have learned a lot—or have we?

It was a magnificent adventure. We flocked to the colors "to grind every selfish dominion into dust." No war of conquest. We sought no territory, not a dollar of tribute. We were not fighting the German people—only their dictatorial leaders. The only difference between Hitler and the Kaiser is the droop of the drawers and the cut of the mustache. We were out to abolish all former diplomatic games of seven-toed Pete with deuces wild. Our boys died for "open covenants openly arrived at" to abolish the enslavement of peoples to either conquerors or domestic tyrants. We were for self-determination—no more international shotgun weddings.

With smiles and smirks our associates accepted our childish enthusiasms—while they took our money and our lives. We were the world's prize fat boy with the bag of candy among a horde of hungry urchins. We have been so ever since. As Will Rogers used to say, "We never lost a war or won a conference." And with Texas Guinan's greeting I salute us all—"Hello, suckers!"

Who won the war—beside the M. P.'s? We never said we did. But nobody can ever deny this—without us the Allies were licked. Or this—with no thought of our own present or future interest we denied no Allied request. We gave everything. We omitted nothing. No nation ever went so trustingly and generously to battle for the Lord.

When the Allies were busted we simply opened our Treasury. Though they at first scorned our arms when the pinch came, at their desperate prayer we sent them "men in their undershirts"—boys untrained and unready—until we had more men in France than the British ever had. When they were starving we rationed our people to give them food, without which, as they have admitted, they never could have held. When submarines wrecked their shipping we almost ruined ourselves to replace it. When their raw materials failed we supplied them fully. We withheld nothing. We did all this in time to turn certain defeat into accomplished victory.

What did it cost us? In dollars, forty billions. Skip it. Such boxcar figures reach so far toward the infinite that we can't understand. We paid a good half of the whole Allied cost of the war. Yet it was astronomical chicken feed to the real cost—10 years of terrible depression, $200,000,000,000 of lost income and production.

It has loaded our future with debt and taxes that chain our young generations like slaves to the oars of a Roman galley. You and I received this bright heritage of America from our fathers unmortgaged and free—a place where every man in the sweat of his labor could earn a reasonable living. That's the way we got it. We gambled it for Europe. We are passing along a wreck of it to our children. Rich or poor, they must pay 20 percent of all they make for our blunder, and the field of opportunity has been reduced one-third. That's what we paid for our last blunder, and we are not through paying yet.

What did we get for that deadly price? We were told we were going to get "international decency." Boy, look at the damn thing!

Of material things—territory and tribute—we got just what we asked—precisely nothing. We were fighting for treasures of the heart.

"Open covenants, openly arrived at"? At the very moment that we marched, secret treaties had promised to deliver conquered nations captive.

"No conquests"? Our associates partitioned the world.

"No tributes"? Under the guise of fantastical "reparations," tributes enslaving generations and paralyzing the trade of the world were laid upon the conquered.

"War to end war"? The seeds were then sown of the "red" horror that now threatens the world.

"A world safe for democracy"? Except here and in a very few places in this hemisphere democracy is dead.

Not a vestige of our aims remains to reward us for all our sacrifice. We were bamboozled in the beginning and defrauded in the end. Faith in the promises of nations seems vanished from the earth. No pot can call any kettle black. Poland and Czechoslovakia will as bitterly accuse Britain and France of double-crossing and running out as they will accuse Germany and Russia. They two-timed us on the debts and threw us a curve on the post-war peace pacts—especially in Manchuria. Nice people! Every principle for which we went to war is a mouthful of dust and burned out ashes.

Well, have we learned anything? I am not so sure. Nobody wants war but we hear that we can't keep out—can't avoid doing it all over again with the same associates. The Book of Proverbs says: "As a dog returneth to its vomit so doth a fool to his folly!" Venture the welfare of this peaceful, honest, square-shooting people again into that welching, double-crossing betrayal. It sounds absurd and impossible. But are we surely foolproof against our own folly? Who says we can't keep out if we want to—and why? This fatalistic dogmatic opinion is almost as dangerous as an outright demand to get in. It relieves our very Government of effort to the uttermost to keep us out to the end. For if it be true that we can't keep out anyway, how can anybody be blamed for getting us in tomorrow—or next month—or next year? Indeed, as professional soldiers, we know that if it were certain truth that we could not keep out in the end it would be better to get in now. It would be better to gear the tremendous engine of destruction of an armed and mobilized America to its highest efficiency beginning immediately.

But we don't need to make a second fool's sacrifice. We can keep out. As Morton Downey says—England and France have. The argument is that, with the British Navy and the French Army defeated or weakened, we will be the next victim. That doesn't add up to make sense. If the war should stop tomorrow or with any outcome foreseeable in the next 2 years, we should still have the British and French Empires between us and the brutalitarian states. On the other hand, if the belligerents are fools enough to fight it out to a finish, both will be so exhausted that neither would dare take us on for a generation.

Apart from the utter destruction of long-drawn modern war is the fact that even conquering nations cannot spread themselves too thin or digest too much. Every one of Hitler's recent conquests have weakened him by presenting problems of territorial organization and the digestion of rebellious and alien peoples. Even in his joint venture with Russia, he has simply gone to bed with another murderer. Neither of those political gorillas dares to go to sleep with his thumb in the other guy's mouth. Even a victorious Hitler can't straddle the Atlantic.

No, the war in Europe reduces the danger to the Americas. It is absurd to say: "We can't keep out." And yet, it would be equally absurd to say: "We can't get in."

In one set of circumstances we can be drawn in. Nations have affronted us only when they thought we were weak or wouldn't fight. There is one absolute necessity in keeping out. We must become so strong in the air, on the sea, and the land that no nation dare attack us in this hemisphere.

It is a fashion to say that air force has dwindled our bulwarks of thousands of miles of sea water. That is plain nonsense. We are exposed to greater dangers of raid but as long as those oceans remain and we command the seas and adequately prepare on land, no nations can threaten us with armies. It is armies alone that can destroy nations.

The bulwarks are there, and we can defend them. But they must be armed and manned. We have not done that yet. Our Navy is as strong as it was in 1918. But the country does not know the half of the pitiful state of the armament and equipment of our Army. It has almost no modern equipment and no reserves. It is in no sense ready to keep us out of war.

This is alarming. Here in the Americas are prizes richer for busted piratical nations than any galleon that ever sailed the Spanish Main. We can defend them. But we must prepare to defend them—and we are not prepared. Why haven't we done so?

That takes us right back to the argument that we can't keep out of this war because we must keep the British Navy and French Army between us and the dictators. In other words, we depend in part on them to defend the Americas—and so have remained weak ourselves.

But in this double-crossing, treaty-breaking world, how can we rely on any nation to defend our interests—even Britain and France? What happened to our reliance on them to support the highest ideals for which you fought twenty-odd years ago?

Every promise stands repudiated or broken. Czechoslovakia and Poland relied on them. Where are those nations now? In this treacherous modern world we can't stake our country in reliance on anybody but the strength of our own right arm and the unity and common purpose of our own people—armed and prepared not merely to keep America out of war but to keep war out of the Americas.

The argument that we can't keep out says that we must get in to destroy dictatorships. We are a democracy—almost the last one left. If we get in there would be more dictatorships than democracies on our side. One thing is certain sure—if we take arms in this war, good-bye democracy here—Kathleen Mavourneen—"it may be for years and it may be forever."

Look at our neighbor Canada today. Magna carta is in the ash-can and the Bill of Rights is out the window. You have to do that in war today. We did some of it in 1918. But Woodrow Wilson so hated centralized power that he gave up most of his war powers the day after the Armistice. This administration also has had emergency powers. So far as I can recall it never willingly gave up one. On the contrary, its policy has been constantly increased centralization of power not merely in a Federal Government but in a Federal governor. If we go to war, we must not lose our democracy, but it is a fair bet that George Washington wouldn't be able to recognize it at the end. First to hear that to keep out of war we must get into it. This argument is equally absurd—to keep our democracy we must give it up. Are we going haywire on any such cockeyed muddy thinking as that?

There is an even worse threat to democracy here. We entered the World War with trifling debt and taxes. We have multiplied debt 40 times and increased taxes to the breaking point. It is that which has hindered our prosperity and made living hard. If we go into a new war, we will double those already unbearable burdens—or worse. Neither our political nor our economic systems can stand the shock. Governments and property rights only exist so that people can work in safety. When any such systems become so hard to bear that people can't stand them, they go down, and they should go down. Signing a declaration in this war will be signing a death sentence to democracy and to everything that we have known and loved as American.

We shall find our way though. We shall, because we will stick to the fundamental principles of Americanism that made this country great. We will retain our forms of democratic government. We will keep out of European quarrels and entanglements. We will defend our own and remain strong enough to do so. Treating both sides at war with cold impartiality, we will rely on nobody but ourselves.

We want the world to know that while we bitterly deplore the destruction of everything we sacrificed and fought for in 1918, we recognize that both sides were in part guilty of that destruction. We hold it against neither. But that experience left us somewhat like the mouse in the cheese-baited trap—we don't want any more cheese.

They must fight their own battles—with this single warning: If they bring that fight westward to threaten us on our own shores, we shall rise, as we rose in 1918, with all the power and the majesty of the strongest nation on earth, to send them howling home.

The Moral Basis of Neutrality

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

SERMON BY REV. EDWARD W. STIMSON, PASTOR OF THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF SIOUX CITY, IOWA

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein a sermon preached at the First Presbyterian Church in Sioux City, Iowa, by its pastor, Rev. Edward W. Stimson. This is one of the finest contributions to the present neutrality discussion that I have yet seen or heard.

THE MORAL BASIS FOR NEUTRALITY

Mark 3: 23: "How can Satan cast out Satan?"

Ever since the appalling news came over the radio that Europe was again at war, the chief question in the minds of most Americans has been "How can we keep out of it?" How can we maintain our neutrality? President Roosevelt has said that he believes we can remain neutral, and has promised that he and the State Department will do everything they can to keep us so. Just now we are asking ourselves, What is the strongest and most adequate basis on which we can maintain our neutral position?

AMERICA'S OWN INTERESTS

Of course, one currently popular appeal is being made on the basis of national self-interest. The European war is not our business. Mere shrewdness should make us determined to keep out of it. Why should we send our boys to fight Europe's battles? Why should we waste our resources again in the futile attempt to settle the perennial quarrel of European power politics? We have plenty of experience to draw upon still fresh from 20 years ago. We lost 130,000 lives in action, many more from secondary causes, and got nothing for it, not even thanks in the end, but only criticism for not joining in sooner. The billions of dollars it cost us will never be repaid. We ruined our western plains, foolishly plowing them up to furnish war-boom wheat, and now have the Dust Bowl to remind us of our folly. The prosperity we temporarily enjoyed was mainly for a few profiteers, while in the end our national losses were permanent. We had loaned billions to feed the armies of Europe and make possible the profits from war trade, and since we could not collect the loans we really gave it all away. How can we be so foolish as to want to do it all over again? On the basis of American national interest, we should stay out, not only of the fighting, but also out of war-supplies business. If they couldn't pay last time, how can we expect they will be able to do it again?

But this sensible national self-interest argument will not sound so good to certain individuals and corporations who see an opportunity for immediate personal profit. There are plenty of people who will clamor for the chance to make quick money out of war trade again. Already now there is agitation to change the neutrality bill, which was written with the deliberate purpose of keeping our business from becoming involved in just the kind of war boom which many are now anticipating so eagerly. Plausible as the national self-interest basis for neutrality is, I doubt that it will be a sufficient argument. Self-interest becomes confused when ultimate national interest and immediate prospects of business prosperity are at odds.

MORAL CONSIDERATIONS INESCAPABLE

Meanwhile, economic interest is not all determining where the passions and enthusiasms of the American people are involved. We are fundamentally an idealistic people. We have a tradition of willingness to help whomever we consider to be the under dog. When our passions become aroused we do not ask about our national self-interest. We are willing to risk any price to make the world safe for democracy, to stop the lawless aggressors, etc.

In the present war, as the European propaganda machines get going, the appeal will inevitably be to our idealism. They know that we cannot let mere national self-interest control our actions where we can be persuaded that great moral issues are involved. Our very Christianity, with its emphasis upon unselfish brotherhood, will not let us draw our skirts about us and pass by on the other side. It was Cain who said to God, "Am I my brother's keeper?" and the implication was that he should have cared about his brother. Christianity does not encourage moral neutrality when a true moral issue challenges Christians to take sides.

We are fond of quoting such verses as:

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side."

And rightly so when we can be sure that there is clearly a good side and an evil side. The propagandists of the nations at war know that we are prone to such idealism, and will certainly seek to use that knowledge to the uttermost to persuade us that there is a clear moral issue involved, and that it is our moral duty to join them. We shall again hear the argument, "Would you stand by and let a big bully beat up on your little brother?" We shall again be propagandized to feel that we are slackers for staying out of a great moral crusade.

Therefore, right now, before we have had time to be swamped with hysteria, and to take a strongly partisan stand, we should ask ourselves, What is the true moral situation in this war, and does it justify our staying out of it when our great might and abundant resources would mean so much in determining the war's outcome? What is the moral basis for neutrality?

We can ask the question now because practically all of the relevant facts are already in our possession. Of course, now that war is going on, there will be more and more accounts of horrors and atrocities to stir our emotions. There will be frightful acts committed by both sides. That is modern war for whoever engages in it. But the acts of the nations which have precipitated the war, while there was yet a chance to keep peace, when moral judgment might have been exercised, are now already history, and the question of moral blame, if it is to be used to stir our partisan feelings, can now be decided.

Frankly, I believe that we are morally justified in remaining neutral. From a Christian standpoint I must declare that it is morally imperative that we remain neutral. There is no true argument that should persuade our consciences that it is our duty to enter this war.

To support this contention I would call to your attention this morning two major considerations which I believe we should keep firmly in our minds:

1. There is no clear moral issue of right and wrong in this war in Europe.

2. Our entering into the war on one side cannot further a moral solution of the European problem.

WHO IS MOST TO BLAME?

Let us consider first the relative guilt of the parties involved.

Already the attempt is being made to convince the American public that Germany is solely guilty. We like to take sides in any contest, and our still living sympathies of 21 years ago condition us strongly to favor the allied cause. Have we any right to think of the Germans alone as villains, and of the Allies as righteous defenders of civilization and democracy?

Certainly Adolf Hitler and the others in command of the Third Reich have acted badly. There is no doubt this time that they precipitated the open warfare in Poland, delivered impossible ultimatums to the Polish Government, started troops into Poland when they knew France and Britain were committed to the defense of her territorial integrity, refused to heed the last request of those nations to withdraw the troops from Poland and submit the matter to a conference, and thereby made inevitable the declarations in London and Paris that a state of war existed. Certainly in comparison the acts of the British and French political leaders at the last, trying to forestall the outbreak of hostilities, have been morally far more praiseworthy and commendable.

The moral contrast is not confined to the acts surrounding the actual outbreak of war. The whole policy of the Third Reich under Hitler has been such as to merit moral condemnation. Hitler's government has deliberately turned its back upon Christian virtues, and adopted the cult of predatory militarism. The doctrine in Hitler's book, Mein Kampf, has only one moral meaning—absolute opposition to Christian morality. The persecution of the Jews, the perversion of German education, the onslaught on the Christian Church with the incarceration of men like Neimoller—all of these policies are convincing to us that the Third Reich has been morally impossible. Nothing too bad can be said of Nazi policies, and as you all know, I have not been backward in expressing my opinion of them. Between the general policies of the Nazis and the policies of the British and French democracies there is no moral comparison. I cannot say as much for Poland, since Paderewski was exiled and the present dictatorship established. They, too, have persecuted Jews, stifled liberty, and were not adverse to grabbing a bit of Czechoslovakia last winter. Yet considering the chief warring nations, the moral contrast in recent internal policy is obvious.

But are we justified in letting these obvious facts determine our moral judgment? Is there not a danger that we may oversimplify the issue by concentrating our attention upon the spectacular factors in recent history? I saw a cartoon from the Minneapolis Journal this week which demonstrated this fallacy perfectly. The caption of the cartoon was "Why 10,000,000 men are under arms." The whole cartoon space was blank white, except for one tiny figure—the figure of Adolf Hitler. According to that oversimplification of recent history, Hitler alone is to blame.

Granted that Hitler had the power and position to say the word that started the hostilities. But was Hitler wholly in control of the situation he had helped to create at that fateful moment? The last statement he issued before war began revealed pathetically how much he was by then the victim of circumstances. And while Hitler helped to make those circumstances, it is just as true that other circumstances made Hitler and gave him his power over the German people. In any fair moral appraisal of this war we must go back further than Hitler and his acceptance by the German people to the causes of his rise to power. Who made Adolf Hitler the menace of world peace in 1938 and 1939? Any fair-minded historian knows that it was primarily the work of vindictive, short-sighted Allied leaders, in 1919 at Versailles, and in the following years up until the fall of the German Weimar Republic in 1933.

The question of moral blame may thus be compared to the homely situation which occurs in many a quarrel between children. Every father with small children knows how difficult it is to establish justice once a squabble has begun. You hear loud wails from two angry throats and enter the room to ask who started it this time. With a great show of injured righteousness, the older one sobs, "He hit me first!" Then, if you are a wise parent, you will probably ask, "Well, what did you do to him to make him want to hit you?" Gradually the obscured truth is revealed that the older one has schemed most of the blocks away from the younger, or done some other sly but exasperating deed which caused the younger to finally boil over in desperation. No doubt that the younger hit first; was the physical aggressor. But the older one was just as much to blame. In fact, by repeated persecutions and pesterings the older child has all but ruined the younger one's disposition. You wonder whether parental discipline can distinguish degrees of guilt. You feel like spanking both of them!

Now, it was my special privilege to observe first hand the sly, exasperating provocation of the present European squabble. As you know, I was in Germany as a postgraduate student during those fateful last days of the Weimar Republic. I saw first hand how the Allies were to blame in making Hitler. The Weimar Republic was the child of Versailles and the progressive democratic leadership of post-war Germany. It was the sort of regime which should have commanded the full sympathy and cooperation of the democracies of the world. Ebert Rathenau, Stresemann, Bruening, Curtius, these men were idealists, liberal-minded democrats, internationally minded, peace-loving statesmen. The liberal German reaction against the blundering militarism of the German war leaders put them into power. They led Germany into the League of Nations. Under them Germany observed the letter of the Versailles Treaty—even to having only 100,000 in her standing army, while the Allies themselves never did observe their own promise in that same treaty to disarm.

And how did the Allies help those splendid leaders of the Weimar Republic? Did they encourage the success of that struggling young democracy in Germany? Their encouragement was enforcing with a vengeance the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. With vindictive malice they continued the cold war of economic attrition, the terms of which had been laid down by Lloyd George and Clemenceau. At Versailles Germany had been made to agree to pay pounds of flesh from year to year. A highly industrialized nation, dependent for her economic life upon getting raw materials abroad and selling manufactures in exchange, Germany was isolated. Most of her trade had been southeast down the Danube. In that path were erected little independent states tributary to France for support, states which ran up high tariff barriers, blockading the trade route. Germany's ships had been taken away from her, her Rhine made an international stream. With prostrate industry, she was forced to pay reparations. We were blamed for that because the Allies said they had to collect from Germany to pay us.

The German people suffered. We made fun when German marks became worthless, and papered walls with them. German mothers dropped fainting of hunger in the streets during the inflation; their children were tortured with rickets. Some relief had to be given, and the Young plan and the Dawes plan eased the tension for awhile. But with the world crash of 1929 things became worse again. The Germans pled for a customs union with Austria, to open the southeast avenue of trade, and were refused. Breuning went to Paris and got down on his knees to Minister Laval, pleading for some mercy that the democracy might be maintained, but Laval shrugged his shoulders and turned a deaf ear. That pitiful episode is well told in Pierre Van Paasen's Days of Our Years. There were 6,000,000 unemployed in Germany, and a food shortage. When we have unemployed in overproducing America we can feed them. Germans were going hungry again. Relief was inadequate. Poor students lived largely on potatoes. I know, for I ate with them in the Studentenheim Mensa—suppers of potatoes. There was a wave of student suicides sweeping over Germany. I attended an advanced seminar in economics with Professor Ropke on the subject of The Economic Crisis. He was a member of the circle of economic advisers of the government, and made frequent trips to Berlin for conference. Then he would come back and tell us how badly Germany's finances were tottering.

The following quotation from my own notebook, written in Germany in 1931, tells the story:

"One cannot live long in Germany without feeling the tensity, the pressure, and the strain of the economic-political situation. German reparations and Hitlerism may seem distant and merely mildly interesting from across the sea, but here they are ever present in thought. University courses are given on the reparations problem and the Versailles Treaty. The most eagerly attended history courses deal with the period just before and after the war. People take their membership in political parties very seriously.

"Germany is being goaded to desperation by the reparations problem. She is paying, but she is selling her industries to American capitalists and letting needed replacements in machinery and railway rolling stock go to do it. Taxation is grievous. The economic crisis in Germany is not due primarily to capitalistic overproduction as in America. Here it is the paralyzation of economy under a staggering load.

"And, worst of all, Germans feel that the load is unjust. They know that the harsh measures of the 'Versailles Dictat,' as the Germans insist on calling it, were meted out upon the supposition of Germany's sole guilt and culpability for the war. This assumption has been admitted by historians in all nations to be false, and a mere postwar hysterical rationalization of vindictive measures, resulting in what is not really reparations but exaction of tribute. Of course, war is not just, and one can hardly plead that justice should come from it. Yet now that passions have had time to cool one might expect a revision.

"The grievous burden is producing political consequences in Germany that may well be viewed with alarm from outside. Germany is split into a dozen or more political parties. Fortunately, since the war, the Social Democrats, with a policy of international cooperation, have been in control. Lately, especially in September 1930, their control has been threatened. They are faced on the one hand by Nazis, who demand noncooperation and refusal to pay reparations; on the other by Communists, who see in Russia's revolution and repudiation of all debts of the former Czarist government a way out of Germany's troubles.

"At a recent meeting of German and American students here we discussed the reparations problem. A German student speaking for the younger generation, claimed that German young people of a generation that had nothing to do with the war could not be expected to spend their lives paying between 4 and 6 marks apiece each month in tribute to foreign countries. They do not understand why they must. They did not contract the debt. They have seen on historical grounds that the assumptions behind its levy are false. If things are not changed by the Allied nations, one cannot but expect revolt within Germany. And if such a party as the Hitlerites gained power, the result would be upsetting not only for Germany but for the whole of Europe.

"All of these observations leave no room for a facile optimism about the condition of Germany or the future peace of Europe. Peace may be maintained, but it will take more wisdom than is at present being used. Germany seems to be drifting onto the rocks. There is danger of either fascism or bolshevism."

It took no great prophet to see these things in Germany in 1931. In desperation the German people were clutching at straws. They developed an attitude that nothing could be worse, so they trusted their fate to a loud-mouthed political adventurer who made big promises. The policy of the Allies in their continued war of economic attrition goaded them to it. Then who is to blame that Hitler gained power in Germany and has led Europe into war?

My point is not to absolve Germany or Hitler, but to prove that the Allies are also guilty. This present war is just another episode in the age-long struggle of power diplomacy between the imperial states of Europe. They have all been in the same game for centuries. To extoll morality on either side is ridiculous. There is no moral issue at the bottom of this war—only a sordid contest for wealth and power. Therefore, we cannot take moral sides. Morally, the only answer is neutrality.

WHAT COULD INTERVENTION ACCOMPLISH?

The final consideration is the futility of our ever expecting to achieve an idealistic moral good if we did go into the war. Even if we decided one side was sufficiently more right than the other to warrant our going in to set Europe at rights, we could do little good when once the war would be over.

Here I would cite the wisdom of Jesus in our text. "How can Satan cast out Satan?" How can the adoption by us of the same evil military methods European nations are now using do anything morally helpful to stop the use of those methods in Europe? It is war itself that is evil. If we enter it we shall ourselves become no better than they. They are bombing civilians; so should we. They are using poison gas; so should we. They are training their young men to the brutality of modern fighting; so should we have to train our young men. In seeking to cast Satan out of Europe, America would become satanic, too. If democracy is lost in Europe, so will it be lost here, too, the moment "M Day" comes. And at long last, if we did win some kind of a victory, what good could we make of it? Wilson had no success at Versailles. Could we expect to really set up a just settlement of affairs in Europe, and establish a new set of democracies there? To ask the question is enough. In the struggle of political ideologies, military force is not the weapon of democracy, but of dictatorship. Democracy must be the willing choice of free peoples. If we expect to be able ever to help Europe establish a just peace and return to democracy we had best stay out of her squabble. Then, when they finally decide over there that the way of militarism is futile, we can go with some moral authority to help them find the way.

The moral basis for neutrality is clear.

There is no moral issue in this war that demands our support and makes our going in a conscientious necessity.

If we did go in we could only confuse the issue still further in Europe, and rob ourselves of the right to say the helpful word we may say toward the making of a just peace in the Europe of the future. There is enough satanic rottenness in this mess already. Over there they are tarred with the same stick. We dare not hope to do any good by becoming like them. "How can Satan cast out Satan?"

America Must Not Become Involved in This War

OF

HON. NEWT V. MILLS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1937, approximately 2 months after I took the oath of office as a new Member of this body, I appeared on this floor in interest of a peace joint resolution, after having been prompted by an honest desire to do something effective toward achieving universal peace. I took that responsibility hoping the Members of Congress would have the courage to face the issue and be induced to carry the fight to a successful conclusion; however, little was said in Congress, but throughout the continental United States peace-loving people caught the significance of the peace resolution I had offered and began to offer their approval and endorsements. However, international events have so occurred that today we are confronted with a very complex international crisis, that if not properly handled will plunge this great people into another European conflict to which every American citizen is opposed, as permanent peace burns in every human breast.

DO NOT ACCEPT ANY REASON FOR WAR

Nothing will ruin the country if the people themselves will undertake its safety and nothing can save it if they leave that safety in any hands but their own; however, I am most anxious to point out at this time reasons advocated by certain groups for war, but none will suffice save to keep this country free and preserve the traditions of our sacred institutions of home, school, and church and diregard misguided forces that are trying to take us along the same path that Europe is presently traveling and that path, history shows, led to the World War.

The theologian might call war the punishment for the sins and transgressions of men.

The radical might explain it as the inevitable outcome of the struggle for international markets by a capitalistic people.

The economist might explain it as the result of an impossible adjustment in the economic relationships of mankind.

The editorial writer might blame war due to international dealers in armaments.

The politician might explain it as the necessity to quell those who have a desire for power.

The psychologist might explain it as the triumph of the death instinct over the instinct of love.

The philosopher might tell us that war is an expression of man's passage through space and time, of no greater or no less significance than the life histories of other species that have now vanished from this earth. It is a thing, they might say, that we can no more control than we can control the passage of the earth through space.

Whatever might be the cause of war, it does indeed seem that it is the start of a dizzy ride toward inevitable destruction; and it cannot be denied the same selfish reasons of greed and hate are responsible for the present catastrophe.

PEACE OR WAR?

Mr. Speaker, the greatest number of inhabitants of the earth do not want war but peace. Given their choice and the chance to express that choice, they would vote solidly against war; therefore, the issue before the world today is peace or war. The heart of America is pleading for peace in a world that has been set on fire with the spirit of malice and hatred. The Constitution is our surest bulwark of peace. We seek for ourselves under the Constitution a continuation of the free expression of opinion which is now possible in this country as in no other in the world. We desire the right to say frankly and fully that we do not want war. As Americans we are seeking in every possible way to keep our country free from war, and it is well that we remind ourselves of the glorious principles of toleration and balanced government which are set forth in this document. For these are the principles which have constituted the abiding protection for liberty and the rights of minority groups in our land, permitting them to live peaceably here without surrendering their right as free citizens to differ with their neighbors according to their individual conscience.

The liberty we so greatly prize finds its roots in the free conscience of each individual citizen. Our liberty is safeguarded in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. Against it in the past have come in vain all the forces of mass greed and oppression which have sought to subject the individual to the domination of the all-powerful state; however, united in prayer we stand for liberty and peace against war.

DREADFUL COST

Mr. Speaker, I hate war. Millions have marched behind the banner, never to return to see loved ones again, and we all recognize men will be destroyed by present warfare methods probably 10 times as fast as during the World War.

Well may we remember the forgotten statistics of the World War when 74,000,000 men were mobilized, 10,000,000 killed, 3,000,000 maimed, 19,000,000 wounded, 10,000,000 disabled or incapacitated for the balance of their lives, 9,000,000 orphans, 5,000,000 widows. Fathers returned to find homes and property destroyed, mothers and children passed on to the beyond while they were away, never to see them again, and in a dying hour children crying to see their dad once more. Sherman said, "War is hell"; however, war is a disastrous catastrophe that pushes men's souls out into eternity.

PRICE OF PARTICIPATION

Mr. Speaker, industrial and agricultural production for a war market gives immense fortune to a few, but for a nation as a whole it produces disaster, indebtedness, destroys common understanding of peace that we all so well cherish, and not only results in loss of property and lives but destroys the very foundation of democracy, which guarantees life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all men and in return supplants dictatorial government with vast amount of feudalism following, which results in many years of trial and error to rebuild the losses sustained in the pestilence that follow. It intensifies human hatreds. It settles no problems. It weakens all participants. It destroys the foundations of civilization. War, being the complete triumph of force over reason, cannot be expected to give us other than a world that is ruled by force.

War helps to create a gulf between the well-to-do and the poor, inasmuch as history has proven that the poor bear the burden of taxation and the ill-gained wealth of war accumulates in the hands of a few. As a result a drainage system is created whereby the poor are forced to work longer hours and for smaller wages, being undernourished, to help meet the financial burdens whereby the rich benefit from the laborer and taxpayer indirectly inasmuch as the rich reap interest from money loaned to the government and the taxpayer pays the bills.

Too, war breeds prejudice against the opposing nation which continues to exist after the war is ended; and when an indifference exists between nations, the honesty of that nation is distrusted and, with the same result breaks down the common understanding of business, which in turn is crippled, bringing about unemployment, resulting in a financial depression, which has very well been proven in history that after each war follows a depression.

Not only do economic conditions become impaired but social unrest usually breeds in the minds of the people, that cost the government invariably billions of dollars usually spent in ways that will not in return be collected but instead a loss to the government.

DOOM OF CIVILIZATION

Contrary to the law of Almighty God and fundamental principles of humanity and reason, which solemnly affirm that nations, as well as individuals, should live in peace one with the other, the world today presents a picture wherein each nation is striving its utmost to outdo its neighbor in preparing for war, and I would have you to know the cost of war is almost beyond figures; therefore, huge sums of money which could best be used in the relief of suffering, in the advancement of industrial progress and science, and which represents a staggering burden of taxation on all people, have been voted and are being spent to increase navies and air forces, equip armies with every conceivable weapon of destruction, and to construct fortifications, all of which constitute a menace to the peace of the world and to the lives of every man, woman, and child, threatening the very foundation of the social structure, and must inevitably result in the degeneration of the human race, unless every precaution is exercised, and I hold whether it is a long or short war in Europe, it will be followed by a profound economic disorder and perhaps an economic collapse and the result of this European war will prove as all other wars, the more we rely on war business to help us, the more serious will be the economic dislocation in this country when that war business stops, and if war is to continue every 20 to 25 years, as in the past, a far more reaching disaster will befall the world than an economic disorder as civilization will be doomed under the present warfare methods.

SUREST SAFEGUARD

Sacred traditions are embodied within every heart in hope of retaining peace, whereas dictatorship in other lands rears its head in thirst of slaughtering the old, poor, young, innocent, and helpless, holding "might is right."

Five thousand years of recorded history and the armed civilizations that have perished in the march of time across the centuries have taught us there is no security in the sword. Is there any sure cure for the disease of war? There is a remedy without a relapse, a cure without a crutch, a treaty without a trench as recorded in the Forty-sixth Psalm—

He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire.

THE VISION OF TOMORROW

I am sure we are devoted to the cause of peace, and interested in preserving peace for our country; however, today such interest is not enough unless we enact wise legislation designed to safeguard our Nation in any crisis. We must remember, and every American citizen must remember, that we cannot afford to temporize and postpone taking the proper measures until we stand in danger of being drawn into the present terrible conflict.

Our experience in the last dreadful World War has taught us what to expect. The sympathies of our people will be aroused by every means possible—especially propaganda for the financiers and war lords. There is but one way to fight this dangerous propaganda and that is for every man, woman, and child in this country to remember that we want no part in this European turmoil. It is very true that here in the United States we are vitally interested in our democratic traditions. We are so interested in our liberal traditions that we must not for one single moment risk losing them in the savage European inferno.

Perhaps many will say that worries of this sort are unnecessary and that the European trouble is very remote from us. As I remember, we regarded the war as remote in 1914, and yet in the end we sent American boys to Europe to die horribly.

In any great conflict individuals will have their private sympathies, because that way of life and government which is closest to our own must naturally command our respect and interest. If our own sovereign Nation is ever threatened, then let us fight, and I wager we will have no lack of soldiers for our cause, but until such a time let us retain peace and not send our boys to die on European battlefields, as our first responsibility is to our own people. We have today an awesome responsibility, and let us not for an instant lose sight of it. When the awful battle smoke of Europe has cleared away let us be able to say proudly that we have preserved our national honor by preserving our peace. We have an ideal here in America, and it is an ideal of peace inviolate, and of the progress and prosperity which come with peace.

Today we see great nations in Europe resorting to force as a means of progress, forgetting that few questions are ever really settled by brute force. The people of those countries did not want to fight, any more than our own people want to fight. They were led to conflict by a chain of events and influences which might have been prevented if the people themselves had had great foresight. It is foresight that I am urging today, vision to see the perils that we as a great neutral nation will face and wisdom to meet those dangers judiciously.

Let us proceed with caution in the shaping of any law designed to preserve our neutrality. Let us consider well each clause and phrase of our neutrality measure, remembering well that this one piece of legislation has a vital bearing on the peace and future of our country and the safety of our people.

On the floor of this House we have passed bills granting compensation to those noble veterans who fought so bravely in the last war. I favored those measures, as I believe that our veterans can never be paid; however, I hope and earnestly pray that we will never have veterans of another war disabled, blinded, and crippled.

There can be no mistake more terrible than one which results in loss of human life; yet a mistake on our neutrality legislation might mean the loss of millions of lives, the orphaning of thousands of helpless children, and the wounding and crippling of many soldiers. Yes; the cost of such a mistake would be too great to count, and surely it is within the powers of statesmanship to bring about this compromise and end this growing disunity.

It is disunity among our people that will do far more damage than the political advantages to be gained by either side or party on the subject of neutrality.

Our true obligation is not only the destiny of our own children, but all the children of America who will be set back a hundred years in their opportunities as well as the growth of American life, if we participate in this European war; therefore, democracy and the rose youth of this great land of abundance and liberty rests in keeping America out of this conflict.

I thank you.

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY H. WOODRING, SEPTEMBER 29, 1939

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Hon. Harry H. Woodring, the Secretary of War, September 29, 1939, on the occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the Army of the United States:

In the summer of 1805 there set out from St. Louis, in what was then the Louisiana Territory, an expedition comprising in all 1 officer and 20 soldiers of the Regular Army. Traversing an unknown wilderness, enduring all manner of hardship, encountering and overcoming one perilous natural obstacle after another, this small party explored the headwaters of the Mississippi River, and 9 months later returned to its base. It has been stated of the expedition's leader that "without an educated partner, he acted as astronomer, surveyor, commanding officer, clerk, spy, and guide." In the spring of 1806 this same young Army subaltern, with a military escort of approximately the same size, explored the valley of the Arkansas River, penetrated into what is now the State of Colorado, and then moved southwest into regions over which flew the flag of Spain.

The youthful commanding officer of these two expeditions—surveys which furnished invaluable information to the people of the United States on the vast resources of their recently acquired western domains—was Lt. Zebulon Montgomery Pike. For him towering Pike's Peak in Colorado now is named.

In April 1813 Zebulon Montgomery Pike advanced in rank during the intervening years from lieutenant to brigadier general, led an expedition against York in Canada, the site of the present city of Toronto. He was in command during one of the very few successful land campaigns waged by American forces during the second war for independence. Fatally wounded during the investment of York, General Pike died on the field of battle as that Canadian stronghold fell before the assault of his troops.

To my mind the career of Zebulon Montgomery Pike epitomizes the careers of those who have worn the uniform of this Republic of ours since the establishment of the Army of the United States 150 years ago today.

I speak not as a onetime soldier in the World War's emergency ranks, but as a civilian Secretary of War when I express my deep and my very profound admiration for those soldiers of ours who, at times neglected, at times ignored, at times even derided, dared the vast expanses of the unknown wilderness in peace, and, with equal courage, braved the known dread dangers of battle in war.

These were soldiers "fit to stand by Caesar, and give direction." These were the soldiers who surveyed, located, and constructed the primitive trails and roads which opened to civilization the wilderness that they themselves had first explored. Meriwether Lewis and William Clark—young Army officers—in the early 1800's were leaders of an expedition of less than half a hundred soldiers, guides, and interpreters, who set forth up the Missouri River, moved over the wide rolling prairies of the Midwest, crossed the rugged, forbidding Rockies, and, descending the Snake and Columbia Rivers, reached the western ocean. Traversing and retraversing the country between the Father of Waters and the waters of the Pacific, surveying and mapping as they forced their tortuous way through regions never before beheld by the eyes of white men, they made contributions of inestimable worth to the later development of what is now our great Northwest. Six years later, veterans of this 8,000-mile trek engaged in the campaigns of the War of 1812—as did Zebulon Pike—their souls steeled to meet the perils of war through the hardships undergone during peacetime battles with the forces of Nature.

In 1838 Lt. John Fremont undertook the first of his explorations west of the Mississippi, which were to earn for him the sobriquet of the "Pathfinder." Nine years later the "Pathfinder" was to play a prominent role in the conquest of California during the period of hostilities with Mexico.

Likewise, the muster rolls of the contending forces during the War between the States were replete with the names of officers and soldiers who, in the era following the termination of the War with Mexico, had pioneered in surveying the newly gained territories and in developing the communications of its sparsely settled areas.

The old Cumberland Pike, running from Maryland's panhandle westward to St. Louis on the Mississippi, was a monument to the Army's pioneering construction activities, as were the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Erie Canals. And, as the covered wagons of the first small groups of settlers, as the first stage coaches, as the first commercial caravans slowly moved into the newly opened regions over overland routes located by the blue-clad soldiers, the same blue-clad soldiers afforded the protection essential to the advancing forces of civilization.

The Great Lakes survey was a project allotted to the Army, which also surveyed and marked practically every mile of our international frontiers and many thousands of miles of our State boundaries. Our great transcontinental rail lines were projected by Army personnel. The Baltimore & Ohio, the Boston & Albany, the New York, New Haven & Hartford, the Erie—to name but a few—were among the railways of this country located, constructed, and, in many instances, initially operated under military auspices. Erection of a number of our first lighthouses was a task which devolved upon military personnel, as did completion of the Washington Monument and construction of the Library of Congress, the wings and dome of the Capitol Building, and the Lincoln Memorial, familiar sights to millions of American citizens who have visited the District of Columbia.

Completion of the Panama Canal and the simultaneous eradication of those dread tropical diseases which so ravaged the Isthmus as to thwart completely the French canal enterprise were Army accomplishments.

And let it not be forgotten that for over 100 years there has been entrusted to officers of the Army's Corps of Engineers the development and maintenance of our inland rivers and coastal harbors, and the prosecution of projects which have as their purpose the protection of life and property against the ravages of flood.

For this Army of the United States—throughout the century and a half of its history—"Peace hath had her victories, no less renowned than war."

It was these same agents of peacetime progress who, when the dark clouds of war poured their fury upon the Nation, fought and died under Zebulon Pike before York in 1813, stormed the Rock of Chapuletepec in 1847, defended the stone walls and boulders on the hillsides of Gettysburg in 1863, charged San Juan Hill in 1898, battered at the gates of Peking in 1900, underwent the incredible hardships of the jungle campaigns of the Philippine Insurrection in 1901, and who, in 1918, on the French western front, emerged victorious from combats in which they had been opposed by all the forces of hostile nature and hostile man.

Those soldiers of the past have bequeathed to the soldiers of the present a heritage of loyalty and devotion to duty, continuously manifested throughout the Army's history. Americans may be assured that their land defenders of the present day will assume the responsibilities of the national defense with all the stanchness of purpose—in peace, and, if it is ever fated to come, in war—that characterized the services of their gallant predecessors.

As our Army passes its one hundred fiftieth milestone, a great part of the globe is held in the viselike grasp of Mars. How all encompassing this second world war may eventually become, only the future historian can relate. However, the Government of the United States has determined that insofar as lies within its power, the mailed fist of Mars shall not extend across the oceans to pound upon the Americas. Hence the current precautionary program for strengthening the armaments of our protective forces; hence the recently directed movements of reinforcing units to the Isthmus of Panama and the island of Puerto Rico; hence the President's Executive order authorizing modest increases in the enlisted strengths of the Regular Army and the National Guard—all for the purpose of speaking with authority for peace.

Our national defense forces must be afforded the material means, must be so distributed, and must be given the strength to permit successful accomplishment of the protective missions assigned them.

Young "doughboys" of the infantry and young "red legs" of the field artillery—proud successors to their soldier sires who exercised so vital an influence on the development and preservation of the Republic—soon are to embark for our Caribbean garrisons, there to watch over America's outlying ramparts. As these physically sturdy, mentally alert, and morally upright American youths mount the gangplanks of the Army's transports, surely, from the soldiers' Valhalla, will be bestowed upon them the benedictions of their soldier forefathers. And as they journey southward through tropical seas will go with them the admiration and affection of all true American citizens, for never before have the missions of our Army as a force for peace and the high character and intent of its personnel been so fully appreciated by the people whose homes they defend.

A College President Discusses Our Place in the World Situation

OF

HON. JOHN M. VORYS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ARTICLE BY DR. GEORGE W. RIGHTMIRE

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following discussion by Dr. George W. Rightmire, president emeritus of Ohio State University. A scholar, educator, author of legal works, and distinguished Ohio citizen, he has just returned from a year in Europe, during which he spent months of study in England and also visited many of the nations now involved in conflict. The following discussion, which he has entitled "Keep Us Out of War," stands out as a keen analysis of the present situation as it affects our country:

War rages again, just 20 years after the close of the great World War, which, for more than 4 years, engulfed Europe and much of the civilized world outside in blood and slaughter. The European nations bled each other white.

On the part of Germany and her allies, that war was fought to extend and confirm her national influence; Great Britain and France fought to prevent this, and to maintain their dominance in European politics. Germany's political ambitions clashed with theirs and each side fought to a finish for European supremacy. The European balance of power was the issue, as it has been in innumerable wars in Europe for centuries. This issue involves both political and economic supremacy, and sometimes religion and race have been weighty factors.

WHY WE ENTERED

It was solely to escape these dire conditions in Europe that the ancestors of almost all the Americans today left Europe and came to this land of hope and opportunity. Yet, we went into the great World War 22 years ago to help England and France. We raised and trained 4,000,000 boys for that war and sent 2,000,000 to face the shells and bayonets and to hold the trenches on the western front. More than a quarter of a million never came back, and Gold Star Mothers since then have made pilgrimages to France to weep at the graves of their boys who fell fighting Europe's battles.

A CRUSADE?

We were enthused, almost frenzied, and were propagandized into the belief that we were entering upon a crusade—

1. To make the "world safe for democracy";
2. To engage in a "war to end war";

and later—

3. To establish and enforce the principle in Europe of "self-determination of peoples."

We recall the end of that titanic struggle—the Treaty of Versailles stripped territory from Germany and her allies and gave it to neighboring states in Europe, and their possessions in other parts of the world were distributed to the British Empire and France and Japan. Germany was considered the arch offender, and the purpose of the treaty was to make it impossible forever for her to rise to power again.

The United States came out of the Great World War without an additional foot of territory, after having advanced billions of dollars' worth of equipment and supplies and having extended credits for other billions—practically all of which remains today an unpaid and ignored debt, owed to us by many European countries. We refused our signature to the Treaty of Versailles, and we declined membership in the League of Nations and in the Permanent Court of International Justice, both of which were created by the treaty. We came out of Europe at the end of the war with a reverberating shout of relief and a Nation-wide chorus of "Never again." An "over" balance of power was established in Europe by the treaty, which the League of Nations was expected to make permanent; but the League itself, as a political factor, accomplished nothing and has long since failed.

DID NOT END WAR

Most of the years since Versailles have witnessed wars in north Africa, east Africa, east Asia, west Asia, and southern Europe, and Germany has recently been steadily taking back in Europe the territory held by the Teutonic powers 25 years ago.

SELF-DETERMINATION

The principle of the "self-determination of peoples" has been found unworkable. Treaty makers could not make enough states in middle Europe to accomplish this, for peoples there of many races and tongues are inextricably intermingled and have been for hundreds of years, and so majority and minority groups were thrust together with an admonition to the majority to respect the rights of the minority. But the problem of the minority peoples in such states has been acute since Versailles. Ancient prejudices persist, each racial group desperately adheres to its language and culture, and these countries bristle with communal antagonisms awaiting the day when they may live again.

SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY

Nor has democracy found the world safe. The Chinese, with the most individualistic notions and practices of all peoples, have for 2 years been suffering all the horrors of war undeclared; Germany, Italy, Poland, Russia, and Spain are clear dictatorships, and there are others of less note; England still rules in India, the Sudan and far-flung territories elsewhere in Africa, and in the isles of the seven seas; France rules vast regions of central and northern Africa and in eastern and western Asia; the United States still is supreme in the Philippines.

SLOGANS

Mankind in all ages has had a fatal weakness for slogans; they have fascinated the people. In the great crusades of eight centuries ago the peoples of Europe marched and fought all the way to Jerusalem, fired with religious fervor by two slogans, "Rescue the holy sepulcher" and "God wills it." They were fatally effective at the time, but mankind has never repeated them since, although the same need has always existed as existed then.

We know that slogans have a way of voicing emotions or enthusiasms which may be artfully and artificially stirred for the occasion, and when they have answered a temporary purpose of arousing to action, they fade away and leave man gasping and perplexed and stultified.

"Make the world safe for democracy," "This is a war to end war," "There shall be self-determination of peoples"—all these mighty, resounding slogans of 1917, which swept us like crusaders into the great World War in Europe—the greatest and most devastating of all history—have not been fulfilled in Europe; they have been repudiated there and have long since been as "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal" here. As Walpole said two centuries ago:

"Every age has some ostentatious system to excuse the havoc it commits—conquest, honor, chivalry, religion, balance of power, commerce—no matter what—mankind must bleed and take a term for a reason."

These three slogans are powerless to mobilize us again. Their failure and our disillusionment have renewed our determination to "avoid entangling European alliances" and never again to send our young men to die on European battlefields in struggle for European domination and supremacy.

For centuries the nations of Europe have fought among themselves, with allies in one war who were enemies in the next; they have not often warred for eternal principles of right and justice, but for more territory and more power or for curbing the power and ambitions of another—always national self-interest has been at the bottom of their troubles. They have warred upon each other, they have then made treaties of peace, they have altered the line-up and have started new wars in ceaseless round.

Their troubles have always resided within themselves, they have created their own contentions and if they are ever ended permanently it will be because they settle them themselves. Study the map of Europe. It is a bewildering entanglement of national boundary lines across which governments glare at each other, and passport authorities and customs assessors await the traveler who would pass on; through the accidents of past wars a small country may contain several peoples, and each jealously preserves its own language, dress, and customs, and is in reality a racial and political unit.

European peoples have long faced the sublime test of recognizing each other in peace and friendship. European statecraft rests upon a civilization reputed to be the world's highest, and it must accept the responsibility of achieving harmony and cooperation among its suffering and really war-hating peoples. The great common people of each nation declares its abhorrence of war, and it is the supreme task of Europe's statesmen to find the way to peace.

WAR RAGES AGAIN

And now, in 1939, war rages again in Europe. Why? Germany has demanded her old territory from Poland awarded to Poland by the Treaty of Versailles; Poland has defied Germany, England and France have allied themselves with Poland, determined to maintain their paramount influence in European affairs, and to resist further expansion of Germany; they regard further enlargement of Germany as a direct menace to their own safety and integrity. And so the war is on.

Can this be a "war to end war"? No one has made that claim for it, and in the light of experience in the Great World War it would have a ghostlike sound. Can it be a war "to make the world safe for democracy"? Poland is and has been for some years a virtual dictatorship; France and England sought the aid of Russia in their defense of Poland, thus proposing that two democracies and two dictatorships fight the war against a third dictator. Russia is a classic example of dictatorship.

Can it be called a war for the "self-determination of peoples"? It is well known that Poland includes large bodies of Germans, Russians, and Hungarians; England and France rule the destinies of millions of alien peoples, and their self-determination has not been mentioned at this time.

These are the three stirring slogans of the Great World War, powerful then but dismal failures in the crucible of world politics.

WAR PROPAGANDA

And yet the American people must nevertheless be alert to sense and defeat propaganda designed to sweep us into this war. The old slogans are dead, but determined propaganda can make new ones overnight. Slogans appeal to our feelings and emotions, never to our reason. They prompt action and stupefy thinking.

The press and the radio are carrying as news and comment from Europe and America most elusive propaganda tending to show that our coming into this war is only a matter of a short time; that it is, indeed, inevitable.

We are being told that trade and industry would be instantly and vastly stimulated, but we went through all that in the great World War, and after it closed there was a short period of economic decline, then a few years of feverish prosperity, and now 10 long years of unemployment, financial depression, relief, mounting taxes, and monumental debts—all oppressing us today and all of which are traced by our best thinkers back to the waste of men and materials and the social and moral degeneracy which war must always produce.

DO NOT SHARE

We are being reminded of our intimate inheritance from England in language, literature, law, and history as a reason for joining England in this war. But, indeed, we are ever remindful of our inheritance and yield to none in admiration for the British people and respect for their accomplishments all around the seven seas. Yet we must ever remember that we are not sharers in England's foreign policies, nor are we party to the vast range of diplomacy by which the British Empire has been created and is maintained.

The commitments by which Britain holds her international course in Europe, in South and East Africa, in the Sudan, in western Asia, in eastern Asia, and on all the shores washed by the Indian Ocean, are foreign to America and the entire Western Hemisphere. And so long as the war over there goes on we shall be facing new propaganda most plausible and agitating; we must exercise eternal vigilance.

Surely we have not forgotten how we were flooded with European propaganda in the last war. Some strong editorials and radio comment are already analyzing the war motives in Europe today, and are voicing our national purpose to stay out. They should be our natural leaders in correct thinking and action on this matter and should help us to steer a sane course in these times of domestic problems and foreign confusion.

NOT IN "SPHERE"

America is no part of European political policies; we have our own political purposes and ideals. We are not in the "sphere of influence" of any European nation or group of nations.

This war is not of our making; its center is 4,000 miles away in Poland, and the outcome cannot possibly affect our national life or well-being. The British Empire and France in fighting Germany are serving interests of their own and furthering their own national policies. There is no reason why the United States should send a single soldier to the battlefields of Europe. Our present duty is to maintain a highly adequate defense at home and let Europe settle the troubles which Europe produces in Europe.

What is the thought of the American Legion and the other veterans of foreign wars? What is the thought of the school teachers of the country? Of the businessmen and financiers? Of the ministry? Of the press and the radio? Let us mobilize a body of opinion in the United States today which will demonstrate to the President and Congress our invincible national will to keep out of this war.

Lifting Arms Ban Now Is Held Unlawful

LETTER TO NEW YORK TIMES FROM PROFESSORS CHARLES CHENEY HYDE AND PHILIP C. JESSUP, OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written to the editor of the New York Times, under date of September 20, 1939, by Professors Charles Cheney Hyde and Philip C. Jessup, of Columbia University, two of the best known authorities on international law in America, who claim that the lifting of the arms embargo at this time would be an unneutral act.

This is the same viewpoint as held by Professors Bemis, Griswold, and Borchard of Yale University.

The letter is as follows:

LEGAL DOUBT—LIFTING ARMS BAN NOW IS HELD UNLAWFUL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The Congress about to convene will be called upon to make a momentous decision—whether it shall remove the existing embargo on munitions of war to belligerent countries. The issue is not merely one of policy; it is rather one of law. To put it differently, the Congress must first consider and decide whether any legal duty rests upon the United States as a neutral not to remove the embargo. The decision on this point needs to be taken before any other can be intelligently or wisely reached.

The situation confronting the United States today is sharply different from that of a month ago, before the war broke out. While peace reigned, no international obstacle hindered Congress from legislating as it might see fit. With the outbreak of war, however, the situation changed overnight. The United States found itself, and still finds itself, as a neutral burdened with a number of well-recognized duties toward all of the warring states. These duties it is not free to alter according to its convenience or preference. The fact that these duties are owed to a belligerent with whose policies it has no sympathy does not change the duties; it merely makes it extremely hard for the Nation to keep its balance and to be guided by its head rather than its heart.

OUR DUTIES AS A NEUTRAL

What are the outstanding duties which the United States as a neutral must respect? Here are a few. Its Government must remain strictly impartial, whatever be the feelings of the people; it must not itself furnish aid to any belligerent; it must not take sides in the war; it must not directly or indirectly assist a favored belligerent at the expense of its foe.

It is true that international law does not normally oblige a neutral state to prevent its citizens from exporting munitions of war from its territory. Yet the freedom from such an obligation vanishes when once the government of the neutral has itself undertaken, as by its statutory law enacted in time of peace, to forbid exportations to belligerents and has made the matter of exportation one of government control. Thereafter, when war ensues, it requires affirmative governmental action to permit exportations of previously forbidden articles from neutral territory.

Hence, relaxation of embargoes after the outbreak of war may in fact and in law amount to governmental participation in the conflict. This is obvious if or when the reason for removing a particular embargo is to aid the cause of one or more of the fighting states which will vastly profit from such action because of their command of the seas. In such a situation the neutral purveyor becomes the special support or prop of the favored belligerent, and the government as well as the people of the neutral becomes in reality a participant in the conflict. Such conduct is, under such circumstances, unneutral and is contemptuous of the legal duty which the law of nations imposes upon every neutral sovereign.

EMBARRASSMENT FOR US SEEN

To be more precise, if the Congress, in order to strengthen the sinews of France and England, removes the present embargo so as to enable those powers to gain a distinct advantage over their enemy, the United States makes itself in fact the ally of those who secure its sustenance. But more than that, such conduct is illegal as well as unneutral and may, if resorted to, place the Nation in a most embarrassing and even hypocritical position when it undertakes to assert its neutral rights which Secretary Hull recently announced we had not abandoned.

The precise ground of objection would be that our Government, having in time of peace asserted control over and forbidden the exportation of munitions in wars which might ensue, cannot relax its grip without affirmative Congressional action; and that such relaxation, being the direct expression of a notorious desire to help a particular cause, constitutes a governmental taking of sides which is unneutral and illegal.

AN ARGUMENT DISCOUNTED

Thus these two factors—the governmental control already achieved by an act of Congress and a governmental desire to relax that control so as to help France and England—would combine to produce a result that the opposing belligerent, Germany, would pounce upon to establish the unneutral aspect of embargo-removing legislation. These factors would render inept and unconvincing the contention that when or if Congress removed an embargo which the United States was not obliged to impose, no legal duty to any belligerent is involved, provided every state engaged in war enjoys equal freedom to help itself to American resources.

The answer is that the manipulation of American governmental control already established through a statutory embargo, with the deliberate design of aiding a particular group of warring powers by an effort that takes cognizance of their relative supremacy at sea, is a deliberate taking of sides which marks intervention in the conflict. Such intervention is not impartial in spirit, and it is not abstention from participation in the war. It is, on the contrary, a specious form of interposition sought to be disguised under a cloak of professed equality of treatment of the opposing contenders. Yet the real character of such conduct shines out like a lighthouse in the fog.

It is not here sought or necessary to press the contention that neutral contributions of munitions of war to belligerent states tend to bring the contributor into the conflict, and to make it the enemy of that belligerent which suffers a distinct detriment from its conduct. At the moment that is a matter of secondary importance. The question of the hour is whether the United States is today, with its present neutrality law on the books, free, under the law of nations, to remove embargoes in order to help the enemies of Germany. It is believed that the United States has not been free since September 3.

HISTORY IS CITED

If this conclusion is correct, what would be the consequences of American unneutral participation in the war as against Germany? It is perhaps unnecessary to consider how Germany as an offended belligerent would seek to vindicate its rights. It may merely be recalled that as a result of Washington's and Jefferson's frank recognition of neutral duties we paid England about $143,000 for our breaches of neutral duty in the 1790's and that in 1873 England paid the United States $15,500,000 for English breaches of neutral duty during the American Civil War.

It is not suggested, however, that our national action should be determined on the basis of fear that we should be liable to pay a bill for damages, no matter how large. It is rather suggested that the United States today, as in the time of President Washington, should be guided by a decent respect for its obligations under international law.

Within the past 2 years, American governmental utterances, embracing those of our faithful and high-minded Secretary of State, have deplored the lawlessness of some other countries and their contempt for the precepts of international law. Such denunciations lose their influence and confidence if the integrity of the Nation is impaired.

ALTERNATIVES SUGGESTED

A country such as our own needs today, when its Congress is summoned for a particular purpose, to consider honestly, resolutely, and fearlessly the question whether it can modify its law, in order to assist one set of belligerents whose cause it favors, without becoming a deliberate violator of the law of nations. Unless it can answer that question affirmatively in the best of faith and in the light of law and practice, it cannot at this time relax its embargoes without besmirching its character as an advocate of international justice.

The United States is free to enter the war as a belligerent if it decides so to do. We express no opinion on the wisdom of such a choice, but if the sympathies and conviction of all its people demand that course of action, it will be taken; let it then be taken boldly and frankly. But if the sober judgment of the American people is that our duty and our interest require that we be neutral, let us follow that course with equal honesty and with respect for that international law of which we pride ourselves on being the champion.

What Are the Rights of Neutrals?

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in the Evening Star, September 28, 1939, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator KEY PITTMAN, is quoted as follows:

> It is vitally important that you understand the attitude of your Congress toward foreign wars and the legislation that will be enacted by Congress at this special session. Numerous petitions and communications that have deluged Members of the Senate clearly demonstrate that these petitions are based either upon ignorance of the intent of Congress or are the result of vicious organized foreign propaganda. For instance, most of these communications contain similar demands, such as "No cash-and-carry," "Don't repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war." * * *
> There exists now, since the substitute proposal has been introduced, and published in full in all of the great newspapers of the country and synopses of it in practically every paper of the United States, no reasonable excuse for any misunderstanding by any intelligent citizen of the United States or for the continuance of false propaganda.

I, for one, challenge the article in substance and in fact, for it is misleading, erroneous, and deceptive. The article is pure propaganda to disarm the public as to the danger of the now proposed neutrality legislation.

The distinguished Senator spoke for Congress. I shall speak for myself, and my attitude is that the Senator did not express my views correctly, nor that of those who have expressed their views to me in petitions and letters.

The letters that I have received do not indicate that the people are ignorant, but on the contrary, intelligent and cognizant of congressional weakness. We should not question the people's intelligence, but instead that of such Members of Congress as believe that we can enforce our own neutrality laws on other nations without involving ourselves in war.

The people are very well informed, for they realize that Congress has no constitutional authority to enact legislation international in scope, nor the right to delegate power to the President to enforce such legislation. I hope that Members of Congress will understand if any attempt is made by us to enforce such legislation, it can only end in war. It is for that reason that I object to repeal of the embargo clause, for the Neutrality Act itself, with that clause removed, will give the President power and opportunity to involve this country in war, as was done in 1917.

I maintain, however, that any attempt by us to digress from international law, outside the 3-mile limit, will meet with international disapproval, and any attempt by us to enforce such assumed authority will lead to war.

I am, of course, in accord with repeal of all neutrality legislation as a proper procedure and sounder international position, but I am also extremely fearful of repeal at this time. If repeal is contemplated, Congress must, in order to keep the administration neutral, make it an impeachable offense to issue clearance papers to our ships bound to nations at war and their colonies, to ports in war zones, or to neutral nations for transshipment to nations at war.

For Members of Congress to believe that after having granted the President power by legislation to declare war zones, that he has the magnetism to enforce international acceptance of such zones as he may proclaim, is an overestimation of congressional power and of the President's ability. If he attempts to enforce his proclamation, he would immediately be challenged by other dictators, and that, as you know, is cause for war.

However, if it is the intention of Congress to promote, as in the contemplated neutrality legislation, a competition of international dictators, let us first come to agreement with nations so ruled. I suggest as a remedy for this plague, that all dictatorial megalomaniacs be placed in an arena to fight for leadership among themselves. When the victor emerges he may, in order to give us a breathing spell, be removed to St. Helena as a warning to others with dictatorial aspirations.

Members of Congress should understand that in giving the President power to proclaim or designate war zones, it also gives him power to order clearance for our ships to zones not so designated or proclaimed. Granting such power to unneutral executives is like sending a cab driver up as pilot of an airplane, or giving a stick of dynamite to a child; for it can only end in crashing neutrality and exploding peace.

Is it possible that Members of Congress believe that England would not intercept neutral ships and commandeer contraband cargo bound for Germany? Can any one of us believe that England will permit contraband cargoes to reach such countries as Holland, Finland, Lithuania, Denmark, and other Scandinavian countries, particularly when such cargoes are not in accord with reasonable peacetime demands? Certainly not; for England is now engaged in a tight blockade of Germany, not only of war material but of all food supplies as well. It is the old starvation blockade; an old weapon of Albion. In such blockade, little consideration is given to those who lack food supplies—the ill-clothed, ill-housed, ill-fed—for with England as well as Germany it is a case of winning the war.

Is it now illogical or unreasonable to assume that Germany will not retaliate with a similar blockade upon England, suitable to such means as may be at her command? Of course she will. If Germany lacks a navy to intercept such shipping, and ports for unloading commandeered contraband cargoes, she will, of course, be forced to dispose of such ships and contraband cargoes according to the means at her command. What are Germany's weapons? They are the submarine and the airplane, which means that ships intercepted will be destroyed by gunfire, bomb, or torpedo.

All neutrals may, therefore, expect interception and destruction of ships that carry contraband cargoes to nations at war. We occupy the same position as other neutrals, and the fact that Congress gives the President power to declare war zones does not make it obligatory that other powers accept his designation; for we are no exception to the rule. If we attempt to protect our shipping with convoys, it is equal to declaration of war and will be considered a hostile act by one of the warring powers.

Although it may be recapitulation, allow me to explain this in the following manner:

No statesman will deny that we and other neutrals may expect in accordance with the rules of war to be treated alike; that a ship carrying contraband cargo from the United States, Mexico, or Central America to England is subject to the same rules as a ship carrying contraband cargo from Norway, Sweden, or Finland to Germany. Many of us, however, forget that shipping bound to Prince Edward Island, Bermuda, or the Bahamas, is subject to the same rules of war as shipping bound to England.

Suppose the President leaves these islands, Prince Edward Island, Bermuda, and the Bahamas, out of his proclaimed war zones, and let us further suppose that we clear shipping for such destination with passengers and freight. Now, assuming that one of these ships is lost, say "submarined," who is to blame? No one is to blame but Congress for granting such power to the President, and he for not knowing better than to enforce such stupid legislation.

Do not forget, however, that Congress alone is to be blamed for such legislation. The President will evade responsibility, for he will say: "It is the law." The same excuse we so often hear from department heads, when questions arise in committees in regard to the intent of the law. It is for this reason that I am bitterly opposed to all unconstitutional granting of power to the President or to his appointees, for it makes Congress the goat, and what is more serious, its Members potential traitors to the people that sent them to Congress.

Neutral ships carrying contraband cargo from the United States of America, Mexico, or Central America to England may, therefore, expect to be intercepted by German submarines or aircraft, and sunk by gunfire, bombs, or torpedoes, for Germany has no available ports for war prizes because her own ports are under blockade by the enemy.

Neutrals ships carrying contraband from Norway, Sweden, or Finland, to Germany, may expect to be intercepted by the British Navy, seized and convoyed to British ports as war prizes, and the cargo commandeered and used by the captor.

Those who have followed my line of reasoning may now agree with me that the only part of the Neutrality Act we have the right to enforce is the arms-embargo clause and the regulation of credit. Foreign nations cannot expect nor compel us to sell anything to them that we refuse to part with. It is that clause the President is asking Congress to repeal. In addition, he asks that we extend credit to buyers. Let me say at this point that such credit is for no other purpose except to help such power as is in control of ocean traffic. If this credit extension is allowed, the taxpayers of the United States will finance the present war for the "invisible government," as we did the World War.

It is this kind of legislation that is passed by those who arrived in Congress in the chariot driven by Mr. Roosevelt. Lost in admiration of the driver, they forget the greater duty to their own people, and follow each other instead, like the elephants in a circus parade. Being well fed and properly trained, they perform when their master cracks his whip.

Let us now look at this from a propaganda angle, for eventually we must face this monster of misrepresentation and deception. Let us suppose that clearance is issued to ships bound for Prince Edward Island, Bermuda, or the Bahamas, and that one or more of these ships falls victim to a submarine blockade. How will the invisible government's propaganda machine react to such loss? Do you not believe it will be a repetition of World War propaganda?

The P. E. P. will swing into action and ask the New Deal, its planning partner, for help, and both will cry to high heaven for aid. Will the papers tell the truth and admit that such blockage is well within the rights of nations at war and not different from that laid down by the English Navy? No!

Let us now again assume that one or more of these ships is lost in fouling a floating mine, or let us even go a little further than that and say that they were sunk deliberately by an interested power, to create war hysteria in the United States. Would it make any difference to the press? No, indeed; for the invisible power that is promoting the war is the same that controls war propaganda. The invisible government's propaganda machine would swing into operation with a barrage of misrepresentation to aline public sympathy with Great Britain and France, as it did in the World War. As I see it now, such propaganda would meet with failure, for we know more about the subversive operation of the invisible government now than we did twenty-odd years ago. If the papers are correct in stating that France and England are determined to go on with the war, let them do so. It is their war, not ours.

It is now generally conceded that the Wilson administration had one foot on a banana peeling and the other in the British war machine. The molding of public opinion did the trick; hatred toward Germany removed the banana peeling and sympathy for England placed the other foot in the British war buggy, which took our people for a ride. We have not forgotten that trip, for it left us with six cemeteries on foreign soil. We paid the running expense for that ride, and we have loaned them money to build a new machine which is now ready to take us for another trip if we repeal the arms embargo clause.

The people, in listening to the World War propaganda, fell into a trap set by the international exploiters. It is the same measly crew that is behind the propaganda which now covers the pages of our daily papers. My reason for replying to this article is due to the fact that it is a subtle type of propaganda which may influence those who have not given due consideration to legislation now requested by an administration that differs only in degree from that of its predecessor of 1917.

When I compare the Wilson and Roosevelt administrations, I have in mind particularly the specter behind the two, and those who, in 1917, when a nation was threatened, left their insidious imprints in an agreement that led us into the World War. The same insidious specters that cast their evil shadows over the Versailles conference were also the dominating influence which guided the pen that drafted the treaty of peace.

When I say the difference between the two administrations is only one of degree, I have in mind that each, and the one before the last, like sprouting leaders are not far apart in obtuseness. As I turn the pages in history, I find that leaders now, as those before, like the elephants in the parade, follow each other into the tent of the invisible government only to perform as those who have gone before.

To continue under this leadership and direction will only end as planned, in enslavement of our people and in national disintegration. The success of this planned destruction is in direct relation to the public's lack of interest and our unwillingness to understand what is happening to this Nation. No one who has the interest of our country at heart should regard this transition without apprehension. Our safety lies in recognizing those who guide the invisible hand that writes democracy and communism, instead of the Republic of the United States.

The danger in legislation that has been enacted for a number of years may be found in the fact that it deprives Congress of its constitutional power and centralizes the same in Federal departments. This is in line with the planned conversion of our Government. This attempt in the destruction of our Republic is not accidental, but is instead a well coordinated movement directed by the invisible government through its agents and representatives in the Federal employ. No one in the invisible government is idle. As a matter of fact, they occupy the more important positions in Federal departments and bureaus. This, of course, is also planned by the invisible government for two reasons: Power and cheapness. Important positions are necessary to keep those who are directing the movement well informed and it is always good business to allow us, the people, to pay the expenses. This is particularly appropriate in this planned destruction of our own Government, for our denseness furnishes amusement for the planners.

All subversive legislation and activities are clothed in innocent titles, and are so flexible that they follow any popular movement, yet never swerve from their ultimate objective—planned destruction of our Government.

The Neutrality Act is a part of this plan. The word "neutrality" is employed because it is pleasing to the public. Let anyone challenge the purpose of the act and see what happens. He is denounced by the proponents of the act as antineutral, and the people blindly rally to the support of the invisible government against the antineutrals only to aid in their own enslavement and destruction.

Innocuous titles, appellations, and slogans are gold bricks handed out by the invisible government to gullible Americans for their aid in laying low patriotic citizens who are opposed to sabotage of the Republic.

Congress must retrieve its lost power by repealing all legislation not in accord or agreement with the fundamental principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States. Our Nation is near the precipice. Shall we wait until it falls, or will you in united effort join and set it back solidly upon the Constitution? It should be obvious to all that the principle of sound government has not changed. It cannot change. It is instead we who are at fault, for we have neglected to carry on with the sublime faith of those who suffered and died to set us free.

The leaders and men we need are those who will dedicate themselves to those principles which are inscribed in the Constitution and so ably interpreted by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. It is no longer a question of expediency or parties. It is instead all for the United States of America and for those who dedicate themselves to perpetuation of the fundamental principles of this Nation and perpetuation of the Republic forever and forever.

The Honorable Alfred E. Smith Supports the Plan of President Roosevelt on Neutrality

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY FORMER GOV. ALFRED E. SMITH, OF NEW YORK

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by the Honorable Alfred E. Smith, on Neutrality, October 1, 1939, over the Columbia Broadcasting System, under the auspices of the American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts:

At the outset of my remarks let me first say that I do not know of anybody—I have never even heard of anybody—in the United States of America who wants this country to go to war. Certainly I do not, for I have three sons of the fighting age; the oldest of them is already in the Army and would be among the first to leave this country in the event that the United States was brought into the European struggle.

So, therefore, the argument, as far as I am concerned, resolves itself into this: What should we do that is best calculated to keep us out of war? In the discussion of this there is no room for personalities, parties, classes, or creeds—all differences must be wiped out in this hour of challenge. Personal interests must be subordinated to the common good. We must be selfish, not for ourselves, but for the whole Nation.

I was brought up in a tough political school, where facts counted for more than theories. My training has been to distinguish between high-sounding principles and actual results. My experience has taught me not to ask, "Has it a lofty purpose?" but to demand an answer to the question, "Does it work?"

The present Neutrality Act does not work. The theory back of it seemed excellent. The principle upon which it rested appeared sound when the act was passed. In the absence of any severe test, the purpose which it contemplated could not have been successfully criticized. But all this has changed. The act has now been tested. It has not met the test and in the coming state of world affairs it can't possibly meet the even more drastic strains of the future. It has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

ASKS END OF QUIBBLING

I am not the least bit interested in the language of any of the acts so far suggested, nor for that matter in any act that may hereafter be suggested, as to its details. What I am interested in, however, is that course which is best calculated to keep us from being drawn into the European war.

This is no time for technicalities. We should have a prompt decision by Congress on the merits of the question. I don't mean to discourage debate. There is a real question to be argued. What I do advocate, and I am sure the overwhelming majority are with me, is that the debate shall be on the real issue and not on obscure or minor considerations.

Personally, I am not interested in the argument as to whether or not we should return to so-called established principles of international law. I am not a student of law, but I am ready to defend the proposition that there is no respect for international law at this time.

Similarly, I take no stock in quibbling over constitutional questions in connection with the proposed substitute for the present Neutrality Act. Apparently there are some learned people who think we should give a lot of time to a discussion of whether the Constitution of the United States permits Congress or the Senate, as well as the President, to decide that a foreign war exists. What is the difference? The President's decision would be based on conferences with congressional leaders anyway and would be subject to review by Congress. In a crisis there is no time for legalistic hairsplitting.

Let Congress go straight to the real issue and let Congress decide it, because, after all, Congress speaks for all the people of the country; that is my understanding of democratic, representative government.

AGREES WITH ROOSEVELT

"The Neutrality Act as it stands today prevents the sale to a belligerent nation of any completed implements of war, but it allows the sale of many types of uncompleted implements of war, as well as all kinds of general materials and supplies." These words are taken from the speech of the President of the United States when Congress convened last week.

He further says that the present law allows such products of industry and agriculture to be taken in American ships to belligerent nations, and he concludes that therein lies the definite danger not only to our neutrality but to our peace. I am unable, in the light of history, to understand how that statement can be successfully disputed.

Let us go back into history, or, as I have many times said, let's look at the record. Many reasons were advanced as the cause of our entering the World War 22 years ago.

Nobody can truthfully say, in the light of history, that Woodrow Wilson was anxious to plunge this country into the World War. In fact, he leaned in the directly opposite way. Long before he called upon Congress to declare war against the Imperial Government of Germany, because of the sinking of American ships, there was a distinct feeling throughout the country that we should go to war, to vindicate the dignity and the majesty and the sovereignty of this great Republic. In a conversation with his secretary in 1916, after a submarine had sent an American ship to the bottom, he said: "I will not be rushed into the war, no matter if every last Congressman and Senator stands up on his hind legs and proclaims me a coward."

However, in the latter part of January of 1917 Germany announced to the United States that she was going to begin on February 1 unrestricted submarine warfare in the zone around the British Isles and undertook to specify the route which a restricted number of American ships might take through this zone. When the secretary to the President brought that Associated Press bulletin to the White House and showed it to the President, he said: "This means war. The break that we have tried so hard to prevent now seems inevitable."

FACING SAME SITUATION

Here we are under the present Neutrality Act facing that exact situation. The law as it now stands allows supplies to a belligerent country to be carried in American ships; supplies which will be needed for the prosecution of the war, although not named in the Neutrality Act.

But all of that seems to me to be entirely beside the question in view of the attitude of the German Government as shown by the destruction of two Swedish steamships. The attitude of Berlin to the sinking of these two ships clearly indicates that the German Government does not recognize any difference between the goods covered by the American embargo and the goods that are not covered by the embargo. That means that anything delivered to belligerent nations in American ships puts the ship in danger of destruction and means the loss of the lives of American seamen.

I believe that we should prevent the transportation in American ships of any goods of any kind, war goods or other goods, contraband or noncontraband, or any passengers to the warring nations. It is undoubtedly the absence of such a law in 1917 that brought us into the World War. There is only one way of avoiding a repetition of this experience, and that is by keeping American ships and American passengers out of trade with belligerents.

The distinction between contraband and noncontraband, war material and nonwar material is essentially the bunk. As a matter of fact, the Swedish boats were carrying lumber, and that was declared to be contraband of war because it is used for shoring in coal mines, which produces fuel necessary for the production of war materials.

As I have said, in this war the Germans have already declared there is no such distinction as far as they are concerned. They take the position—if I read the papers aright—that everything routed to the British Isles is contraband of war, and they put it upon the ground that no belligerent can afford to buy anything at the present time that is not absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the war.

In view of this and in the light of the German attitude to the sinking of the Swedish ships, those who oppose amendment to the present Neutrality Act are compelled to take the position—let them sink the ships. Those who desire the Neutrality Act amended take the position that we will not let the ships go where they can be sunk.

PLOWSHARES INTO SWORDS

The Bible speaks of beating swords into plowshares. By the same token plowshares can be beaten back into swords. Armies travel on their feet and on their stomachs, and therefore shoes and food can be regarded as war material and contraband.

Under these circumstances we should keep American ships and American passengers out of the export business and let the purchasers come and get what they need by paying cash and carrying it away in their own ships.

I read by the papers that the Members of Congress are being deluged with letters, the purpose of which is to convince them that we should keep out of the war. Right! The news article said that most of the letters come from people who do not desire any amendment to the Neutrality Act. That is probably because they do not understand it. I would suggest that those who believe, after a study, that amendment is best calculated to keep us out of the war should also write to their Representatives in Congress.

Therefore, I repeat, the question before Congress is which of the two measures is best calculated to keep us out of war—the present Neutrality Act or the amendments suggested by the President.

It is because I firmly believe in my heart and soul that the amendments suggested by the President are best calculated to save us from the scenes that we witnessed in 1917 when our American boys were starting for France that I am at this microphone tonight, appealing to the American people to stand solidly behind the President because he is so clearly right, so obviously on the side of common sense and sound judgment and of patriotism, that only those who lack an understanding of the issue will oppose him. I urge this with all the sincerity I possess, with the profound conviction that I speak for the good of the Nation which we all love so much.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to present some facts pertaining to the all-important question of neutrality. I question whether there has been any subject before the American Congress in many years that has enlisted public attention as had the discussion on the question of neutrality, and this is wisely so, for the reason that our American citizens just naturally are vitally interested in this subject because they are the ones who will directly bear the results of unneutral legislation.

Here at Washington we hear a great deal said about propaganda with reference to this subject. Those who favor the President's legislative program pertaining to neutrality are very prone to assert that letters coming in opposed to this legislation are propaganda. This statement is not true. If the citizens of America, in the respective congressional districts thereof, write their Congressmen on legislation in which they are vitally interested, that certainly is not propaganda, but their lawful right in expressing their convictions to their Congressmen who, after all, are but the agents of their constituents.

I have received thousands of letters from my district on the subject of neutrality. I have read these letters, all of them, with interest, because they contain an earnest appeal from fathers and mothers and other citizens of my district, expressing their views upon this all-important subject. I, personally, am glad to receive these letters. It is a fine thing in America when our citizenry takes interest in government. It is a wholesome sign, because it shows that they are vitally interested in governmental problems and policies.

Many Americans believe that our isolation policy was first enunciated in Washington's Farewell Address in 1796. However, this statement is not true because the roots of this doctrine go far back into our colonial history. It was the viewpoint promoted by most leading Americans many years before Washington delivered his Farewell Address. Our colonial forefathers came here in the hopes that they could find refuge and a sanctuary from the perpetual quarrels and wars of Europe. These wars have been going on for centuries and may continue for centuries more, regardless of what the United States may do, or may not do.

Our colonists' hopes, however, were soon changed. The lands they occupied still remained colonies of Europe. They still found themselves entangled in the great struggle of European democracies for world balance of power. That is identically the same reason for which we are being urged to meddle in Europe today.

The fact that our American Colonies were automatically involved in European wars, in which wars they had no direct interest, was one main reason for the Declaration of Independence and the beginning of the American Revolution. During the early months of the revolution, John Adams said—

We ought to lay it down as a first principle and a maxim never to be forgotten, to maintain entire neutrality in all future European wars.

Our revolutionary history shows that Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, George Mason, Alexander Hamilton, Richard Henry Lee, and practically every other American statesman at that time were all advising America that its welfare lay in refraining from entering into entangling alliances and quarrels with Europe.

Their wisdom could be summed up in this way, "We will keep out of Europe—Europe keeps out of America." This statement was really the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine, which has been so vital in the history of America. Our traditional policy toward Europe has been isolation from their politics, quarrels, and wars, but maintaining relations on the issues of commerce, peace, and friendship. Let me quote from Washington's Farewell Address, to which I have previously alluded. Note how pertinent the statements still are today:

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

The policy of our Government, in general, has been to refrain from foreign involvements, and that policy has been successful for our country. It has increased the United States from an original population of 3,000,000 until we have a population today of 130,000,000. That policy should be continued in the future.

The people of America are bitterly opposed to our emergence in a world war. We are not forgetful of the last World War, with its 8,500,000 killed, 22,000,000 injured, 7,500,000 captured and missing. Neither are we unmindful of America's casualties in that World War. We mobilized some 5,000,000 of the finest of our youth, sent 2,000,000 of them to fight in Europe, with 350,000 casualties, including 125,000 dead. Neither are we unmindful of the billions of dollars that America spent in the World War.

The time has come in America when our first duty is to our country and to the 130,000,000 people comprising the United States, our citizens. We have all the problems here that we can safely handle in order to preserve the heritage of our great Nation.

The best way to keep out of future wars is to remove as many as possible of the causes that contributed to our involvement in past wars. This is the prime purpose of our neutrality legislation. It should be American legislation, designed to help preserve the peace of America. There is no proper place in such legislation for futile and dangerous attempts to insure peace throughout the world, to punish far-distant aggressors, or to equalize the existing inequities between nations. Picking the aggressor is a most difficult and dangerous task. The unequal application of our neutrality laws is not neutrality.

We are not going to have freedom from war unless we are willing to give up the trade profits that drag us into war. Is it not better to give up millions in war profits, if that be necessary, without the surrender of a single life, rather than go into a war that will cost billions in money, the deaths of untold numbers of American youth, and that may mean the ultimate destruction of our free Government?

The overwhelming majority of the people of this country wants us to keep America out of war. The overwhelming majority of the Congress wants to keep America out of any European war. Therefore, thoughtful care should be given to any neutrality bill before it becomes the law of the land.

Wars are not launched by the people. They are started by leaders—leaders looking for power and fame; but first they must fan the fires of prejudice and hate in order that the people will follow. Americans are determined this time not to be swayed either by the propaganda of the warring nations or by the excitements of those at home who cannot keep their heads.

It will not be difficult to keep the United States out of this war. All it will need is a determined will to stay at peace, manifested by the American people and by the Nation's leaders. No legislation should be passed that will involve the United States in foreign entangling alliances or that will send American troops abroad.

We cannot afford to get mixed up with European diplomacy and European politics, and European alliances, all of which change from day to day. We should not fight for foreign causes on foreign battlefields. It is neither obligatory nor prudent for America to do so.

It is advisable that American citizens should be prohibited from traveling on vessels of all countries engaged in war; that shipments of American-owned goods on vessels of all countries engaged in war should be prohibited; that all sales to such countries should be paid in cash before loading and goods carried by buyer not on American ships; that no credits or loans should be extended to any country engaged in war; that our citizens should be notified to get out of all countries engaged in war or stay at their own risk; that we should maintain democracy under the American concept; that our Army and Navy and air forces should be increased and perfected for the successful defense of our country against aggression; that all subversive influences in the United States must be removed; that no propaganda on the part of the aggressor nations should be permitted to destroy our American democracy; that we should remember it is the voice of the American people and not the voice of foreign propagandists to which the Congress and the President must listen.

Events in Europe have placed upon the President and the Congress the grave responsibility of keeping the United States out of war. Our people want neutrality and peace. It is inevitable that differences of opinion have arisen over how best to make this universal desire effective. But it is unthinkable that those charged with such grave responsibility should be influenced by petty partisan considerations of domestic politics. The danger is that they may be influenced by partisan considerations in international politics.

In the weeks to come momentous decisions must be made. The test of those decisions must always be whether they will tend to keep the United States out of war. They must never reflect a desire to help one group of belligerents over another.

Moreover, our people demand that these decisions shall represent the combined wisdom and best judgment of all who must share responsibility for them. They will not condone blind following of one-man leadership, no matter how disinterested or inspiring that leadership may be.

We are an emotional people and deep and quick in our sympathies. All too frequently in recent years we have been beguiled in our domestic affairs by appeals to our hopes and to our fears. In our international outlook we have been in constant danger that frantic appeals to our prejudices and equally frantic appeals to our sympathies would breed a tension or intolerance or an unreasoning devotion to causes abroad that would bring into our country all of the hates and the cleavages of sympathies which underlie the appalling situation in Europe.

In a topsy-turvy world, in which many sins are being committed in the name of democracy, we must distinguish between real democracy and the sham and pretense which seeks to masquerade under democracy's cloak.

We must not forget that for centuries Europe has been torn by the wars engendered by power politics; that the touchstone of the foreign policy of every European nation always has been national self-interest.

We must not forget that the history of Europe is a sordid story of broken pacts, reversed policies, secret treaties, and hidden treacheries. We must not forget that the United States entered the World War without Congress or the people having any knowledge of the secret treaties which existed among the Allies.

We must not forget that fighting Europe's battles is not the best way to preserve our civilization, and we must no longer delude ourselves with the vain hope of making the world safe for democracy, but realize that we are facing the grim necessity of keeping democracy safe in the United States.

The Neutrality Acts of 1935 and 1937 were passed virtually unanimously by Congress when there was no public excitement or danger of war and when Congress could put its unprejudiced thought to the preparation of a proper neutrality bill, which bill was approved by the President. I see no reason now why, in time of European war, there should be a sudden departure from that neutral policy which had met with virtual unanimity by both Congress and the President, unless the proposed amendments to the existing law should greatly strengthen that legislation.

I personally favor a strict neutrality law with teeth in it, rigidly enforced, and my votes shall always be cast to best protect America in this respect and to prevent her from being embroiled in European entanglements.

Put Control of Rivers Under Maritime Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SIOUX CITY (IOWA) TRIBUNE

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein an editorial from the Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune, written by Mr. O. L. Brownlee:

PUT CONTROL OF RIVERS UNDER MARITIME BOARD

Congress should lose no time in voting down the Wheeler-Lea railroad bill and in adopting a resolution calling for a special study of the inland-navigation question with the view of divorcing water and rail transportation and placing the inland lakes and streams under the jurisdiction of the United States Maritime Commission.

Probably two-thirds of the Members of the Senate and House who voted for the Wheeler-Lea bill, now in conference committee, did so on the theory that inland navigation should be regulated in some way by some governmental body. Lacking anything but an elementary knowledge of the subject, it did not occur to them that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not the proper body.

Congress—and the public, too—has been considering inland navigation from the standpoint of coordinating it with rail and truck transportation. Long study of this question and knowledge of the railroad bias which exists in the Interstate Commerce Commission has convinced this newspaper that we should approach the inland navigation problem from the standpoint of coordination with intercoastal, coastal, and international shipping, that all navigation problems should be integrated and placed under the direction of a central body.

This opinion is supported by the action of an important committee of Congress itself in the last session. The House Committee on Merchant Marine reported favorably the Bland bill which would place all inland navigation matters under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission. Congressman HARRINGTON, of Sioux City, is a member of that committee and voted to report the Bland bill favorably. The bill was held up in the House by action of the Rules Committee which gave precedence to the Wheeler-Lea bill because that measure previously had passed the Senate.

The Wheeler-Lea bill emerged in such condition, due to amendments, that it is not certain the railroads want it as the measure stands and no community now served or which may be served by water transportation wants it. In view of the hodge-podge the measure now represents and the widespread dissatisfaction with it, Congress should back up and start all over again. Bad legislation is worse than no legislation.

Even if Congress is not prepared to accept the Bland bill, although it bears a favorable committee report, Congress has a duty to itself and to the country not to pass legislation which would strangle inland navigation and to learn more about the subject before attempting to legislate on it. The Maritime Commission understands navigation problems which is more than can be said for the Interstate Commerce Commission some of whose members probably couldn't distinguish between a twin-screw motorship and a scow.

We Need Sound Thoughts on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in this very difficult situation which the United States finds itself in as a result of the international turmoil now engaging much of Europe and Asia in war it is necessary that we do some sound and constructive thinking.

Among upward of 6,000 messages and petitions which I have received on the subject since September 21 there are many which are wise and thoughtful. From this group I have picked out one which to me sums up the combined opinion of nearly all the messages received to date, and I am consequently asking that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with my reply to same, with the hope that it may have some influence in the important decisions which must be made here in Washington during the next few weeks.

I hope many people will take time to read the following letter:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., September 26, 1939.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: According to press reports you and the rest of the Minnesota boys are taking the same stand on the Neutrality Act that I believe in. Nevertheless, you will have to make some more converts in order to keep the President from overriding you.

Inasmuch as your constitutents' letters are the principal way in which you can tell what they are thinking, I would like to make a few brief remarks.

From the President's many speeches I think there is no question but what he is doing his best to emphasize his hatred for the dictators and their brutalities. He even emphasizes this in his speeches asserting the neutrality of this country. In his speech about a week ago, he put it very plainly. He said we should be absolutely neutral, but we ought to help the Allies.

If the President actually thinks the best way for us to keep from sending men overseas is to do all we can to aid England and France—and not be neutral—why doesn't he come right out and say so in so many words in order that the average man on the street can believe in his sincerity? As it is, his speeches are beginning to get that insincere tone so common to Herr Hitler's utterances. I take it from what the President has said that he wants this country to keep out of actual armed conflict, but does not want us to be neutral, and thinks we can under the guise of neutrality actually give material assistance to the Allies and still keep out of war. If he would only say this in specific words, it would help. Maybe he is right, and maybe that is what we ought to do, but if we are to take that course it should be stated plainly and without any "weasel" wording.

I do not agree with this viewpoint at all. It is quite evident that this war is the result of the Versailles Treaty and the actions of France and, to some extent, England doing all they could to harm Germany and hold her down ever since the last war. The Germans are too great a people to be permanently held down, and they naturally followed the first leader who promised to give them back their self-respect, etc. Inasmuch as it is not our fault, but the fault of the Allies, that Germany was driven into its present bad position, I do not think we should take sides to cure the situation, because of the terrible price we shall have to pay if we do get mixed up in it. Of course, we all hate Hitlerism, etc., but will our participation in this event the way the President suggests be the best thing for this country? I don't think so.

I believe the present embargo against the sale of arms and completed materials of war should stand; that we should sell food, clothing, metals, and other materials not strictly munitions of war to anyone who will provide the money to pay for them and the bottoms in which to carry them away.

I believe we should manufacture plenty of airplanes, cannons, tanks, etc., of the latest and best designs, and should experiment and try to improve the design and manufacture of these articles, but should keep them for our own use. It is quite possible that the time is coming when we will need a navy at least twice the size we now have, and probably three times the size, because it is not improbable that in 15 or 20 years, or perhaps 3 or 4 years, we will have to deal with a combination of Germany, Russia, and Japan. If we have an army of a million men or more with ample equipment for modern mechanized warfare, a navy in each ocean competent to deal with any aggregation which might be brought to bear against us in either ocean, and a fleet of airplanes which would down any combination of air fleets which might be brought to bear against us, then we will be safe from outside military aggression.

The above contemplates a staggering expense, but we could do that for a lot less than the forty or fifty billion dollars which we would have to spend if we should get into the present war.

I would suggest that you call attention of all the embargo-repealing Congressmen to the mail they are undoubtedly getting and the probability of their defeat the next time they go to the polls if they do not listen to the people and vote on this vital measure the way the man on the street wants them to vote. Well-to-do people who have money invested in "war baby" stocks or commodities, etc., cannot help but have their interests somewhat warped by the contemplation of increased profits if we can sell completed ammunitions, etc. The ordinary man is more likely to disregard this phase as not affecting him and think more of what is going to happen to his boys. If Congress should recess for a week or 10 days before taking a vote on this matter and all Congressmen go home and make a few hundred house-to-house calls, they would find out what the people really think and how they will have to vote if they want to remain in public life.

Respectfully yours,

G. V. T.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1939.

DEAR MR. T.: I cannot adequately express to you my deep appreciation of your letter of the 26th regarding the neutrality problem.

I wish to quote to you, however, an excerpt from a letter which I wrote recently to one of my lawyer friends in Minneapolis who had written me somewhat along similar lines, which is as follows:

"I cannot see how the President or anyone else can espouse the cash-and-carry program for munitions without going to the aid of the beneficiaries of such a program to the fullest extent. Viewed from this angle, I think their action is dishonest or cowardly, or both. It is dishonest inasmuch as they are not giving the people the full expression of their viewpoint, and it is cowardly in that they are not willing to go to the limit to back up their viewpoint."

You will note how close this thought coincides with the fourth paragraph of the first page of your letter.

I am also deeply convinced of the necessity to proceed at once to double the size of our Navy, and, as you say, tripling it would be better. I think what we need in the way of an Army is more men trained to serve as officers.

I am sure if every Congressman were to receive thousands of letters from back home such as I have received during the past 3 weeks, they would not have to make any house-to-house call to be conscious of what the people think about the neutrality problem. I have had approximately 6,000 messages regarding the situation which exists here in Washington, and of that number not more than 25 are in favor of the President's program.

I am sure you will not object to my insertion of your very fine letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I feel that it is a message which should be brought to the attention of more people than myself, consequently I beg your indulgence in the liberty which I am taking therewith.

Believe me to be,

Most sincerely yours,

JOHN G. ALEXANDER.

In Hitler's speech of September 19 he asserted that Germany was going to respect the sovereignty and rights of Russia. Of course he is, because he fears their huge military machine. He did not fear Poland's Army, and you see the consequences. Shall we not beware?

It is terrible to be forced into a situation where we have to admit this, but we might as well face the cold, unpleasant facts of militarism in today's world.

Anyone who has really gotten down to serious study and hard thinking in this matter has doubtless reached the conclusion that there are only two answers to the question of war—only two methods whereby we may safeguard our peace—either the huge military machine, the way Russia has trod, or an international police force operated under a world-wide federation proportionally contributed by each nation for the purpose of maintaining peace and preserving law and order.

Under present world conditions the latter method is out of the question. Therefore, I assume the United States must, for its own peace and safety, pursue the former, as both of the above letters suggest. It is too bad we have to do so—too bad for such wastefulness to be necessary, but how else can we protect ourselves and preserve our freedom?

Our Heritage of Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK MURPHY, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Frank Murphy, Attorney General of the United States, upon the sesquicentennial of the Department of Justice of the United States of America, in the Great Hall, Department of Justice Building, Washington, D. C., September 25, 1939:

In Europe and Asia today, many of the mightiest nations on earth are engaged in arbitrating their differences by the mass destruction of human life. Here, we peacefully celebrate the one hundred and fiftieth birthday of an organization dedicated to the settlement of differences tolerantly, by the rule of reason, under laws that apply equally to all.

That record of impartial justice, impartially administered for a century and a half, is a proud inheritance of all of us who carry on the Department's work. And today, especially, it is a heritage to be guarded jealously. For on its preservation the safety of democracy itself very heavily depends.

Look at the history of the vanished democracies of Europe and of the autocracies that have risen in their stead. Of course, it is partly a picture of economic insecurity and social chaos, but it is also a picture of failure to keep the institutions and processes of democracy clean and efficient. It is a picture of democratic governments that failed not only to keep their people physically secure but also to keep the people's faith in the integrity and the efficiency of their government. And when that happened the governments at fault were inevitably swept away.

We cannot let that happen here. We have managed to keep for a century and a half a system of human living which, despite its imperfections, represents the goal of thoughtful men, great and humble alike, since the dawn of human history. The thinkers of today—those who love justice and liberty—are looking to America to keep that system safe in a world gripped by war.

Our great duty and obligation is to show that we are worthy of this trust.

With a steady purpose in our hearts, we must free our public life of everything dishonest and unclean. If there is one thing that a democratic people should not excuse in any democratic government, it is official corruption and crime. More than anything else, corruption destroys the integrity of government. More than anything else, it disheartens the people and kills their faith in government. And unless we stamp it out, unless we protect the integrity of government, we should not hope for democracy to succeed.

We have a duty, also, to protect and improve the efficiency of government—to provide the essential services effectively and economically. We know, in the main, how this can be done. We know that there must be freedom from the spoils system. We know there must be high standards and careful methods of choosing personnel, and a modern system of managing personnel once they are chosen.

There is no part of our job more important today than the protection of civil liberties. The world has been racked for many years by waves of intolerance that have destroyed the rights of minorities in other lands and reached even into our own midst. We are told by some that the way to recovery and peace is to crush one group or another that supposedly is to blame for all our troubles.

There is nothing for us in such a course but sorrow and tragedy. America was not built to its present greatness by intolerance, and we will not solve our present troubles by intolerance. We are one people—no matter how many the races and religions and nations that make up our population. Only as one people can we correct the conditions that are holding us back. But we will remain one people only as long as we religiously and meticulously protect the rights and liberties of every individual and group among us.

There is one final duty of this Department and of the entire Nation that I have in mind especially today. It is the duty of being alert and ready to cope with those whose aim or mission it may be to sabotage and undermine this greatest citadel of human freedom left on earth.

We are a nation whose creed is to live and let live. We practice the principles of equal justice and equal rights for all, regardless of race or creed or national origin. We have practiced those principles for a century and a half, even though we have known that by so doing we were giving the enemies of democracy a perfect field of operation. It is our intention to adhere to those principles. But at the same time we do not need to close our eyes to the fact that certain elements in our midst may be willing to take advantage of this situation—to use the protection of those very principles of equal justice and equal rights for all—to promote and foster a system under which the principles themselves would be utterly destroyed.

There are well-meaning individuals who fear that by taking action to protect democracy against that kind of activity we will in fact make inroads upon democracy.

I recognize the sincerity of that position, but I do not believe it is based on a realistic view of the nature of democracy. I do not believe that loyalty to democratic ideals precludes a democratic nation from bracing itself against realities in a world where, for the moment at least, might is the test of survival. I do not believe we would serve democracy by standing silent and apathetic while the agents of autocracy and subversive elements plan and scheme and work to establish a system that would mean the end of democracy and freedom and equal rights for all.

Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion—these things that are the very heart and soul of our lives can and must be preserved. But while preserving them we can be on guard against the enemy in our ranks and keep ourselves fully informed about their movements. We can be mindful of lurking danger and prepared to act wisely and judiciously, but firmly and effectively, when such action may be necessary to preserve our free institutions from undoing.

That, after all, is the sum and substance of our task—to keep freedom alive in a world where more and more of mankind are seeing freedom slip from their grasp. The voices of humanity call to America to avoid that fate. My conviction is that we will.

PRESS COMMENTS

One hundred fifty years of progress in the administration of American justice was observed on September 24, 1939, when the Department of Justice marked its sesquicentennial. The Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable Frank Murphy, addressed the employees of the Department of Justice on Our Heritage of Justice, on Monday, September 25, 1939.

"Upon this happy occasion the Department rededicates itself to the task of safeguarding human rights, civil liberties, and equitable justice," Attorney General Murphy said in a statement issued to the press.

The post of Attorney General was created by the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, which provided for a Supreme Court with a Chief Justice and five Associate Justices, a district court and a district judge for each of the States, and three circuit courts.

Gov. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, legal adviser to President George Washington, was nominated to fill the position at an annual salary of $1,500, and occupied the office of Attorney General in the Federal Capital in New York City.

With the removal of the seat of government to Washington, the various departments were housed in nondescript buildings grouped about President Washington's house. No accommodations whatever were provided for the Attorney General, who was expected to furnish his own quarters, fuel, stationery, and clerk.

In 1822 the Attorney General was furnished with his first official quarters—one room on the second floor of the old War Department building. There the office was maintained until 1839, when the Attorney General, whose staff now consisted of a clerk and a messenger, and who had acquired the nucleus of a library, moved into rooms located on the second floor of the Treasury Building.

Sixteen years later the office was removed to a brick building on the southeast corner of Fifteenth and F Streets. Here it remained until 1861 when, upon the completion of the south wing of the Treasury, a suite of rooms was provided on the first floor of the new addition.

Finally, after 81 years of existence, the office of the Attorney General had expanded to such an extent, both in functions and in personnel, that it became in reality one of the executive departments of the Government.

In recognition of this fact, the Congress enacted the law of June 22, 1870, which established the Department of Justice. Today the Department of Justice—the largest law office in the world—is housed in a spacious building, opened in October 1934, which occupies an entire city block between Ninth and Tenth Streets.

Today the affairs and activities of the Department of Justice are generally directed by the Attorney General who has, as his chief aides, the Solicitor General, the Assistant to the Attorney General, the Special Assistant Attorney General, six assistant attorneys general, the Assistant Solicitor General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Litigation, the Director of the Bond and Spirits Division, and the Administrative Assistant to the Attorney General.

In addition, United States attorneys and their assistants, United States marshals and deputies, personnel in the field offices of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, field employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, and others, are among the 11,000 persons employed by the Department of Justice.

Managing Editor, the United States News,
Twenty-second and M Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HIGGINS: You ask: "Are you, or are you not, of the opinion that under present conditions 'politics should be adjourned' while the administration attempts to discharge its grave responsibility to the people?"

I think the administration should abate its activity in domestic politics and direct its energies exclusively toward support of the President in keeping the country on an even keel. Partisan politics in recent months has centered around the President's vindictive assault upon Democratic Senators who would not do his bidding. The people in many States passed directly upon the "purge" proposals and rebuked the President. There were repercussions and reprisals in the session of Congress that followed. Much of the bad blood flows from those incidents and encounters.

The urge of the President for unity has not been apparent during the years that a state of war has existed in Japan, China, Italy, and Ethiopia. For years also a state of violence has been consuming Spain, yet there was no abatement of the political activities of the President. It is true that the war in which Great Britain, France, Germany, and Poland are engaged is on a larger scale, but international principles and rules are the same.

A clamor for peace in time of war is easily raised, and is usually raised, by those who wish to thwart the Government. Today's clamor for a wartime political truce, suddenly pushed into undue prominence, was obtruded upon the public notice so as to become the universal subject of conversation on next Wednesday, when the Congress meets to reverse the recently revised position of the Government in the matter of neutrality.

The United States is not at war and does not intend to become involved in the war of others. More than 90 percent of our people are determined we shall not be drawn in. The suggestion that we follow the lead of Great Britain and create at this time a coalition Cabinet is a part of the proposal that politics should be adjourned. But Great Britain did not enlarge her Cabinet until after Parliament had announced that a state of war exists, and even then those who were invited into the Cabinet were men whose fundamental views were shared by Mr. Chamberlain and his associates. There was an intraparty division. Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Eden held violently divergent views, it is true, as do Mr. Roosevelt and certain Democrats. If we are to follow the British pattern, we will wait until we are at war and will then invite Senators GLASS, BAILEY, and TYDINGS into the official family.

There are vitally important domestic problems to be solved. The evils which arise from innovations in an orderly government in the long run commonly overbalance the good. There are very great differences of opinion as to the wisdom of policies of government introduced by Mr. Roosevelt that concern the destiny of the country. Bona fide sine die adjournment of politics would mark the beginning of a dictatorship. If the country had not been convinced before the outbreak of war that the New Deal is determined to destroy the third-term precedent in order to continue Mr. Roosevelt in office indefinitely our people might feel differently about the proposed moratorium.

The surrender of restraint and of basic liberties of men is responsible for the war into which Europe has been plunged. In striving to avoid involvement in the second world war we must not make the mistake of joining the world movement toward concentrated executive power. If the situation is so grave that it justifies the suggestion of an adjournment of politics, the President should not bear the burden alone. Mr. Roosevelt is not neutral. He is not neutral in thought or in final purpose. He is partisan, emotional, and valorous. He could not long conceal his aspirations and designs.

The Congress should be either in session or on call. There is no unreasonable opposition in our Congress to legitimate government; there is no radical bloc; there is no trace of a Jacobinical principle, characteristic, or idea. It will be less practicable to have the semblance of a coalition of the two major parties in the executive branch than it would be to have a coalition of the executive and legislative branches. And in addition to being of greater practical value to have Congress a part of the working team, the presence of that body in Washington would give every congressional district direct representation.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES D. HILLES.

A Fair Farm Policy

OF
HON. SAM C. MASSINGALE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, made a most enlightening address on the floor of the House, dealing with farm prices and refuting the statements of those who advocate legislation of some sort to prohibit a further advance in farm products due to war conditions. As Mr. CANNON so clearly and ably pointed out, such suggestions come from those who are wholly unacquainted with farm conditions and farm prices and how the price of farmers' produce is fixed.

The farmer, of course, does not get anything near the cost of production or even parity for his produce, and is at the mercy of all kinds of cheap competition, market gambling, and other devices used to discriminate against him. It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I believe it timely to supplement several addresses I have made on the question of cost of production as outlined in my cost-of-production bill, H. R. 2371, now for the consideration of Congress and on which a petition is on file to withdraw it from the consideration of the committee and to have the bill brought before the House of Representatives for consideration. It seems that in the past few months, fairness to the farmer is beginning to be more and more the topic in internal economic affairs. The farmer cannot make the grade on the present farm prices or under the present farm act. The farmer only wants a fair farm policy giving him a substitute for the tariff which industry has enjoyed for many years on its products. This tariff enables industry to enjoy domestic prices at least as much higher than world prices as the tariff imposed on competing products amounts to for all those manufactured articles that are consumed in the United States. That is all that cost of production means, and I ask to have included in the record as a part of my remarks the following article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson:

This article by General Johnson is a clear and forceful statement of factual matters that should be convincing to any person who will read it.

FAIR FARM POLICY

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

The best argument ever made for some form of farm subsidy is that it is the "farmers' protective tariff." Agriculture produces more of some crops than the domestic market can consume. It has long had to sell a large part of these crops in competition with other countries with much lower living standards.

Many other industries enjoy domestic prices higher than world prices because of our high protective tariff. If they want to produce a surplus and export it they compete with the world at lower prices. But they get the higher domestic price for the part consumed at home. If the export prices are too low for profit they simply do not produce for export. They can do that because they can control production.

But the farmer can't. There are 6,000,000 separate producers. The amount planted does not control the amount produced. They turn out annually the vast surplus that nature and necessity dictate.

Now, when you have a surplus and continuing production of any product you can't get much more for your whole output than the market price of the surplus. With export crops that price is made abroad.

No tariff and nothing that a farmer can do can raise the prices of his product to the level of other tariff-protected products. This is true not only of his surplus but of his entire crop. He is the principal "unprotected" producer. He is outside our tariff walls when he comes to sell, but inside them when he comes to buy. He must take a low world free-trade price for what he sells and pay a highly protected price for what he buys. That subsidizes industry at the expense of agriculture. Agriculture could stand that during the period of free or cheap and virgin land. It can no longer do so. The farmer also must have his "protective tariff."

That is the argument. It makes a clear principle, but it doesn't tell half the story. Many varieties of governmental action besides tariffs have tended to raise the price of what the farmer buys, but not of what he sells—higher taxes, wages, freight rates, shorter work weeks, and social-security measures of all kinds.

For a long time nothing was done to equalize this politically imposed and impossible burden on agriculture. The New Deal has honestly tried everything suggested except outright subsidy. Yesterday this column described the nature and failure of these experiments.

Their underlying errors seem to be two. First, they try to get for the farmer a "tariff-protected price" on his whole production and do not restrict his "tariff benefit"—as industry is restricted—to the part consumed at home. Second, although they propose, by creating scarcity, to make the consumer pay that fair ("parity") price, they are unwilling frankly to face that necessity when scarcity doesn't appear. In that case they go to the Public Treasury. The first policy is unwarranted and unfair and the second is less than honest.

There is no consumer resistance to fair prices for farm products. All that is necessary to do is to let the farmer produce what he will at the best price he can get, but on that part of his crop used at home to levy a "farmers' tariff"—the difference between "market" price and determined "parity" price—and give him the money.

What does the consumer care whether he pays that price because of blundering, artificial scarcity or partly by reason of a tax? Nothing. But he cares whether our farm policy is fair and successful, whether it wastes millions, regiments agriculture, destroys food and foreign markets, busts the Treasury, and taxes him to buy cheaper food for foreign Nazis, Fascists, "reds," Japs, Germans, British, or French. The present cumbersome contraption does or threatens all these things. The simpler plan avoids them all.

We Should Agree Upon Thanksgiving Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, tentatively, it seems, there is an agreement that nothing is to be taken up in this special session, except the so-called neutrality legislation.

There is another matter, however, which should be considered at this session or it will be too late to avoid national turmoil and confusion. That is settlement of the question of what day is to be observed as Thanksgiving Day. For we now have the prospect of one day being observed in about half the States and another day in the other half.

The observance of an annual day of thanksgiving and prayer is a custom in America, older than the United States itself. In fact, the custom is more than twice as old as constitutional government in the United States. From 1621 to 1789 was 168 years; from 1789 to 1939 is 150 years.

SELECTED BY WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN

Historically, Thanksgiving Day has not always been on the same day of a month, nor even in the same month. The first Thanksgiving Day proclamation of George Washington, however, selected the last Thursday in November, possibly in keeping with the day appointed in the prayer book of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America.

Observance of that day was not uniform even then, until 1863, when Abraham Lincoln formalized the tradition of the last Thursday in November with a definite proclamation. So the last Thursday of November it has been until the year of our Lord 1939, when the present President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, without advance notice to church leaders, calendar makers, football coaches, college-term registrars, or Congress, announced that it should be on the third Thursday of November.

The resulting confusion rivals only the European war in public interest. While the Allies quarrel with the Axis-powers over who shall have Turkey, Americans wonder which day it is proper for them to eat turkey in their homes. Texas, the great State of Texas, Mr. Speaker, I understand is to solve the problem by observing both days and thus will attack turkey on both the third and fourth Thursdays of November.

Apart from the amusing aspects of the situation, however, the question raises some important questions. It calls for attention to the effect on things sacred as well as secular, on church programs as well as football dates and college calendars. The Congress, itself, should note the effect upon an act of the Seventy-fifth Congress—the naming of Armistice Day as a national holiday.

While the third Thursday is a shifting date, November 11 is not. The result is that where Armistice Day and Thanksgiving Day have been separated by from 13 to 18 days, they will be only 6, 7, 8, and 9 days apart through most of the next decade.

Consultation of the calendar yields these tables:

Comparison of old-style (Washington and Lincoln) Thanksgiving Days and new-style (Franklin D. Roosevelt)

	Last Thursday	Third Thursday
1939	Nov. 30	Nov. 23
1940	Nov. 28	Nov. 21
1941	Nov. 27	Nov. 20
1942	Nov. 26	Nov. 19
1943	Nov. 25	Nov. 18
1944	Nov. 30	Nov. 23
1945	Nov. 29	Nov. 22
1946	Nov. 28	Nov. 21

Number of days between Thanksgiving and Christmas

	Old style	New style
1939	24	31
1940	26	33
1941	27	34
1942	28	35
1943	29	36
1944	24	31
1945	25	32
1946	26	33

Number of days between Armistice and Thanksgiving

	Old style	New style
1939	18	11
1940	16	9
1941	15	8
1942	14	7
1943	13	6
1944	18	11
1945	17	10
1946	16	9

A study of those tables will suggest to every Member points to be considered, points related to the religious, social, and economic life of the country. The thing to keep in mind in studying those tables is that without agreement on the date, approximately half of the States will be following one date, and half the other. Clearly, whichever date is to be observed, there should be agreement.

For that purpose, Mr. Speaker, I have prepared and propose to introduce a bill to make the last Thursday in November of each year a public legal holiday in the District of Columbia and in all places within the jurisdiction of the United States. It would read as follows:

A PROPOSED SOLUTION

Whereas the Pilgrim fathers early instituted the custom of observing a day of thanksgiving and prayer; and

Whereas the people of the United States, continuing the custom in their homes and their churches, under selection of the first President of the United States, and under proclamation of the President at a time of great national crisis when national unity was greatly desired, have observed the last Thursday in the month of November as a national holiday of Thanksgiving: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the last Thursday of November in each year, being the day known as Thanksgiving Day, which shall hereafter be proclaimed by the President of the United States as a day of prayer and thanksgiving, is hereby made a legal public holiday within the District of Columbia and in all places within the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Since preparing this bill, I have learned that a resolution for a similar purpose has been introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REED]. It is entitled House Joint Resolution 383, and I may say that it is immaterial to me which proposal is considered. But I submit that legislation on this subject should be considered at this session, in order that the American people may conserve the fine traditions and values that have come from their observance of the last Thursday in November as our national Thanksgiving Day.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, a very interesting and scholarly study on the subject of legal holidays made by the Honorable William Tyler Page some years ago, and recently brought down to date. It gives in detail the legal holidays of the several States, and cites the Federal statutes on this subject. It will be found a most valuable statement for reference by anyone who studies the subject of legal holidays.

There was no objection. The matter referred to is as follows:

OUR LEGAL HOLIDAYS

There are no so-called national holidays. In creating a holiday, such as Christmas Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, etc., Congress by law made such days legal holidays within territory over which the United States has jurisdiction, usually in the District of Columbia, the seat of government. Then, as in most instances, the States in turn following the example of Congress have severally made such days legal holidays within those States; and where this has been done uniformly, days so made legal holidays have come to be called "National holidays." But there are no national holidays in the strict sense of the term. Congress, in May 1938, however, declared Armistice Day (November 11) a national legal holiday. Any State may or may not declare it a holiday within such State.

The chief legal holidays are:

January 1: New Year's Day, all the States, Territories, and colonial possessions.

January 20: Inauguration Day, every fourth year (District of Columbia only).

February 12: Lincoln's Birthday (Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, and Wyoming). In Massachusetts by Governor's proclamation.

February 22: Washington's Birthday (all the States, Territories, and possessions).

March–April: Good Friday, movable, dependent upon occurrance of Easter Day (Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Tennessee. In Connecticut Good Friday is usually proclaimed by the Governor as a day of fasting and prayer.

May 30: Decoration or Memorial Day (all States and possessions, except Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina).

July 4: Independence Day (all the States, Territories, and possessions).

First Monday in September: Labor Day (every State and Territory except the Philippines).

October 12: Columbus Day (Arkansas, Arizona, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wyoming, and Puerto Rico). In Kansas it is not a holiday as to courts or notes.

November: General election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Every State and Territory except Alaska, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Hawaii, Illinois, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Ohio, Philippines, and Vermont. In Illinois it is a legal holiday in Chicago and several other cities. In Ohio it is a half holiday. In Maine it is a legal holiday only as to the courts, which also close on the State election day (biennially, in even years, second Monday in September).

November 11: Armistice Day. A national (?) legal holiday by act of Congress, May 1938.

November: Thanksgiving Day (last Thursday in November, every State, Territory, and possession).

December 25: Christmas Day (every State, Territory, and possession.)

Under the negotiable-instruments law, every negotiable instrument is payable at the time fixed thereon without grace. When the day of maturity falls upon Sunday or a holiday, the instrument is payable on the next succeeding business day. In the United States legal holidays are fixed by State and Territorial legislation.

"Holiday" shall include Christmas, the Fourth of July, the Twenty-second of February, and any day appointed by the President of the United States or the Congress of the United States as a holiday or as a day of public fasting or thanksgiving. (Bankruptcy Act, U. S. Code, title 11, sec. 1.)

Holidays: The employees of the Government Printing Office shall be allowed the following legal holidays with pay, to wit: The 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 4th day of July, the 25th day of December, Inauguration Day, Memorial Day, Labor's Holiday, and such as may be designated by the President of the United States as a day of public fast or thanksgiving. (Act of Jan. 12, 1895, c. 23, par. 46, 28 Stat. 607.)

January 31, 1879 (20 Stat. L. 277). Holidays in the District of Columbia.

Chapter 38. An act to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia so as to make the 22d day of February a holiday within said District.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 993 (1) of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding to the days therein declared to be holidays within the District the 22d day of February; and such day shall be a holiday for all the purposes mentioned in said section: Provided, That this act shall not apply to the 22d day of February, 1879.

June 28, 1894, chapter 118. An act making Labor Day a legal holiday.

Be it enacted, etc., That the first Monday of September in each year, being the day celebrated and known as Labor's Holiday, is hereby made a legal public holiday, to all intents and purposes, in the same manner as Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, and the 4th day of July are now made by law public holidays.

Note: (1) The Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, here referred to, provide as follows:

"SEC. 993. The following days, namely: The 1st day of January, commonly called New Year's Day; the 4th day of July; the 25th day of December, commonly called Christmas day; and any day appointed or recommended by the President of the United States as a day of public fast or thanksgiving, shall be holidays within the District, and shall, for all purposes of presenting for payment or acceptance, for the maturity and protest, and giving notice of the dishonor of bills of exchange, bank checks, and promissory notes, or other negotiable or commercial paper, be treated and considered as is the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

And all notes, drafts, checks, or other commercial or negotiable paper falling due or maturing on either of said holidays shall be deemed as having matured on the day previous.

(Other acts make holidays of Inauguration Day, 1888, June 18, ch. 391, post, p. 592; Decoration Day, 1888, August 1, ch. 723, post, p. 600; and Monday, when either falls on Sunday, 1881, December 21, ch. 2, post, p. 331; and give per diem pay to employees, 1885, January 6, Resolution No. 5, post, p. 486, and 1887, February 23, Resolution No. 6, post, p. 574.)

American Law Enforcement

OF

HON. GEORGE M. GRANT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, we are all interested in West Point, Annapolis, and the Coast Guard Academies. We have right here in Washington another academy, which, under the direction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has just completed its twelfth session. This is the F. B. I. National Police Academy. While the Navy, Army, and Marine Corps and Coast Guard stand guard without, this army stands guard within—an army dedicated to law and order. The F. B. I. and the graduates of the National Police Academy are ready to meet the needs of this Nation in its task of internal defense. Under the guiding genius of J. Edgar Hoover, this army will keep America American.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, at the graduation exercises of the F. B. I. National Police Academy and reunion in the great hall of the Department of Justice Building, Washington, D. C., September 30, 1939, as follows:

This occasion marks the culmination of 3 months of hard work for you members of the twelfth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy. I know you must be happy with the thought that you are returning today to your respective communities. And if I may correctly judge from the enthusiastic manner in which you have carried on during the past 3 months, I know that you are anxious to return to your homes and begin to apply the knowledge you have gained here.

While this is a happy occasion for you, it is a sad one for those of us of the F. B. I. who have had the privilege of associating with you. There is a great deal of consolation however in the thought that this is the beginning of a new relationship which I trust will endure down through the years. You of the twelfth session have been particularly fortunate, since you have spent your last week in Washington with your predecessors of the other 11 sessions of the academy. You have had an opportunity to exchange experiences with them and they with you. This should be invaluable to you when you resume your duties. They have had to face obstacles and circumvent many pitfalls. Their achievements, yes, and their defeats, should be of material assistance to you, and it is a sustaining force to know that you have their moral and spiritual support. The men who have gone before have blazed new trails. It is for you to "go forth and do likewise." Still you must protect your ranks from the same influences that challenge the forces of law and order on every front.

Never before has American law enforcement faced such challenges as it does today. At no time in our national history has it had the opportunities which it has today to carry out its sworn duties—the protection of American life, liberty, and property. In a period of national emergency there are added dangers that lurk on every hand. Added stress, strain, and increased burdens are an open invitation to the underworld to further the interest of its own "invisible empire"—plunder and destruction.

American law enforcement must rise to meet the foe on every side. As never before, the national well-being calls for and demands self-sacrifice on the part of all of its public servants and the patriotic unwavering cooperation of all of its citizens.

Facing the underworld is one thing; facing organized efforts of saboteurs is another. It is unfortunate but true that there are those within our midst who enjoy the opportunities and liberties which American democracy guarantees them, and who openly preach its destruction. The first instinct of man is that of self-preservation. The first order of the day is the preservation of American ideals, traditions, and democracy. This demands that our internal defense be made secure. This is a new task that you and your fellow law-enforcement officers throughout the United States must face. In its discharge there can be no wavering. Failure means chaos. Once the termites gain access to a structure, its doom is inevitable. Once subversive forces which expound the cause of foreign isms undermine our ideal of government declared in the Declaration of Independence and defined by the Bill of Rights and the Constitution, then, indeed, we, too, can expect the horrors of a permanent blackout of everything which we have cherished. That is why I say law enforcement and America truly face an emergency.

It is a known fact that many foreign agents roam at will in a Nation that loves peace and hates war, a country which has proclaimed its neutrality in a strife-torn world engaged in mortal armed conflict. At this very moment, lecherous enemies of American society are seeking to pollute our atmosphere of freedom and liberty. They are our foes. Before them we will not capitulate. American law enforcement will rise to meet the challenges of the day. Already we of the F. B. I. have begun to feel the added stress and strain. At the present time complaints of espionage, sabotage, and neutrality violations are being received in great numbers. These require careful consideration and calm investigative attention. Never before has there been such urgent necessity for national unity and concerted action. We must put our house in order to meet every conceivable challenge. Certainly through a unified effort American law enforcement must stem the onrush of those who hide behind the very banner of democracy for protection. You know, and I know, that there are even native-born pseudo-American citizens as well as aliens who have sold their birthright for less than the proverbial "mess of pottage." They detest law and order. Their plan calls for its overthrow. Let us not give them the opportunities which they seek. Law and order in every section of the land is the best inoculation I know to protect ourselves from the scourge which they spread. There is an old adage, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do." Let us here and now coin a new one, "When in America, do as Americans should!" And it is high time that once and for all we erect walls of civic pride and individual responsibility which will forever protect us from the internal upheavals engendered by the fires of hate from across the seas.

This morning we can well give thanks for the wisdom and patriotism of an Attorney General—Hon. Frank Murphy—who recognizes the pitfalls that lie ahead and who has sought to gird law enforcement in its task of internal defense.

As you F. B. I. National Police Academy associates leave here today, I hope you will go out with the firm conviction that you have a job before you. Let constituted authority be responsible and do the job and remember that it is your task to intelligently apply your talents to insuring justice and doing your bit to maintain our national integrity. Every emergency that might arise can be reasonably foreseen, and now we are preparing ourselves to meet these emergencies in a sane, intelligent manner. Never again should we be caught unprepared in meeting situations as they arise. The Nation is safer from spies and saboteurs than it has been in time of war raging on any continent. It is far better prepared to deal with these matters than in the past. Let there be no hysteria, no unbridled trampling upon the rights of innocent persons; in short, let there be intelligent, sane, common-sense action instead of wild, fantastic witch hunts. Let us seek results and not headlines.

This of necessity requires training and the ability to meet situations as they arise. Upon you, then, devolves the responsibility of acquainting your fellow officers in your communities with the instruction you have received in the F. B. I. National Police Academy; and by the same token, as the opportunity arises, you should encourage the citizens of your communities to cooperate to the utmost with constituted authorities, but to refrain from the sporadic, haphazard, wild-eyed beating of tom-toms which is so often the case with vigilantes and others of similar ilk, who, all too frequently, are motivated purely by personal reasons.

The progress that has been made in lifting the standards of law enforcement has come solely as a result of police training, higher personnel standards, and the gradual freeing of law enforcement from the shackles of corrupt political domination. The surface, however, has hardly been scratched. The future lies before us. It alone holds the ultimate answer, which will be determined, I am confident, by your actions and the intelligent manner in which I know you will meet each task.

A job well done merits appreciation. If you are to lift the standards of law enforcement in your respective communities you must first of all discharge your duties in a manner which will merit public confidence. Every newly appointed officer should, of course, first be properly trained before he is assigned to duty. The mere issuance of a badge and a night stick is not enough. The test tubes of scientific crime detection have caught more crooks than the rubber hose ever has or will. To stoop to unethical and illegal tactics in reality brings one down to the level of the criminal himself. And it is not sufficient merely to train a new man; he must keep abreast of new developments throughout his career. Above all, police training must be kept on a practical level and imparted in a common-sense manner. It should always remain in the hands of law enforcement. In the past all too frequently police training has been handled by too many theatrical blatherskites whose only contact with crime has possibly been a trip to the county jail or the State prison, and in one case I know of the so-called police instructor's qualifications were limited to a penitentiary term. That, he held, qualified him to teach law-enforcement methods. You wouldn't want a tooth pulled by one who had been trained by a carpenter who was an expert at pulling nails with a claw hammer. Neither does our country want law-enforcement officers who have been trained by academic theorists who, in a quest for reality, have wandered from the protective cloisters of the classroom.

You will constantly be harassed by the vagaries of corrupt political domination. In this I can give you only one suggestion—have no part of any of the scheming chicaneries of those whose sense of greed and personal gain far surpasses their sense of civic duty for law and order. Let the facts alone determine the outcome of cases—let the chips fall where they may. You will be vilified by those who aline themselves with the underworld, but you can sleep at night and will have the respect and admiration of the law-abiding citizens of your community. That the right will triumph is a certainty. We in the F. B. I. have had to fight just such a battle. I know of instance after instance where you men of the National Police Academy have gone through the valley of despair but have emerged from the depths of corrupt political domination to the plains of decency because you have dared to stand by your convictions and have demonstrated that crime can be conquered.

Crime is a social disease. It must be treated as such. Like a cancerous growth, it must be cut out or burned out of the body politic. As you leave Washington today, do so with the determination that you will meet the challenges which will inevitably confront you with the full knowledge that the entire facilities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are behind you. We face mutual problems. Your achievements are our achievements, and they inure to the credit of all law enforcement. As a part of the F. B. I. you leave Washington with the best wishes of all of your friends, and as you leave, in addition to giving you our best wishes we give you our motto—Fidelity, Bravery, Integrity—may you cherish it as do we of the F. B. I.

ADDRESS OF HON. RAYMOND J. KELLY, NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I insert the masterful address of the Honorable Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, delivered on the occasion of his election to that exalted post by the national convention of the American Legion in Chicago, Ill.

The matter referred to follows:

Men and women of the American Legion, you have made me both proud and most humble today. More proud than any day I have known since we put on the uniform. Most proud that you have selected me to lead and to serve you.

It finds me humble in anticipation of the problems which this year will surely bring to our country and to our American Legion; more humble with the thought that the influence of the American Legion will aid in determining the destinies of this land far beyond the span of our own generation; most humble in the privilege presented to again serve my country.

This convention has placed certain mandates upon me. The many great national commanders of the past have blazed a sharply outlined path for me to follow. The expressed will of the Legion was their command; I pledge you it shall be mine.

A national commander is not chosen because of his efforts or desires. The activities of many friends and supporters who have confidence in him alone brings his election.

To thank these comrades of mine adequately exceeds the ability of words to portray. The obligation is a debt beyond the power of one man ever to repay. My eternal gratitude is yours.

For 20 years the American Legion has devoted its best thought to the welfare of our country. That it will continue to do so goes unquestioned.

For 20 years we have preached the doctrine of Americanism. We will continue to do so as long as we continue an organization. So shall we continue to preach adequate legislation to safeguard the well-being of our disabled comrades and their dependents. So shall we continue our struggle to achieve equal opportunity to earn a living for those comrades who are now innocent victims of economic maladjustment. Adequate defense of our land from enemies, foreign or domestic, is a sound pledge that we must keep; and the heritage of our free institutions, liberty and equality of opportunity received from our forefathers, must be guaranteed to those who come after us.

This has been the Legion's program. There is no reason for revision now that a score of years have passed. Always in conformity with the best interests of the Nation as a whole, it is our duty never to forget that the Legion owes a definite obligation to its membership. The Legion was founded upon the principle of service to the American veterans of the World War. It will continue to serve them.

But the Legion is more than that. It has gone beyond the treatment of what to it were internal problems. It has consistently broadened the field of its operations to serve the Nation as a whole.

The Legion says that the security and salvation of America transcends all other considerations. The security of the whole is the safety of each. Now, as never before, we must save our youth from being dumped into the bubbling cauldron brewed of Old World poisons.

The Legion insists that tomorrow must not be dedicated for our sons and daughters to the service of the red planet, Mars. To prevent this it is our job to preserve sober thought in an uncertain, liberty-destroying world.

As your national commander, I pledge myself to go from this convention and make known to our fellow citizens your mandate to keep our Nation out of any armed conflict overseas. Here we have conscientiously advised our fellow countrymen of the vital necessity of their maintaining a realistic neutrality policy. Attempting to cloak our neutrality with a biased belligerency must inevitably lead us straight into war.

Let us determine that a widespread and national forbearance resulting from measured and deliberate consideration of the problems of preserving peace will in itself erect a reasonable barrier against the suicide of our civilization by the sword.

As you return home may I urge you to be cool and deliberate in your pronouncements and actions. If you must become partisan, let it be solely an aggressive partisanship for the American way of life.

May God bless you as you leave here. May God guide me in the decisions I must make for you. As you depart rededicate yourselves to the duty of protecting our country; remembering an even more serious crisis confronts your homeland than that of 1917–18.

I pledge you my entire efforts will be devoted to the program of the organization we love and to the country it serves. Whatever sacrifice it demands I am prepared to make.

With God's help and your support, we shall again aid our country in reaching its objectives of peace for our people.

To this end, my comrades, I pledge the strength of my lasting devotion.

The Poll Tax as a Restriction on Suffrage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, at the close of the regular session last August I introduced into this Congress a bill to prohibit the collection of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting for any candidate for any national office. This practice still exists in 8 of the 48 States. It is a relic of reconstruction days and was used first by the Romans upon captured subjects. It was considered at that time as a symbol of servitude similar to that of "Passing under the yoke."

The following article from the New York Times Magazine of February 12, 1939, will be of interest to those who believe that our brand of democracy has no place for a property qualification as a prerequisite for voting. The article, written by Virginius Dabney, of Richmond, Va., follows:

SHALL THE SOUTH'S POLL TAX GO?—A RELIC OF RECONSTRUCTION DAYS REAPPRAISED IN THE EIGHT STATES WHICH STILL CLING TO IT

(By Virginius Dabney, Richmond, Va.)

From the crags above Harper's Ferry to the mesas fringing the Rio Grande a revolt is brewing against the poll tax. The strength of the movement varies in each of the eight southern States which retains the levy as a prerequisite to voting, but it is definitely a movement. It was well under way before President Roosevelt, in September, called for elimination of the tax, and it has since gained impetus.

Striking evidence of the revolt is seen in the unanimous action of the recent Atlanta conference of 29 southern capitalists, labor leaders, educators, editors, and others, who met under the sponsorship of the Southern Policy Committee, and called for the abolition of the tax as a prerequisite to voting. The question now is how soon the movement will grow strong enough to persuade the South to abolish the levy.

The poll tax has an ancient, if not always honorable, history. Aristotle refers to it as a "most ignominious imposition" which "none but slaves paid to their tyrants." It was levied by the conquering Romans upon the peoples they reduced to subjection and was considered at that period to be an earnest of servitude. A thousand years later Wat Tyler led the peasants of England in a bloody rebellion against the tax and, although the uprising was put down, many of its objectives were achieved. The franchise in England was less hedged about with restrictions thereafter.

Today in the South the people are not brandishing clubs or pikes, like those which Tyler's sturdy rustics brought into play against the English aristocracy of the fourteenth century, but the tide of revolt is rising. Louisiana and Florida have abolished the levy on the franchise during the past 2 years. An effort to repeal the tax in Arkansas received legislative approval in 1937, but was voted down by the people last fall. The only States which now retain the tax as a prerequisite to voting are Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Texas.

It is a striking fact that Virginia, the oldest American colony, had universal white manhood suffrage for half a century, beginning soon after the first representative assembly in the New World met at Jamestown in 1619. It is also noteworthy that this same Virginia, supposedly the seat of a preeminently aristocratic society, likewise had universal white manhood suffrage during the decade which ended with the outbreak of the Civil War.

The poll tax which Virginia and seven other Southern States retain today, either in their constitutions or on their statute books, is the fruit of the reconstruction era. Various restrictions upon the voting privilege were imposed in the form of property requirements and other similar limitations during most of the colonial and the antebellum periods, but the poll tax, as we know it, was framed late in the nineteenth century as a device to sunder the liberated Negro slaves from the polling booth.

After the orgies of reconstruction some such device was deemed necessary, for widespread electoral fraud had been resorted to by desperate whites during the postbellum years and well-disposed southerners considered such a situation intolerable. So, as the turn of the century neared, the Southern States began enacting franchise requirements which were, in most instances, technically legal. By the early nineteen hundreds every State below the Potomac and the Ohio had fallen into line. In addition to poll taxes, a variety of residence, property, and educational qualifications were imposed. Almost all the Negroes were effectively disfranchised.

But a substantial percentage of the whites also were disfranchised. If such was the intention of the framers of these constitutional provisions and statutes, the writer has been unable to find convincing evidence to that effect. On the contrary, such evidence as the writer discovered indicates that the restrictions were designed to let the whites vote but to prevent most of the Negroes from doing so.

Today, from a third to a half a century after these barriers to the ballot were erected, the number of persons of both races who are prevented by them from voting is enormous. That is particularly true in the poll-taxed States, where the number of whites participating in the business of electing candidates to office is by far the lowest in the Union.

In the Presidential election of 1936, for example, the 9 States which then had the poll tax sent only 24 percent of their adult citizens to the polls, whereas in the 39 other States 72 percent voted. Since the whites outnumber the Negroes by large majorities in all but 1 Southern State today, and in that one—Mississippi—the totals are virtually the same for the two races, it can be seen from the foregoing percentages that the proportion of whites who vote where the poll tax obtains is only a fraction of those who vote where it does not.

This is partly accounted for, of course, by the fact that there is a comparative lack of competition from the Republicans in the South, with a corresponding lack of interest, and by the further fact that there are other franchise restrictions in addition to the poll tax. However, it cannot be doubted that this levy, which ranges from $1 to $2 per year, bears a large share of the responsibility.

Evidence is obtainable through a comparison of the number of voters in Virginia, which has a poll tax, with the number in North Carolina, which repealed its tax 18 years ago. In 1936 the number of Virginians who voted for the various Presidential candidates was 334,000, whereas no fewer than 839,000 North Carolinians participated in the same election. The population of the Old North State is not much larger than that of the Old Dominion, and conditions in the two Commonwealths are similar. But the number of voters is always vastly greater in the former State than in the latter. The same sort of comparison may be made between Virginia and Kentucky, West Virginia and Maryland, each of which borders on Virginia, each of which has no poll tax, and each of which casts from nearly two to nearly three times Virginia's vote.

Why has the poll tax persisted in the South? There are various reasons. In the first place, the conviction persists in many parts of the region that this device is still necessary to the maintenance of "white supremacy." In the second place, the political leaders often favor retention of the levy, since those who have been chosen to office by a limited electorate naturally prefer not to risk the uncertainty of a contest in which thousands of new voters take part. Again, those interests which prefer to see political power remain in the hands of the "upper crust" of propertied voters, rather than in those of the masses, likewise back the status quo. Lastly, the attitude of the disfranchised whites has been, in the main, either indifferent or inarticulate until recent years.

What have been the political and social consequences of the levy? Those who favor its abolition say it has tended to encourage corruption, for the wholesale payment of taxes by political organizations is a common practice. Another result, they say, has been the partial atrophy of the democratic process, owing to limited participation by the people in that process. Another is that it has placed obstacles in the way of securing needed social and labor legislation in States where so many beneficiaries of this legislation cannot vote.

Arkansas and Mississippi still have no workmen's compensation law. Alabama and Florida have no law for the protection of women in industry, while Mississippi, Georgia, and Kentucky allow women to be worked 60 hours a week. Child labor legislation in the South is likewise considerably less effective than elsewhere, and the only Southern States with minimum-wage laws are Kentucky, Louisiana, and Arkansas, the first two of which have no poll tax.

That tax, it is argued, also makes movements for reform in State or local government more difficult than in regions where the tax is not levied. Political machines see that their followers' capitation taxes are paid up, with the result that when the ordinary independent voter becomes aroused a short time before election it is apt to be past the deadline for making the payment, or he may have to pay several years' back taxes before he can vote. In Virginia, for example, he must put up 3 years' tax, if his tax for that period has not been paid, or a total of $4.50, while in Alabama the would-be voter under 40 years of age can be required to pay his back tax of $1.50 for every year since he reached the age of 21.

There remains the question of the influence of the poll-taxed States in the councils of the Democratic Party. With the abolition of the two-thirds rule at the Democratic National Convention of 1936, the solid South was deprived of its power to block such candidates for the Presidential nomination as it deemed objectionable. As a sop to the region the Democratic National Committee was directed to formulate a plan under which the Southern States would, in the future, receive a "bonus" in the form of additional delegates, based on the total Democratic vote cast in those States. Since the poll-taxed States regularly cast far fewer votes than the others, they can have no hope of getting this bonus.

Those who favor abolition of the capitation levy contend that the tax might be justified if it could be shown that the States which have it enjoy a better brand of State and local government than those which do not. But they ask whether it can be seriously argued that South Carolina, Mississippi, or Georgia is better governed than, say, Connecticut, Kansas, or Colorado.

As for the maintenance of "white supremacy," they are unable to see that this issue is important any longer. Is white supremacy endangered, they ask, in North Carolina, which has nearly a million Negroes, and which abolished its poll tax in 1920? In that State every registrant for voting must demonstrate to the registrar his ability to "read and write any section of the Constitution in the English language." Under this arrangement hundreds of thousands of formerly disfranchised whites are exercising their right to vote, whereas the number of Negro participants in the elections remains small.

Those who favor retention of the poll tax feel that its elimination would ultimately endanger white dominance in the South, even if it did not have that result immediately; and they frequenly say that "if a man isn't willing to pay a dollar or two a year to vote, he isn't much of a citizen." Since, in the eight poll-taxed States, the proceeds from this payment go wholly or partly to public education, it likewise is argued that if the capitation tax were abolished the schools would suffer. But the poll-taxed States do not enforce collection of the levy, which is really a voluntary payment, rather than a tax. The consequence is that receipts from it are far below what they would be if it were a regularly collected head tax on every adult, proceeds of which would be devoted to public education.

Official figures on State suffrage tax receipts for 1936 give the following totals: Alabama, $306,675; Georgia, $289,976; Texas, $1,685,244; Virginia, $810,481; Arkansas, $300,631; South Carolina, $255,419; Tennessee, $655,470. Figures from Mississippi are not available, but it is clear from the foregoing that if a head tax were levied annually on every adult without relationship to the franchise, receipts would be two or three times as large as at present, with corresponding benefits to education. Massachusetts raised $2,650,526 in this way for education, welfare, and other local purposes in 1936, and Connecticut raised $2,254,641.

Those who favor the status quo in the realm of the poll tax likewise argue that in these days, when millions are on relief and other millions are crying for largess of one sort or another from the Public Treasury, it is unwise to throw the polls open to urban laborers, rural sharecroppers, and other underprivileged elements with possibly grasping tendencies.

Whatever the validity of this argument may be in other spheres, it certainly does not hold good as far as old-age pension schemes are concerned. This is because six of the eight poll-taxed States exempt from payment persons who have arrived at a certain age. In one, the exemption begins at age 45, while in four it begins at age 60. Hence, in the words of the Richmond Times-Dispatch, "the limited electorate of younger voters who have paid the levy will be swamped by the older voters who don't have to pay it, and who are apt to vote for weekly 'ham and egg' outlays to the aged—mere scrip-tease devices which are sure to break down in the end."

It cannot be gainsaid that the movement against the poll tax is gathering momentum. Not only is pressure being brought in the various States, but there is the possibility of a congressional enactment implementing the section of the Federal Constitution which guarantees to the people of each State a republican form of government. Under such a plan Congress would forbid any State to demand payment of a tax as a prerequisite to voting on the theory that such a demand is in conflict with the maintenance of republican institutions. It is probable that such an act could not be put through Congress, and if it were put through it might encounter an insurmountable barrier in the Supreme Court. At all events, the poll tax is under fire in the South.

The Cost of War

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

BROADCAST BY CAPT. EDDIE RICKENBACKER, AMERICA'S ACE OF ACES

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following broadcast by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, America's ace of aces during World War, September 26, 1939:

Men and women, fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters, young and old in every part of this great land, I come to you tonight without political ambitions or selfish motives.

I speak for myself alone as a private citizen of this country who loves his heritage, as well as the liberties and opportunities it offers, with a passion that knows no bounds.

Only 22 years ago we Americans entered the World War with a profound conviction that we were fighting for the preservation of democracy.

The close of the World War and subsequent events during these past 22 years have brought about the disillusionment and realization that the winner and the loser of such a conflict must suffer the consequences alike.

Our penalty, the same as that of other nations, was the complete disruption of our economic machinery, bringing about 10 years of depression—correctly named but grossly misunderstood.

There are millions still unemployed, billions of dollars are being paid in additional taxes, hospitals are still filled with thousands of veterans, wrecked mentally and physically—all of them once the flower of American manhood, someone's father, brother, or sweetheart, but all of them some mother's son.

The cost to the world approximated $250,000,000,000. With this staggering sum we could have built homes costing $2,500 each on 5-acre plots of ground costing $100 an acre.

We could have equipped each of those homes with a thousand dollars' worth of furniture and given such a home to every family in Russia, Italy, France, Belgium, Germany, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, England, Australia, Holland, and the United States of America.

We could have given to every community in those lands—of 40,000 people or more—a $2,000,000 library, a $3,000,000 hospital, and a $10,000,000 university.

And if we could have invested the balance that would have been left in a way that would have brought a rate of 5 percent annually, there would have been sufficient to pay an annual salary of $1,000 each to 125,000 school teachers and 125,000 nurses.

The cost to these United States, including direct and continued up to date, has totaled approximately $47,000,000,000.

If we placed this staggering sum into peacetime circulation, we would not now have millions of unemployed, plus the direct loss of 50,000 men, and approximately 250,000 casualties.

Well could we rid ourselves, with this vast sum, of the slums of our great cities, the misery and poverty that go with them.

Well could we multiply our opportunities of education and culture, through better and larger institutions of learning.

Well could we afford, not one, but several airports in every large city.

Well could we rid ourselves of the inadequate highways, narrow streets, and the constant congestion in every city, large or small.

Well could we multiply our airways, expediting the transportation of mail, people, and merchandise to and from every hamlet in this country.

Well may we remember the forgotten statistics of the World War.

Seventy-four million men mobilized, 10,000,000 killed, 3,000,000 maimed, 19,000,000 wounded, 10,000,000 disabled or incapacitated for the balance of their lives, 9,000,000 orphans, and 5,000,000 widows.

In view of these startling facts, who could wish for our participation in another world war?

Certainly, it could not be the mothers with babes in their arms, nor the fathers, wrinkled and weathered with age.

Certainly it could not be the middle-aged men and women with their vivid memories of 1914 to 1918.

No; but it can be the lack of knowledge and understanding on the part of our youth, coupled with the selfishness and greed of a few.

Let us not permit our boys and girls to be regimented into uniforms, carrying wooden guns, almost from the time they leave the cradle, but preserve for them the game of marbles on the street corner or in the alley.

Preserve for them the baseball game after school hours on the commons.

Preserve for them the opportunity for developing model airplanes and other happy pursuits.

Then, and then alone, need we never fear for men and women of character to carry on.

Let us realize a few more pertinent facts that have been smothered or forgotten by insidious propaganda from those people in the old world and their agents in our land.

There is no difference in the lack of reason for the war of today in the old world than that which caused wars that have been going on for centuries.

The same selfish reasons of greed and hate are responsible for the present catastrophe.

These same reasons—selfishness, hate, and greed—can well be responsible for our being involved again in a war of destruction of property and mankind.

Certainly I feel no ill will toward the people of any of the belligerent countries, and my heart bleeds with sympathy for all of them.

But this can be no justification to me for our involvement again, with its horrible consequences of the probable loss of millions of our young men, and billions of our wealth.

In view of my record during the World War, such a statement may well be questioned.

But it was the very nature of my experiences that has brought to me the realization that American soldiers and billions of American dollars have no place on foreign soil.

Should, however, this country ever be threatened with invasion by a foreign nation or nations—I shall gladly offer my services, my two sons, and any worldly goods I may possess to protect and guard our institutions.

It must further be remembered that, if this Nation becomes involved in the present European conflict, we should go into it, with the full understanding, that to be of any benefit, it will mean keeping a standing army in the Old World for the next 100 years as a military police force to prevent a repetition of the 1914–18 war and the present one.

I am convinced, with this further understanding, that the people of the United States would never consent to such an additional penalty for their participation.

I am not a pacifist in any sense of the word. I believe in preparedness to insure against foreign invasion, by having, primarily, a peacetime aviation industry, developed through peacetime service, that will give us an adequate military aviation reserve for defensive purposes only.

Regardless of who proves the victor in the present war overseas, remember always both victor and vanquished have completed their economic ruin for years to come.

Consequently, we need never fear an early attack on our shores. In the meantime it behooves the United States to establish her home defense.

With a strong navy, an air force of 25,000 pilots and 50,000 planes, no foreign government dare even think in terms of war against us, and if they should be so foolish, our people need have no fear of invasion.

With the moral fabric of the people of the Old World having collapsed, there can be only one result from this present conflict at its conclusion—no matter who wins.

With millions of the flower of their lands having been blown to bits or wrecked for life, with billions of dollars' worth of their property having been destroyed, revolution and revolution alone will follow.

Wars are the stamping grounds for revolutions, and revolutions are the stamping grounds of communism.

Let us guard against that happening here. With the vast improvement in destructive weapons, men, women, and children are being, and will be, destroyed 10 times as fast as during the World War.

We in America, in view of these prospects, may well recognize that our frontiers lie in the Western Hemisphere.

Let us develop our social, political, and commercial intercourse between our neighbors of the 21 republics to the south of us for the best interest of all concerned.

Let us guard against our economic structure being keyed up through promises of false prosperity.

Let us recognize that selfishness, greed, and hate might well develop an unsound economic structure—the collapse of which no democracy can survive.

Let those who profit through the development of such unsound economic structures and at the expense of other people's misery and mistakes—be they capitalists, politicians, or wage earners—bear in mind that they are in a great minority.

Let us maintain a sense of balance in thought and activity, even though it may mean for the moment, less in worldly belongings.

Or even let us keep in mind that we can well afford, through the maintenance of our absolute neutrality, to suffer even the consequences of lowering our standard of living for a short period of time to prevent happening here what is happening in the Old World.

Let us realize that the obligation of our leadership, be it capitalistic, political, or social, rests heavily on our shoulders in these trying times.

We who live in the land of abundance and liberty should be willing, through peacetime service and accomplishment, to maintain these liberties and independence—to prevent bankruptcy and starvation.

Today this country stands united, with few exceptions, on the major issue that is before us, namely,

KEEP US OUT OF THIS WAR

Congress is engaged in a discussion of a question where there is a division of opinion as to which course will positively keep us out.

There has come into the picture the use of conferences and the press for political purposes.

This discussion is growing in bitterness.

Already it has begun to divide our people by bitter charges and countercharges.

I can accredit a great number of people on both sides of this question as being perfectly honest in their views. And that is also true of members of our legislative bodies.

But if this disunity is to be stopped, and if we are to maintain a unified will to keep out of this war, this bitter discussion must be tempered with the view in mind that only through compromise can unity be maintained.

Surely it is within the powers of statesmanship to bring about this compromise and end this growing disunity.

It is disunity among our people that will do far more damage than the political advantages to be gained by either side or party.

Our true obligation is not only the destiny of our own children but all the children of America, who will be set back a hundred years in their opportunities, as well as the growth of American life, if we participate in this war in Europe.

And we of the general public have a right to call upon our statesmen—regardless of party or creed—to hold this country resolute to the one great issue of keeping us out of this war.

In closing, may I utter this fervent prayer—that this generation will, in its wisdom and mature consideration of this question of absolute neutrality, prevent posterity or future generations from condemning or indicting us as having legalized wholesale slaughter, murdered the flower of our youth, and massacred democracy.

It Will Keep Us Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, while men, women, and children are being blasted off the face of the earth the manufacturers of munitions and the implements of death glory over the possibility of profits which will accrue to them from the blood of the human race. And neither race, color, nor creed matters so long as these profits are forthcoming.

Although America seems resigned to the fact that we shall not cross so much as a duck pond, much less the Atlantic Ocean, to become embroiled in someone else's misery, the fact remains that a neutrality law of itself will not be sufficient to accomplish this purpose. Some factions claim that the present law should be amended or repealed, permitting the sale of arms, munitions, and the implements of destruction upon a cash-and-carry or some other basis. Others contend that the lifting of the present embargo would inevitably lead us into war.

It is not for the purpose of suggesting what kind of neutrality law we should have that prompts me to take the liberty of this writing. I have been obsessed with the thought, however, that, irrespective of what form our neutrality law ultimately takes, we need but play the searchlight of truth upon the issue to realize that we cannot remain at peace within our own country if the Congress neglects to place upon the statute books an enabling act thereto in the form of a permanent, merciful social security. It would prove the greatest single factor in maintaining peace in America, for happiness and contentment have never been on speaking terms with war and misery.

Though dwelling within one entity, this grave problem presents itself in two separate and distinct parts. A neutrality law of itself may exist for a time, but without social security throughout our land, it would soon disintegrate and die. If the peace of America is to be preserved and perpetuated, then it behooves this special session of Congress to take cognizance of this truth.

If the present neutrality law remains unchanged, we may lose a large part of the business which was being done with certain countries now engaged in conflict. If this be so, then we must find other outlets for these goods or suffer accordingly. It is most gratifying to know that these new markets lie within the borders of our own country. We need but supply the purchasing power.

If, on the other hand, the present neutrality law is revised or repealed, permitting the sale of the implements of war and bringing to America a large degree of temporary benefits, providing we do not become embroiled, then we must take immediate steps to cope with the economic catastrophe which would necessarily follow cessation of hostilities. A catastrophy which may descend upon us even sooner, as the exhaustion of foreign cash may quicken its reality. It therefore becomes doubly imperative that a form of permanent, merciful social security be enacted into law now. It would serve as a cushion against such an eventuality, minimizing its devastating effects upon our people.

If the munitions manufacturers can arrest the attention of the Congress with their pleas for bloody profits, then it seems perfectly justifiable to conduct a flank movement in the interest of all the people, by the enactment of a plan of social security which would prevent a black-out of peace in America. It may not be amiss to remind you that the membership of Congress cannot feign neutrality where the welfare of their own country is at stake, for no one knows better than the Congress that a remedy must immediately be prescribed which would alleviate the mire of misery into which we have already sunk and the bottomless pit of hell into which we might later sink. No better medicine could be given the patient than happiness and contentment.

Although it is not meant to dwell upon the inequities of our present system of merciless social security, other than to reiterate what you already know, which is, that the benefits derived therefrom are not sufficiently far reaching to be of substantial value, it may not be out of order to remind you that the lower standard of living legalized by it, will doubtless be lowered, because of the higher commodity prices which are already a reality.

Any person having one iota of concern for the welfare of his fellow man, desires a system of permanent, merciful social security inaugurated in our land. Why, then, has it not been done? Because everybody seems to be asking everybody else the same unanswered question, Where are we going to get the money?

If we could pick ten or twenty billion dollars per annum out of trees, our problem would be definitely solved. Business would boom overnight as a result of the spending of this money for the necessities and even some of the luxuries of life. But we cannot do this, because science has so far been unable to produce money trees. We must, therefore, look elsewhere for the wherewithal.

The fact remains, however, that the expenditure of ten or twenty billion dollars per annum, by people who do not now have 20 cents, figurately speaking, would result in many times this amount in additional business, because of its attendant turn-over. And now wealth would follow in its wake, through the purchase of goods and the hiring of labor.

Although we are wont to believe that business, both big and small, is hard-boiled and cold-blooded, the truth remains that business must work with a principle, either consciously or otherwise, if it is to remain in business. Business does not get money because it gives merchandise, but gives merchandise to get money. Business gives discounts to get money; business gives bargain sales to get money; business gives better services to get more business. Business must give to get, in accordance with a God-given principle, which had its beginning in the dawn of time. It invariably demonstrates success for those who work with it and ultimate failure for those who do not.

Since business would benefit directly by the expenditure of this money, then why can we not go to business to get it? Has it not been demonstrated that business must give to get? If business gives to get in all other respects and the principle remains unchanged under the plan I have in mind, then we may rest assured that it can and will demonstrate the same degree of success. We need but apply it to immediately appreciate its beneficial effects.

The principle of give to get, in legal form, has not been untried. Precedent, demonstrating some 20 years of successful existence, has already been established. Even more astounding is the knowledge that its application has demonstrated the same degree of success under a Federal law, now upon the statute books.

Although it was applied in the collection of funds, it does not constitute a tax, as we know it, but a contribution, earmarked and expended for a specific purpose. When this principle was first embodied in the enactment of a law in the State of Oregon, some 20 years ago, it required that all owners of automobiles contribute 1 penny upon each gallon of gasoline purchased. These contributions were earmarked for the specific purpose of building more miles of bigger and better highways.

The benefits accruing from the expenditure of these contributions in the building of these highways did not stop with the purchases of sand, gravel, lumber, steel reinforcements, machinery, and equipment, but directly or indirectly affected many interwoven industries and created new ones, including garages and service stations. It is a foregone conclusion that had it not been for the contributions upon the purchase of gasoline, the largest single industry in the world would still be in its infancy.

It is erroneously assumed that more miles of better highways have been the direct cause of the growth of the automobile and other related industries to its present gigantic proportions. But can we not go back to the cause or the medium by which these highways came into being? Were not the contributions upon the purchase of gasoline, the cause, and the highways the effect? Can we not go back one step further, that we may attain the saturation point of cause and effect in this respect? Is not the process of elimination reached when we can appreciate the truth that the application of the God-given principle of give to get is the ultimate cause for the successful existence of the largest single industry in the world? The application of this principle, as exemplified by the so-called gasoline tax, has created enormous wealth and brought economic security to millions of our people.

Prior to the enactment of the so-called gasoline-tax law, the average price of gasoline throughout the United States was 30 cents per gallon. Today, the average price of gasoline is 19 cents per gallon, including a contribution, or so-called tax, of 5 cents. This total price is 37 percent lower than it was 20 years ago, when gasoline sold at 30 cents per gallon, without a contribution.

It has been claimed that any plan which proposes that a contribution of 2 percent be levied upon all business transactions would bankrupt and paralyze the country. The knowledge, however, that the State of Florida tolerates with signal success a 40-percent contribution upon a specific business transaction leads me to predict that it is not the enactment of a 2-percent contribution upon all business transactions which would wreck the country, but the repeal of the present 40-percent contribution upon the purchase of gasoline.

In conclusion, may I again remind you that the enactment of a permanent, merciful social security as an enabling act to any neutrality law, would bring peace to America and dissipate the possibility of involvement in foreign entanglements. The continued healthful existence of the American eagle, emblematic of these United States, lies in the immediate enactment of the Townsend plan. It will keep us out of war!

The Duty of Congress in World War Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago the remark was made that Congress should pass neutrality legislation and then go home. I do not agree with that viewpoint. Congress has a duty in the world-war crisis. Congress should stay in session, and as conditions change Congress should be ready to meet the new problems and contribute, so far as legislation can do it, to a policy that will keep America out of foreign entanglements and out of foreign wars. Congress has that responsibility, and by remaining in session can best discharge it.

Walter Lippmann has contributed an interesting article in the Washington Post for September 30. He discusses world-war problems, the effect of legislation that will be passed by Congress, and the duty of Congress at this time. His article follows:

No one need spend any further effort arguing whether Congress should remain in Washington for the duration of the war. The question is settled. The bill reported to the Senate disposes conclusively of the idea that the direction of American policy is to be left to the discretion of the President. The bill is so drawn that Congress could not, even if it wished to do so, adjourn and go home. For the bill will impose new and drastic embargoes on American shipping to virtually all parts of the world and upon American finance and commerce in the bulk of its foreign transactions. The administration of the embargoes in order to make them workable, in order to protect American interests from unnecessary injuries, and in order to mitigate the losses will require continual and detailed attention by Congress. The legislature will have to be at hand not for the purpose of making speeches every day but for the purpose of watching the practical effects and of understanding the real situation as it develops and of consulting about the actual operation of the law. A procedure will have to be worked out by which the administration and Congress can effectively discharge their responsibility.

But while it is now settled that the President is not to have a free hand in foreign policy and that he can exercise his powers only by remaining closely accountable to Congress, it is not yet clearly settled that Congress is fully prepared to play its great part. That will not be settled until it has been made perfectly evident in the coming debate that the Congress really means to accept the responsibility of debating and deciding great issues. The country has made plain that it does not wish to leave its destiny to the personal judgment of the President; but it would be jumping out of the frying pan into the fire to submit the decision of these great issues to the letter writer, the radio speakers, the lobbyists, and the organizers of mass meetings and parades and demonstrations.

The Congress has accepted its constitutional responsibility for the peace and security of the American people; it will not be equal to that responsibility unless it reaches its decisions by the conscientious and fearless examination of the evidence and the argument presented in the actual debates. Congressmen must listen to their constituents who express their opinion, but if they are to be worthy of the respect of their constituents, each Congressman will have to say what Edmund Burke said to his constituents—that "his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. * * * They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your Representative owes you not his industry alone but his judgment; and he betrays you, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion."

This conception of the duty of the elected legislator is the very heart and soul of representative government. Let the legislator abdicate to the executive, and there is personal government; let him abdicate to the pressure of crowds, and there is government by agitators and demagogues. The legislator cannot, without betraying free government, abdicate his right and his duty to follow his own best judgment in the light of his own conscience.

Happily, that is the view adopted by the American Legion in its convention in Chicago, that it is the task of the citizens to say that they want neutrality and noninvolvement, and a wholly adequate armament, but that it is the task of the Congress and the administration jointly to determine the means. The Legion has given the people a wise example. It has recognized that citizens can declare, for example, in favor of increased national defense, but that citizens cannot make blueprints for new battleships; it has recognized equally that citizens can declare for a policy of neutrality, but that they are in no position to determine whether, for example, an embargo on finished arms or an embargo on ships and finance is the better means.

The character of the armaments and the structure of the neutrality legislation cannot be determined by letter writers and by the radio audience. That is responsible and technical work which calls for first-hand information, for study and reflection, and for thorough discussion among men who are able to know all the facts.

It is a work that Congress cannot evade by counting letters, reading the result of polls, and trying to make its decisions conform to the winds of opinion. The people can speak to Congress about what they want accomplished. As to how it is to be accomplished, Congress seeks to incite pressure which prevents the Congressmen from using their judgment; that bloc is violating the spirit of representative government.

Much is at stake in this debate. Not least among these things is whether representative government is to prove itself equal to the great task which has to be done. If the debate is protracted into a filibuster, if it ceases to be honest deliberation and becomes a contest in the incitement of popular emotion and the encouragement of pressure groups, then whatever the final outcome, the country will suffer. It will suffer because it will have to face the grave perils that lie ahead without a government that can be relied upon, without leadership that it can confidently trust, without the unity that is the one final, sure guaranty of its security.

That must not happen. It will not happen if Congress will debate the measure before it, decide the issue when every responsible legislator has had his say, and then remain continually on guard to deal with the effects of its measure, and with developments that cannot now be foreseen.

America's Destiny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SERMON BY THE REVEREND C. J. GUNNELL, B. D.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following sermon delivered at Christ Episcopal Church, Waterloo, Iowa, on Sunday, September 10, 1939, by the rector of the church, the Reverend C. J. Gunnell, a veteran of the World War and chaplain of Becker-Chapman Post of the American Legion. The sermon, based on the text "The Twilight That I Desired Hath Been Turned Into Trembling," Isaiah 21:4, is a splendid statement of the duty of America in the present European conflict:

The twilight time in Babylon of old was a time of refreshment and ease. The hours after sunset were the valued hours of the day. All day long the sun would beat pitilessly upon the streets and buildings of the city. All day long the continual glare of the vivid sunshine would blind the eyes; in the evening the inhabitants of Babylon, wearied by the sun glare, would welcome the time of twilight, when in the coolness they could rest and refresh themselves.

The twilight hours in Babylon were the coveted hours of the day. However, in a time of siege the twilight hours became hours of dread. It was then that the hated enemies of Babylon, the warriors of Elam and Media, could make their death-dealing attacks under cover of the deep, dark shadows and the vague half light of twilight time. The prized twilight time could easily be turned into horror and trembling.

So many of us today in America, after observing the rush of the mad events in Europe of the past few days, can voice the sentiment of the inhabitants of old Babylon: "The twilight that I desired hath been turned into trembling." We doubt if there ever has been a time such as this—a time when men and women everywhere have been so eager for the solution of the problems which are causing uncertainty amidst world-wide distress. All of us these days seem bent upon the search for counsel which shall in wisdom guide us through these perilous days.

The twilight has descended upon us—a twilight of indecision—a state of blurred vision when we halt between two opinions. When we know not which path to take and we become the easy prey of every fearmonger; when the multitudinous voices of the propagandists cause us to tremble; decisions are hard to make simply because the issues are not clear.

The twilight has been turned into trembling. My friends, this is particularly true in regard to our national policies. We are undecided what to do. Decisions are hard to make. The issues are so confused. What shall our national course be? Where are the safe channels between the sharp rocks and the treacherous shoals through which may be guided the old ship of state? These are the questions which confront us, and we know not what to do. The twilight is so hazy and is full of trembling.

May I say that through the twilight gleams the true clear light which has guided us through the years and will guide us now? Allow me to say there is only one true course to take and the issues are quite clear. The time has come when we who call ourselves Americans should strive to ascertain America's true destiny in the world of nations. Shall we again be disobedient to the heavenly vision? Shall we once more "entangle ourselves in foreign alliances"? Shall we again retard our national progress by clouding our path with the fogs of Old World hatreds and animosities?

Has America a destiny in the world? What is her mission and her destiny?

May I ask you to bear with me a few minutes while by way of illustration I recount an experience which was recently mine. Two years ago, together with a few hundred Legionnaires, I journeyed through the battlefields of France. We viewed the fields of white crosses in the awful valley of the Meuse Argonne. We stood in awed silence in the shell-pocked fields and valleys adjacent to the city of Verdun. We saw the ravishing work that explosives and the fire of big guns could do to forest, bluff, and field. One evening, returning from Montfaucon to Verdun, we journeyed through the most terrible valley in the world, the Ravin de la Mort, the valley of death. In this valley, less than 10 miles long, over 1,000,000 men were killed during the Great War. Here in this valley Old World hatreds and Old World jealousies and animosities had slain more than a million of the flower of humanity. As we journeyed through this valley, our thoughts were not of this valley of death but of another valley close to the village of Bethlehem, in the Judean hills, when on another night God gave a message of peace to the world; when startled shepherds heard the angelic message for which a troubled world had long been waiting. A message which would guide men in the way of peace. To wondering shepherds in a quiet valley in the hills near Bethlehem came God's message for humanity, "Peace on earth to men of good will." The Heavenly Father's guaranty of peace if only men would practice good will.

Here near the fortress of Verdun in this valley of death was man's answer to God's message of peace to men of good will. What was the answer? Written here in the valley of death with the blood of a million men was the awful answer. War through ill will. Death through hatred, malice, and greed.

Returning to Verdun, we saw the preparations being made for another great conflict—a conflict which even now rages. Once again the choice flower of the manhood of Europe is being offered as a sacrifice to the fanged jaws of the molech of war, a tragedy beyond words to describe.

Several days later we found ourselves viewing through our tears the Statue of Liberty and the beloved shore line of America. After our journey through the battlefields of France, we faced America as pilgrims—pilgrims who viewed a new land: A land where men of various races and faiths could live together in freedom and friendship. Briton and German, Jew and gentile, Roman Catholic and Protestant were living together in this land in peace and friendship as brothers.

Is there another land in this wide world where men of all races and creeds are living together as brothers?

Surely Almighty God has reserved America for a divine purpose. Her destiny is a glorious and an enviable one. After this present conflict is over, this war which is now known as the second World War, one nation will have to guide the nations into the way of peace. Dare we proclaim that God has reserved for America the divine privilege of leading the nations into the way of peace and establishing among men the old landmarks of democracy?

Is there another nation capable of doing this? Not one. If this is America's destiny, dare we prostitute our forces by selling our birthright for an uncertain mess of pottage? Dare we in the face of our mission join with Europe's perennial hatreds and jealousies? The social and economic problems following in the wake of this second World War will undoubtedly be much more difficult to solve than those of the first World War. Twenty years or more is too short a breathing space between wars, and many problems which have arisen as the result of the last war still clamor for solution. Let us not allow the propaganda now being issued in America to stir us to hatred. Rather let us listen for the still small voice of God, the only voice capable of guiding us on the same paths of peace.

What, then, shall we do? Let us keep our heads clear, our hearts tender, and our knees bended in prayer. We will need clear heads and tender hearts in the days that are to come. We will need to pray more fervently that God may keep us cool and sane. There is a light to lighten the national path—the bright, unfailing light of God, the true light of the world.

After all is said and done, national greatness does not necessarily depend upon the extent of territory over which its authority spreads, but is found in the character of its policies. The two greatest nations of antiquity insofar as their subsequent influence upon human affairs is concerned were the Greeks and the Hebrews. Greece and the Holy Land were small countries. Both of these peoples had a national vision. Greece's vision was that of an ideal state, and the Jews' vision that of a righteous state. The world is richer because these two nations strove to be true to their visions.

God has had a hand in molding the vision and destiny of this Nation. This Nation was not brought into being by a haphazard set of fortuitous circumstances, nor was it by chance that our forefathers were guided to these shores to found here a nation "conceived in liberty." It was not merely by chance that the motto emblazoned on the national standard bears the sacred words "In God we trust." By faith in God and the brotherhood of man this Nation has survived when other nations have failed. America has a glorious and a privileged destiny. For does she not stand as a model today for all the world to note that it is possible for men of varying creeds and nationalities to live together under God as brothers? This is her divine destiny. Is the twilight so dim or our hearts so fettered with fear that we fail to see the clear light burning in the eastern sky?

Are the clamorous voices of the world so loud or are our ears so deaf that we hear not the voice of God declaring, "This is the way; walk ye in it"? Do the forces of hatred cause us to fear? Then the force of love must dispel the force of hatred.

Through the darkness gleams the light which can illuminate this dark world—a light which points the way. The forces which have bound together the various peoples and creeds into one great nation are the forces which will keep this Nation strong. They are the forces which will redeem the world—the two great essentials of democracy, love and brotherhood.

America's destiny is a divine destiny to point the world to these two great essentials and save the world from self-destruction.

Surely America's destiny is a glorious one: "To heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised"; to create among nations the will and the way to universal peace.

Who Opposes Neutrality?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, here in Washington the thinking is so muddled, so confused, that it is like a ray of sunshine on a muggy day to pick up any one of many dailies or weeklies that are published in the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan, and read an editorial reflecting the views of the folks back home and disclosing that they are not fooled by the phrase makers, the flag wavers, the legalistic lingo of the folks here in Washington.

As an example of this sane, clear, straight thinking let me quote the editorial written by Mark P. Haines and published in the Sturgis Daily Journal of September 16, 1939. That editorial is as follows:

WHO OPPOSES NEUTRALITY?

Senator BORAH in his radio address Thursday night declared flatly that the President's plan to repeal the embargo on the sale of arms and munitions to European powers that are able to come and get them and pay for them in cash "will unquestionably constitute intervention in the present conflict in Europe; that laws and statutes and proclamations are not and will not be sufficient to maintain successfully a policy of neutrality. Only the united will of the people can accomplish this difficult task."

No one doubts that there are powerful influences at work in this country and other neutral nations to make this another world war. Greatest of these is the international armament industry, a business that depends for its profits upon bigger and better wars. Evidence is not lacking that the conflict now raging in Europe was instigated by armament firms that know no nationality and admit responsibility neither to man nor God.

Pierre Van Paassen, noted foreign correspondent, in his recent book, Days of Our Years, describes in graphic and convincing fashion how the infant Nazi party of Adolph Hitler was sponsored by French, German, Czechoslovakian, and British armament manufacturers. Answering his own question, "Why should Hitler have received French, Czechoslovakian, and British money?" Van Paassen says:

"The answer is simple. One needed but read the Fuehrer's book, Mein Kampf. In that document the upstart party leader, with scarcely 10,000 followers at the time he wrote the book, announced that his first task upon attaining power would be to rearm the Reich. Did not such a man deserve international sympathy and support? Armament factories all over the Continent were standing idle, dividends were sinking, stock quotations going lower and lower. And not a cloud on the horizon to give the deadly armament industry a little spurt, no danger anywhere to warrant the manufacture of a single gun. Would it not be a godsend if Hitler could come to power and make Germany dangerous once more? Wouldn't that be sufficient excuse to kill all this nonsense in Geneva about world peace and disarmament? Once Germany started to rearm, all could follow suit. For the primary condition of a general armament campaign is the rearmament of only one powerful state. With Germany on the way 'the tragic and ridiculous spectacle' (as François Delaisi called it once) of nations arming because they were afraid, and afraid because they were arming, could start all over again." The writer adds: "The French metal industry agreed to the rearmament of Germany as early as 1925, as being the only condition for the stimulation of the inner French market."

Appalling as the thought may be, does anyone doubt that American manufacturers of guns, explosives, airplanes, and other war supplies would be in a position to realize huge profits if the President has his way and the arms embargo is repealed?

In view of the international ramifications of the armament monopoly, it is not inconceivable that American boys, if they are again sent to fight Europe's wars, will be shot and killed with guns and bullets manufactured in the United States. It happened in the recent Spanish war, where it was disclosed that German and Italian manufacturers of war supplies had been selling guns, tanks, and munitions to both sides in the civil conflict, although Italian and German troops were fighting with Franco's forces against the Loyalists.

In court procedure in this country a man who procures and sells a gun to another man knowing that he intends to use it to commit a murder becomes an accessory before the fact, and, if convicted, is liable to drastic penalties. What is true of the individual is true of nations. If the United States undertakes to sell guns and war materials to European nations it becomes an accessory both during and after the fact of mass murder.

Of course, war will stimulate certain types of business in this country. It will improve business in the same way that an earthquake does, by making it necessary to rebuild a devastated city, with this important difference—an earthquake is an act of God, a war is an act of men gone mad.

Newspaper dispatches from Washington state that the prospects for repeal of the embargo on arms have been greatly enhanced by the upturn in business since war was declared. If this is true, and it probably is, we'll be fighting and dying shortly to make the world safe for the munitions makers. Then, indeed, we will have a world that will be an "Idiot's Delight."

So far as I can see, there is no reason whatever why this country should engage in the present war. If this is still a government of the people, for the people, there is no reason why people throughtout the country should accept the dictum of our American internationalists that war is inevitable.

Senators and Congressmen are still your representatives. They are yet where you can get at them. It is within the power of the people to call upon them to keep us out of this war and to tell them, in no unmistakable terms, that if they permit us to be drawn into it, you, the people, will see to it that they stay at home after the next election rolls around. Let those Representatives and Senators who oppose your views know what it is that you want, for, after all, they are your servants.

This Country Must Maintain Strict Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Government of our country is facing a great crisis; that the Members of the Congress have been called to the Capital to consider our national policy and the course that the people of this country shall follow in dealing with the great nations now at war—a war in which the fate of civilization is at stake. The form of our future Government may depend upon the course that we decide upon at this session of Congress.

In making this momentous decision let us follow the precepts and examples of our first President, who guided our Government through the perilous times of the first years of its existence, when our small Nation was surrounded on every side by the territory of foreign countries—the British in Canada to the north, the Spanish in Florida to the south, and French in Louisiana to the west.

President Washington firmly established the principle of neutrality as laid down in his proclamation:

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands, of the one part, and France on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:

I have therefore thought fit, by these presents, to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers, respectively; and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and, further, that I have given instructions to those officers, to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations, with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the 22d day of April 1793, and of the independence of the United States of America the seventeenth.

G. WASHINGTON.

Our country in following the principles wisely established by our first President, George Washington, and the great doctrine promulgated by President Monroe, has kept this Nation free from foreign entanglements, and can be credited in a large measure to the preeminent place our country has attained among the world powers.

Let us strictly adhere to the principles of neutrality, that we may preserve for ourselves and our children the blessings of liberty, security, and happiness, the safeguard of good government.

America Must Stay Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the people of America are demanding of their Representatives in Congress to keep them out of war. That is the primary job of this special session and of all subsequent sessions until this war is over.

But we cannot just fold our hands and say, "We are going to stay out of war." If we try that, the devil of propaganda is certain to find some work for our idle hands to do. What is necessary is, first full understanding of all factors in this situation both on the part of Congress and on the part of the people; and second, a dynamic program of active work for a just and lasting peace and for the strengthening and perfecting of our democracy and the economic situation of our people here at home.

America's job is to have something in the way of real salvation to offer to a war-torn world. America's job is to keep alive the faith that God's laws still operate even in this darkened world.

LEST WE FORGET

It is important to remember our mistakes. Twenty-two short years ago Americans were making huge profits out of a European war. Our soldiers were following our goods and products across the ocean, many of them never to come back. Twenty-one short years ago that war ended and America woke up, too late, to find that she had fought a war which did not end war, or save democracy, or even create a lasting peace, but which ended in a treaty that was to sow the seeds of another war and of new dictatorships. Shortly after the war—in May 1920, to be exact—the financial interests which during the war had strengthened their hold on our economic life deliberately created a monetary deflation which brought unemployment to millions and disaster to American farmers. The people had lost their jobs, their incomes, their sons. But war profits had made some of our biggest corporations larger and more powerful than ever, and the money lenders had profited by creating the money with which the Nation fought the war. So we had two kinds of war profiteering. The one, which most people knew about but which was never effectively checked, resulted from profiteering at the expense of American consumers as well as from the sale of war material at exorbitant prices. The other, which most people did not know about or understand, resulted from the Nation borrowing its own credit from the private banks. The deflation of 1920, deliberately created by the banker-controlled Federal Reserve Board, gave the holders of Government bonds—and, indeed, all creditors—a very substantial increase in the buying power of the interest and principal they collected; this at a time when the rest of the Nation was being plunged into a depression from which agriculture, at least, has never really recovered.

Lest we forget, the war also gave us the basis on which the financial excesses of the twenties could develop. It brought an unhealthy flood of gold to America and promoted the stupendous lending spree of our financial oligarchy, which caused the stock-market boom and ended up in the crash of 1929. It also brought about the collapse of the international gold-standard system, which pulled the whole world into the mire of depression after it.

These are things to remember. They are not things to repeat.

DEPRESSION, THE REAL CAUSE OF WAR

And now there is this new war, already called the second world war. One cause of it undoubtedly is the Treaty of Versailles, which was not really a treaty of peace but one of revenge, though it was probably no whit worse than what Germany would have imposed had she been victorious. But anyone who followed post-war developments in Europe was compelled to see that a revision of the Treaty of Versailles was inevitable; that it would have come even without Hitler; that the British and French were gradually realizing the stupidity of their policy of trying to keep a great and intelligent people in perennial subjection.

Many people are blaming Hitlerism for this war. But just to the extent that they are correct in this, to that same extent the depression which made Hitler possible in Germany must be regarded as a still more fundamental cause. For it is necessary to remember that Hitler's rise did not really begin until German trade had been destroyed by deflation; until her financial system was paralyzed by the sudden stoppage of foreign lending and the flight of capital from Germany; until her domestic economic life was wasting away, with 7,000,000 people—one-third of all Germany's workers—unemployed. Depression and unemployment, confusion and insecurity, plus the persistent deflationary policy of the Government, thus primarily produced Hitler's dictatorship, as they produced dictatorships in several other European nations.

It is important that the American people keep constantly before their eyes the grim picture of economic distress and depression as the basic causes of Hitlerism and of other forms of dictatorship. Every democracy, our own included, will run the risk of the loss of liberty just so long as they refuse to solve their economic problems. It is evidently ridiculous to assume that military defeat of Hitlerism will in itself accomplish this solution. It is equally certain that any nation which is at war must suspend all social and economic progress, and many elements of democracy itself, for the war's duration. It therefore becomes the primary duty of American ingenuity and insight to solve those problems and make democracy the dynamic force which it ought to be. If we succeed in this task, we may yet make the world safe for democracy. But we can do it only if we stay out of the war.

DICTATORSHIP, DEMOCRACY, AND THE ECONOMIC PROBLEM

Irrespective of who wins this war, the gold-standard finance capitalism which ruled economic life prior to 1929 will almost certainly be destroyed by it. Some substitute will have to be found for the economic practices whereby an international financial oligarchy substantially controlled the fate of civilized nations by means of a gold-standard monetary system down to the time of the great depression. Two alternatives are possible. Either this substitute will be worked out by democratic method and within democratic institutions or else it will be done by dictatorship and attended by the loss of liberty. Germany under Hitler has instituted a new economic order based upon complete regimentation, the rigid control of production, consumption, prices, and wages. Germany has thrown overboard all pretense of being orthodox in monetary matters and has attempted to provide an increase in the volume of the means of payment which would be commensurate with the increase in production. The fact, however, that she has not yet broken with the tradition of borrowing the nation's money into circulation necessarily means that she has thus been increasing her national debt at a very rapid rate. Current changes in Germany's financial system should be given the closest study.

In all fairness it should be said that Germany, as did Russia before her, has apparently succeeded in putting all of her human and material resources to work in full production. The essential thing which Americans should not overlook, however, is that the success of Germany in bringing this about has not been due to the regimentation of her people's lives and economic activities, but to the simple fact that she has been regularly and boldly injecting new buying power into the purchasing-power stream to finance Government orders for rearmament and public works. It is also essential to realize that the volume of outstanding money was rigidly controlled by an ingenious system of forced loans, taxation, and the virtual prohibition of private investment. Insofar as Germany's "full production" has been based on a vast increase in armament, it is essential to point out that it could not result in an increased real income for the people, and that, barring some miraculous intervention, war would, on the contrary, become inevitable.

This is not the way the democracies should try to solve their problems, though it contains a great lesson. Of course, the British and French are now forced to institute quasi-dictatorial governments of their own and to put every ounce of their strength into the production of war goods. But evidently the substitution of wartime dictatorship is no step at all toward working out this economic problem in a democratic way. The big lesson of the German experience remains, however, that the more men, machines, and natural resources are put to work, the stronger a nation becomes. We have not yet practically recognized this simple, fundamental truth. For we are still deliberately weakening our system of democracy by permitting millions of our people and a large proportion of our material resources to remain idle. This is the challenge to America of these trying times: To put our unemployed to work producing goods and services which will raise the living standards of our people, and to do this without surrendering any of the fundamental liberties guaranteed by our Constitution.

If we can meet this challenge, we will be able to show the world the road to real prosperity and lasting peace. It is certain that we will fail to meet this challenge unless we remedy one of the basic obstacles which now stands in the way of the full use of our productive capacity. I refer to our faulty monetary and credit system, which makes it impossible for this Nation to have in circulation the volume of money necessary to balance the full production of goods, unless either the people or the Government borrows this money into circulation in the form of private bank credit and pays the banks interest for their costless creation of that credit. There are many other things that need to be done, but assumption by the Congress of its constitutional power to issue and control the Nation's money is first and most important. It has been truly said that "all other reform waits upon monetary reform."

I think it almost inevitable that this war will compel a general abandonment of the eighteenth century practice of having governments borrow their nation's money into existence at interest from private banks, thus building up a burden of national debt which can never be discharged. The belligerents are even now, at the beginning of this war, so overburdened with government debt that there seems little doubt but that ultimately either inflation or repudiation will have to be resorted to. There is a better and far sounder way, and some nations have by now begun to learn it by bitter experience. They have learned that they can prevent both inflation and deflation by controlling the volume of money in circulation. It is absolutely essential, however, that any government which assumes its basic economic responsibility and undertakes to control the volume and maintain the stable buying power of its money must also stop this foolish practice of tying the volume of money to the volume of debt.

The future of human liberty largely depends, therefore, upon whether or not some great democratic nation which is not at war accomplishes these fundamental economic reforms. Clearly it is America's duty, and I hope and pray it may be her destiny, to be that nation.

THE IMPORTANT MATTERS

The important things for America in these dark days are, in my opinion, not the things that are most talked about. They are instead, primarily, to perfect here at home the pattern of a democracy triumphant over its problems, a democracy that can distribute to its people regularly and continuously the abundant products of its factories and its farms, a democracy that has dealt with unemployment more successfully than any dictatorship has ever done, and, above all, a democracy free from the control of international financial power, able to prevent forever any repetition of the financial crime of 1920, and exercising once again its basic sovereign right to create and control its own medium of exchange.

This is no time to turn from the needs of our own people and the solution of our domestic problems. It is a time instead to work at them with renewed energy. For our American democracy must offer as vital a challenge to a demoralized world as possible. Under the stress of these times when some of us are just waking up to realize how much American freedom means to us perhaps some long-neglected things can be done. Why, for example, should we consider only industrial mobilization plans of the War Department instead of developing a program that will give us full production under all conditions? Can we not see that to plan for peace and plenty will give us the firmest possible basis for true national defense?

In addition to this one most fundamental matter there are other things that are really more important than the currently much-discussed question of the arms embargo. The first is a strengthening of the antiwar spirit of the American people. This, I think, can be accomplished best by developing the fullest possible understanding of the causes of this war, the most careful skepticism with regard to foreign propaganda of all sorts, and the adoption in both thought and action of the traditional American foreign policy set forth in the Monroe Doctrine and practiced so successfully down to the time of the Spanish-American War. The second thing of real importance is the development of a plan and program for a just and lasting peace and a continuous putting forward of this program until this war is ended. The third matter is the prevention of profiteering—particularly in the arms trade, which will flourish if the embargo is repealed. This is important not only because profit in the arms trade is wrong but also because Government revenue will be most important in making possible a program of full employment now and at the time when the war trade ceases. Finally, we should face now the problem of how foreign nations at war are to make payment for goods purchased from America. For we do not want to repeat the experience of the last war with regard to this matter.

AN UNDERSTANDING OF THIS WAR

There can be no doubt about Mr. Hitler. He has frightened every small nation in eastern Europe and he has destroyed three of them already. He has constantly threatened war unless he could have his way. He has tried to subordinate religion and the individual conscience of people to the Nazi state. But other people are guilty, too. Josef Stalin certainly is the man more responsible than any other for bringing on this war at the time it came. Every attempt by American Communists to apologize for his action has been ridiculous, and it becomes daily more clear that his sole aim is to increase his personal power and to challenge Hitler's supremacy as the world's best liquidator of helpless states and minorities. Britain and France, on their part, have clung to vast empires whose very existence has been in large part the cause of unrest on the part of have-not nations. And America must share to some degree their guilt because we decided the issue of the last war only to fail utterly in preventing the drafting of the Treaty of Versailles from which sprang Hitler and the chain of circumstances which we face today.

This war is no simple proposition. Fundamentally, as I have said, it is the result of conditions of depression and needless poverty imposed upon the peoples of many nations by the blindness and selfishness of their rulers. This war is partly the result of the utterly unscrupulous dealings of the dictators. It is partly the result of the struggle of nations without empires to gain a share of the gigantic empires that are held tenaciously in the hands of Britain and France. And, finally, it is partly—but only partly—a struggle between democracy and dictatorship. To many of us this last issue seems the most important one. But it is vital to remember that it is not the only one.

It is important in these black days to remind ourselves over and over that no nation is as bad as the propaganda of its enemies says it is nor as good as its own propaganda says. The President has urged us all to sift the news, the radio reports, the things we see on the screen, and to try to separate the true from the untrue. Upon our doing this with care may depend the peace of America.

WILL AMERICAN SYMPATHIES LEAD THE NATION TO WAR?

Not that there can be any doubt where America's natural sympathies lie in this struggle. We are beginning to realize that freedom and liberty are real things. We are beginning to see how easily they can be destroyed. We are beginning to understand that peace cannot be based on conquest or treaties of revenge like the Treaty of Versailles, but we are beginning to see also that peace can never be as safe in the hands of absolute rulers such as Hitler or Stalin as it is in the hands of elected representatives of the people.

There is no use for anyone to try to hide the fact that most of the American people breathe a sigh of relief when they read of French or British successes and are, on the other hand, more deeply concerned and, therefore, more subject to the effects of war propaganda whenever they hear that Hitler has scored a victory over some army half as big and a quarter as well equipped as his, or that Stalin has thrown some 4,000,000 men into a "bold and fearless" attack on the already defeated Polish Army. These feelings on the part of the majority of Americans are not "neutral" and there is little use trying to say they are. For this reason, among others, there are people who have said all along that America is certain sooner or later to get into this war. I do not believe that needs to be true at all. I think we can stay out of this war if we want to badly enough and if we will do a little thinking along with our feeling. In the end the Nation's peace will depend not so much on laws of Congress as on how stout the antiwar sentiment of the Nation really is.

There can be no question that the vast majority of our people want this country kept out of war. The question is, Can they learn to make a very sharp distinction between their desire to see dictatorship defeated and the very different question as to whether America should mix in Europe's conflicts? Upon our ability to make that distinction probably depends our chance of staying out of war and of being able to work unceasingly for peace—for a peace as quickly as possible and for a peace that will be on fair enough terms to be lasting.

For an American to say he is opposed to nazi-communism is to speak the obvious. But for him to say he is going to plunge his Nation into war is quite a different thing—especially since all the forces in this country which might actually want war are the ones most opposed to doing those things which would make our democracy an effective challenge to Nazi-Communist dictatorship throughout the world.

NEUTRALITY

So far as neutrality is concerned, the simple truth is that whatever is done about the arms embargo will not be really neutral. If we leave the law as it stands, we will be favoring Germany, and if we repeal the arms embargo, we will be favoring Britain and France. The only difference that I can see is one pointed out by the President, namely, that by keeping the law as it stands our favoring of Germany is due to conscious action on our part, whereas by changing it the advantage which will then go to the Allies will be due to the circumstance that Britain and France are sea powers and Germany is not.

The people are being seriously misled, in my opinion, with regard to the importance of the arms embargo. Millions of them apparently believe that the arms embargo and what is done about it is going to determine whether or not America stays out of war. Some leaders are claiming that if we keep the arms embargo it will keep us out; others are claiming that if we lift it, it will keep us out. I think both of these statements are deceptive exaggerations. It is most important to remember that so long as we are shipping everything else under the sun to both neutrals and belligerents there is just as much likelihood of our having our goods sunk or confiscated or of being involved in this way as there would be if cannon and shells were mixed with the wheat and the steel. And it is evidently very foolish to say that if we lift the embargo and start shipping arms to all who can get them we will have erected any barrier at all against our drifting into war. The question of keeping America out of war is going to depend upon other and more weighty things—mostly, I think, on the ability of our people to take a long-range view of this war, to remember all its causes and all its implications, and to realize that our first duty, and the only one we can certainly perform, is our duty to the people and democratic institutions of America. We can stay out of war if we are constructively engaged in working for real democracy at home and real peace in the world. We cannot stay out if we cease working for the solution of our own people's problems and give way to panicky fear over the possible consequences of a Hitler victory.

The real arguments on the embargo are these:

If we do not lift the embargo we will, by a conscious, deliberate action be assisting Hitler and Stalin in their business in Europe. We will be running the risk of finding ourselves supplying Hitler with arms by the way of the Pacific through a technically neutral Russia at the same time that we refuse to supply them to Britain and France.

Therefore, if the arms embargo is retained, it should be made to apply to every nation in the world, for otherwise the belligerents are certain to get our arms from friendly neutrals. If our action is to be based on thoroughgoing opposition to unquestioned evils of the arms trade, then we ought to be insisting on extending the embargo to the world instead of making the unconvincing argument that to merely keep an arms embargo against belligerents will keep America out of war.

On the other hand, if we lift the embargo, the munitions industry will enjoy a boom; and unless proper laws are passed now to prevent it, a few Americans will get jobs making munitions, and we will be fooled into thinking the unemployment problem has been solved. For this we must necessarily suffer in the future, and many groups of our people will suffer right now.

Therefore it is of paramount importance that if the arms embargo is lifted, the most severe laws should be passed to prevent profiteering in munitions, and to prepare for the certain depression which will follow this miserable boom period. I cannot understand why this proposal has not been advanced in every single speech advocating repeal.

It is for this reason that a number of Members of Congress are attempting by every possible legislative means to accomplish the drastic taxation of profits resulting from this war trade. My own bill (H. R. 7545) on this subject reads as follows:

A bill to prevent profiteering in war munitions

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be levied, collected, and paid an excess-profits tax equal to 80 percent of all net profits in excess of the average net profit realized in the 24 months immediately preceding the passage of this act upon every person, partnership, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or dealing in arms, ammunition, or implements of war as defined in the proclamation of the President No. 2349, of September 5, 1939. In computing net profits, such persons, partnerships, companies, associations, and corporations shall include therein all increased payments, whether in cash or otherwise, to any person whose total compensation amounts to $10,000 per year or more.

This is only one formula that might be applied, of course. Others will be suggested; and it does not matter whose bill is passed or how so long as Congress stops now profiteering by dealers in weapons of death.

Last spring I voted with a majority of the House to retain the arms embargo in the neutrality law. I did so because I believed the munitions traffic to be wrong. I still believe that as much as I ever did. But I must confess that I was considerably worried to find that the vote of the House was regarded as another triumph for Herr Hitler, to be added to an already very long list of triumphs.

And since that time events of the greatest magnitude have taken place, and we face a world situation shot through with wrongs. If ever we were confronted with a choice of the lesser of two evils, that time is now.

For unless we have an assurance that adequate legislation will be passed to prevent profiteering in the munitions business and to end the power of international finance, we are confronted with the uphappy choice of voting either against the embargo and for Mr. du Pont, Mr. Baruch, and Mr. Morgan or voting for the embargo and for Mr. Hitler and Mr. Stalin. Either we must vote to sell implements of death or else we must vote in such a way as to encourage those forces in the world which are already best equipped with such implements. It is hard, indeed, to say that one way is absolutely right and the other absolutely wrong under these circumstances. For this reason I will keep an open mind until the time my vote is cast on this bill.

I feel it is only fair, however, to let the people know the way I am thinking on this subject.

For my part, therefore, I must base my decision on one fundamental purpose which I shall follow, and that purpose is to do those hard-headed and realistic things which seem best calculated to keep my country out of war and to make it possible for us to work for peace and to make our democracy really work here at home. I am convinced that propaganda based on fear of the spread of the power of the dictatorships is the one force most likely to defeat these efforts and drag America into war. Whether or not such propaganda is justified is beside the point. Already it exists. To add substance to it will, I believe, constitute the greatest single danger to America's peace.

A war is now in progress on the European Continent. I believe all will agree that there is not 1 chance in 1,000 of the United States entering that war on the side of Germany and Russia. The dictators' opposition to religion alone would be enough to make that true. Either we will keep our heads and remain at peace or else we will once more go off to war on the side of England and France. This war is not made by people and no decent man seeks to see any people of any nation crushed as a result of it. It is a war, on the other hand, that came when it did mainly because of the signing of an agreement between the two most absolute rulers in the world today. The full significance and extent of the Russo-German pact no one but Stalin and Hitler probably knows. But at the very least it did two things. It brought together into a strange and portentous partnership the two great dicatorships of the world and it assured to Germany so long as she remains at war a full access to the almost limitless resources not only of Russia but of all southeast Europe, the Near East and most of Asia. It even gives her access through a friendly power to the Pacific Ocean and to Japan, a power which has already demonstrated its ability to supply itself with modern munitions of war, and hence in a position to export these if she can replace them with imports from a third nation.

There seems small chance that an arms embargo covering all the nations, neutral as well as belligerent, will even be seriously considered. Several times in the past few years I have voted for such general embargoes, and I believe I would do so now if the issue were presented in that form. But there is little chance that it will be. For, so far as I am aware, none of the advocates of the embargo has suggested that it be extended to any except actual belligerent nations.

Hence, if our present law is not changed and if Japan remains neutral, then without any violation of law at all, Japan might purchase arms from the United States and then ship the output of her own munitions plants across Russia into Germany. The same thing might happen in the case of Italy. This, then, would mean that we would be supplying arms to Germany, whereas we would be refusing to sell even on a cash-and-carry basis to Britain and France.

I am certainly against any attempt to stir up bitterness against the German people, and I hope against hope we will not believe the lies about them which poisoned American minds during the last war. But Mr. Hitler is not the German people.

And it is a mighty serious matter to be responsible for continuing an embargo policy which amounts to giving Adolf Hitler the advantages of a blockade of Britain and France so far as arms are concerned, in addition to the tremendous advantage he has already gained from his working agreement with Josef Stalin.

Of course we ought to be immune to propaganda, and we ought to stick to our job here in America under every circumstance and not be swept off our feet by fear of forces that, after all, are pretty far away.

But I am not talking about how it ought to be. I am talking about how it is. And as a practical matter the fight to keep America out of war is going to have its toughest battle when it goes up against fear. We will be told that if Hitler wins we will find his bunds in South America and Mexico—perhaps even in new German possessions in the Western Hemisphere—and that we will be threatened by a Europe and Asia dominated by the German and Russian dictators. And suppose we are also told that by a conscious act of Congress—an embargo act that we ourselves could change—we are helping very largely to bring about the triumph of Nazi-Communist dictatorship in a large part of the world. When that time comes then, indeed, I will be fearful for this Nation's peace. For then is when we will forget to analyze things carefully, forget about the subtle influence of international finance, forget about the empires of Britain and France, forget about our experiences in the last World War, and think only, as we thought 22 years ago, that "we will be the next." If the arms embargo—at least in its present form—were removed, this propaganda appeal would, I believe, have considerably less effectiveness. I believe this is important.

SAFEGUARDS WHICH CAN BE PROVIDED BY LAW

In all the furor about the arms embargo it appears that millions of American citizens have completely overlooked, or else been misled, regarding the fact that there are a great many other commodities besides arms which are important to warring nations. All of these commodities can, under existing law, be shipped from the United States to either belligerents or neutrals, either in or out of the war zone, whether paid for or not, and in either American or foreign ships. As a matter of fact, this is being done right now and we do not even have any provision that such trade shall be carried on at the trader's risk. People who are writing to their Congressmen saying they want "no change in the present neutrality law" ought to understand this situation and consider some of these matters which the present law does not cover at all.

The shipment of any type of goods is, of course, dangerous. Almost anything is dangerous in a world like this. The only perfectly safe course would be to prohibit the shipping or sale of anything at all to any nation in the war zone. But as a practical matter, however willing some of us might be to do exactly that and to meet the unemployment problem that would result here at home, even the most ardent advocates of isolation know that such drastic legislation is just simply impossible to pass. It seems, therefore, inevitable that we will be selling large amounts of cotton and wheat and steel and copper and many other things to both neutrals and belligerents. And the people are probably right who say that to add finished arms to this list will not make it any more likely that we will be dragged into war on account of the sinking of ships or loss of goods than would be the case if we sold everything except finished arms.

It is because of all these factors that it has been proposed that as a precautionary measure we require belligerent purchasers to take title to and pay for goods of any sort before they leave our shores and to carry them away in their own ships.

This is called cash and carry and it has nothing whatever to do with the question of the arms embargo. Indeed, it was first proposed to cover other goods besides arms. We can have both an arms embargo and cash and carry or we can have neither one. Or we can have cash and carry without an embargo, as the President suggested, or we can have an embargo on arms and no cash and carry as we have now. Many people have written to me saying they are against cash and carry and for the arms embargo. That is hard to understand. I believe what these people really mean is that they want an embargo on arms and a cash-and-carry provision for other products.

Surely, therefore, we should provide at the very least that trade or travel carried on by Americans with belligerents or in war zones must be done at the trader's or the traveler's risk. And, as further safeguarding measures, there could be written into law the following provisions: (1) That title to goods must pass to foreign purchasers before the goods are shipped to belligerents; (2) that American ships be kept out of the war zones; and (3) that Americans be forbidden to travel on belligerent vessels. All these provisions would be new provisions of law. They are not the law now. In addition, we should certainly keep and, if possible, strengthen the prohibitions which are a part of existing law against Americans making loans or extending credits to belligerents.

All these things will to some extent curtail trade and make it more difficult to carry on. But if they help to save the lives of American young men, then these and many other measures, too, ought certainly to be taken by the Congress.

THE LEGISLATIVE SITUATION

Few people in the country understand the process through which this so-called neutrality legislation will pass before it becomes law. The situation is this: The House passed at the last session a new neutrality bill, which contained an embargo against shipping arms and ammunition to belligerents, a requirement that belligerent purchasers of American goods must take title to them before they are shipped, and certain other provisions. The Senate did not act on that bill or any other bill.

The Senate started work at the special session on that House bill. But the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has completely rewritten the bill, has removed the arms embargo, and added very much stronger provisions with regard to the following things: (1) Requiring that goods shipped to belligerents go in non-American ships and that title be taken by foreign buyers before they leave America; (2) forbidding Americans to travel on belligerent ships; (3) prohibiting American ships to enter war zones; and (4) putting a ban on loans and credits to belligerents. Just what the bill will look like when the Senate is through with it no one knows, but the probabilities are it will not be amended very much.

Now, although the Senate has changed the House bill very drastically, nevertheless it is, from a legislative standpoint, still the same bill. So that when the Senate has finished with it there will be a conference between members of the Senate and House Foreign Affairs Committees without any action by the House intervening. This conference committee will adjust differences between the House and Senate bills, and the only vote that will be taken in the House will be on the final bill as drafted by the conference. The House will have to vote "aye" or "no" on the entire bill, and it will not be possible to amend it. In all probability that final bill will contain these provisions: (1) Repeal of the arms embargo; (2) requirement of belligerent purchasers that they pay for our goods before they leave America and carry them away in their own ships; (3) prohibition against loans and credits to belligerents; (4) provisions forbidding American ships to enter war zones and American citizens to ride on belligerent ships—that is, it will provide for keeping American-owned goods, American financial interests, American ships, and, above all, American citizens out of the war zone.

If I am right in my judgment as to what the bill will contain, then Members of the House who want to keep the embargo will have to vote "no," which will mean they will have to vote against the other provisions I have listed above. If a Member wants to have the safeguards provided in (2), (3), and (4) of that list, then he would have to vote "aye" on the entire bill, including the repeal of the embargo. Weighing all the evidence that I have before me now, I believe the best vote under these circumstances would be "aye."

HOW ABOUT PAYMENT

Now we come to a problem which may, in the course of time, prove exceedingly serious both for the United States and for nations buying from us. That is the problem of how payment for these goods is to be made. One way is in gold; another is in foreign exchange; another is by borrowing from the United States in order to buy in the United States. None of these methods is a good one from anybody's standpoint, in my opinion. Britain and France are the only nations that can pay in gold. But soon every bit of gold in the world will have been transferred to the United States. Already we have three-fifths of it. Britain and France have nearly all the rest. Soon the other nations will have been drained of gold and will have learned to get along without it. What will happen then? Is it not altogether possible we will really have a gigantic "gold brick." We will have sent valuable products abroad and we will have received useless gold in return. Of course, we could issue money against the gold or we could coin it. But if we ever get sensible enough to issue our money in a constitutional manner, we will also be sensible enough to understand that gold redemption or even gold "backing" are not only utterly unnecessary but likely to become actually vicious practices.

If we take payment in foreign exchange, the only way we can spend that exchange will be by buying vast quantities of goods from the nations which are now buying from us. With our present faulty distribution of buying power, we all know that one consequence of this will be to bring about serious competition on the American market between these imported goods and our own products fashioned by American labor.

As to our extending credits, certainly we do not want to repeat the World War experience of having American money lenders extend billions of dollars of credit to belligerent nations and then send an American army to Europe to make sure the debts—all except those owed our Government—will be collected.

Therefore, I believe this problem must be faced, and that the only ultimate answer to it is that payment should be made in tangible wealth located in the Western Hemisphere, such as American securities or commodities of which we have a shortage, or in island possessions of European powers which lie immediately off the American coast, and which add nothing important to the European empires but which would mean much to America from a standpoint of national defense.

Machinery for effecting transactions in this manner can be set up, and is indeed provided for in bill H. R. 7544, which I have introduced, and the text of which reads as follows:

A bill to provide sound payment for goods sold to belligerent nations

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) payment for all goods purchased in the United States for export to any belligerent nation shall be made to the Munitions Control Board in tangible wealth located in the Western Hemisphere, or certificates of ownership therefor: Provided, however, That no such payments shall be made in gold, silver, or foreign exchange.

(b) The Munitions Control Board shall deposit all tangible wealth or certificates of ownership therefor thus received with the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to issue non-interest-bearing obligations of the United States in equivalent amounts. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit such non-interest-bearing obligations of the United States with a Federal Reserve bank, and such Federal Reserve bank shall establish a credit in favor of the Munitions Control Board in amounts equal to the non-interest-bearing obligations of the United States thus deposited, at the par value thereof.

(c) Upon the presentation of invoices and such other papers as may be necessary to substantiate their claims, the Munitions Control Board shall pay to any and all such persons, partnerships, companies, associations, and corporations, as have exported goods to belligerent nations, the amounts due such exporters.

To those who say this suggestion is impractical I would point out that it cannot possibly be as impractical as literally giving away the resources of America for foreign war purposes, which is what happened before and what will happen again unless we think this problem through and act upon our thinking. Of course this whole idea that we can make the American people prosperous by means of a gigantic export trade is really a hopeless folly. True prosperity for all the people of our Nation can only be assured by enabling them to consume the full volume of their own production.

WHAT WILL KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WAR?

And now I want to repeat what I consider to be my most important single statement. It is this: No law, no embargo, no cash and carry, nothing indeed of that sort can guarantee that America will be kept out of war. Our ability to do that will depend on other more profound forces, some of which I have already mentioned. To that main subject—what will actually maintain the peace of our country—let us now return.

The one thing that can keep Americans out of this war will be their ability to recapture the traditional American point of view toward foreign conflicts. That point of view, briefly stated, was that we would resist any attempt to interfere with the independence of any nation in the Americas, but that we would not attempt to play a game of power politics with Old World nations. That point of view further required that we deal with all nations on a basis of equity, recognizing their governments as their people chose to set them up. And, finally, that traditional point of view of Americans has always held that our main job lay in the Western Hemisphere and especially within the borders of our own Nation.

Through most of our history we went ahead with our trade and stayed out of foreign wars, both. We were able to do this because our point of view on foreign wars was right—because it was an American point of view based on the needs and protection of our own people and not on our judgment of the actions of other nations.

Indeed, traditional American foreign policy—the policy that was so successful down to about 1890, and which has been periodically abandoned since that time—did not, as a matter of fact, include either neutrality laws or embargoes. It simply included a state of mind on the part of the American people and their representatives that we could not and should not try to run the affairs of the whole world, that we had enough to do here at home, or at any rate in the Western Hemisphere, and that Europe's and Asia's wars and conflicts would have to be handled by the people who were right next to them and who therefore knew far more about them than we did. If we could help constructively in some manner to promote peace, and if our help was asked for, that was different. We had a frame of mind of tending to our own business—and so we did. Our troubles started when we began to get great and to dream dreams about being the mightiest nation in the world. From that time on we began more and more to feel a duty to review the form of government of other nations and to try to at least umpire their games of power politics. So far as I know we never did much good at this game.

Unless we can cling to that essentially American viewpoint which I have sketched, the United States will be in increasing danger of going to war from the moment a victory for the dictators seems likely. Everyone ought to realize and think about these things. The acid test of antiwar sentiment will not come unless and until the cause of dictatorship seems to be close to triumph. What will we do then? What will the American people say then about men who are still working to keep their country out of war? These are hard questions. But the time may come when they will have to be answered. It is best to think about them now.

Furthermore, now, if ever, is the time when the bill to tax the profits out of war and a measure to provide for financing war with Government instead of private credit should be passed. The bill to tax the profits out of war, sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, was introduced in the last session by 50 Senators and some 7 or 8 Congressmen, of whom I happened to be one. All this bill means is that if the United States should ever be drawn into war—which God forbid—the financial burdens will be born somewhere near equally by all and the Government will derive sufficient revenue to pay for the war as it is being fought. Surely no one can say it is unjust to conscript capital on something like the same basis as we conscript man power. And I sincerely believe the very kind of opposition that has been shown against this bill is indicative that its passage would be a move for peace.

CONSTRUCTIVE PEACE EFFORTS

It is not enough for us to merely try to stay out of war; we must work positively and untiringly for peace. Let every American remember that the preservation of freedom, the development of the human spirit, the deepening of religious faith, and the saving of these values which mankind has sought and hoped for through the centuries may well depend upon the existence of one sane nation in this war-torn world.

Continuous effort on our part to draw together the neutral nations, to formulate plans for ending this war on the basis of enduring peace, to guard those values of life, of religion, of culture, which war destroys so quickly—these should be our immediate tasks. As time goes on even the belligerents must begin to realize that the only beneficiaries from a protracted war will be those forces who expect to take advantage of conditions of chaos, desperation, and degradation. There have been ugly charges that some of those forces are cynically watching this thing go on—even hoping it will not end too soon. Against such forces America must work day and night. And we may not have to work alone.

The Panama Conference of American Nations has taken some most important steps forward in building up in the world two vitally necessary things: First, a determined bloc of neutral nations bent on keeping the peace and protecting neutral rights; second, a powerful movement for an early, a just, and lasting peace. America's efforts in the field of foreign affairs should be directed in those two directions. Together with our sister republics, we might even be able to save Europe from herself if we are wise and sane and earnest in these efforts.

At present we know next to nothing about what the real war aims of the belligerent nations are. In the World War we thought we knew, but we did not. We cannot tell what consequences may flow from a victory by either side. We can only guess, and we probably will guess wrong. The American Government should ask the belligerents now for a clear statement of their war aims in order that intelligent and continuous moves for peace can be made.

But we do know what consequences flow certainly and unavoidably from war itself. We know that the best and finest young men will be the first to die; we know that liberty will substantially be suspended; we know that hates will be engendered which may take years to wipe out; we know that prejudice and fear will possess people's hearts and minds; we know that all real progress for humanity will be set back immeasurably; and we know democratic government will be put to a strain from which it is at least questionable whether it can fully recover.

With so much to lose from such a venture it seems plain indeed that Americans should solemnly resolve never to go to war except in defense of the peace and safety of the western world.

America's peace, then, depends upon her renewed devotion to the whole Monroe Doctrine, her understanding of how confused and mixed are the factors in the war now raging, her sincere and constant efforts to bring peace to the world, and on her providing now that in case war does ever come to this Nation again its burdens will be equally shared by all groups and classes in the Nation. Above all, it depends upon the degree of our devotion to the task of doing all things necessary to divorce our democracy from the power of international finance and to free its people from the burdens of unemployment and poverty in the midst of possible plenty.

America can stay out of war if the people and the Congress refuse to be stampeded by unreasonable fears or hatred, if we take up with determination the battle against unemployment and poverty here at home, and if we pass legislation making it impossible for any group or person to profit out of any war in any way.

America can stay out of war if enough of us are determined to do so, and if we remember that no power which denies liberty to its people can continue for any considerable length of time to rule the world.

American Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 4, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on American Neutrality delivered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on October 3, 1939, at Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Everybody wants to stay out of the war. The American people are unanimous in favor of peace. This statement is true of Congress. It is true of President Roosevelt. I do not doubt the sincerity of Members of Congress, and I have no doubt of the sincerity of the President. We are striving to attain the same end. We are determined to take no step that will bring our country into the pending European war. The struggle going on in Europe is Europe's struggle. Regardless of our sympathies, our likes, or our dislikes, it is a catastrophe beyond our jurisdiction and beyond our domain. There is a unanimity of thought, and that thought is, How can we best keep the United States out of the European catastrophe? We are united; we are unanimous in the object to be accomplished. That object is peace for the American Government, the American people.

There is, however, a difference of opinion, both in the country and in Congress, as to the best and most practical method to attain this much-desired goal.

The Embargo Act now on the statute books forbids the sale of munitions and implements of war to belligerents. One side to the controversy is in favor of retaining this law as it is. The other side proposes to change the law and substitute for it what is ordinarily known as the cash-and-carry plan. Let us with perfect candor and without prejudice examine these two propositions.

In discussing the question I am assuming the honesty, sincerity, and patriotism of both sides, and I believe this assumption to be true. I question no man's motive. I concede to those who do not agree with my theory the same honesty and the same conscientious convictions that I claim for myself, and I enter upon the discussion of the question with full and unlimited respect for the opinions and judgments of my opponents.

Under the embargo provisions of the so-called neutrality law, what can be done? What is the practical effect of the enforcement of this law?

Under this law everything except completed implements of war can be carried in American vessels to the ports of belligerent nations. Under this law American citizens can travel on the ships of belligerent nations. Under this law we can sell metals and materials to make arms, but we cannot sell the arms themselves. We can sell to belligerent nations copper tubing to be used in explosive shells, but we cannot sell the finished product. We can sell belligerent nations cotton, but we cannot sell gun cotton. We can sell belligerent nations steel for military airplanes, but we cannot sell the airplane itself. We can sell almost any part of any war machine, but if the parts are put together in America and become a finished product, we are prohibited from selling them.

The only difference is, if these parts are put together to form the finished product by American workmen, on American soil, their sale is prohibited under existing law. Whereas, if the parts are shipped separately and put together by foreign labor on foreign soil, the shipment is allowed.

With the exception of completed munitions of war, this law permits us to sell anything to anybody, and to carry those materials, whatever they may be, across the ocean in American ships, manned by American seamen.

The danger of this situation should be apparent to everybody, and the likelihood of such a condition bringing us into the war should be obvious to every American citizen.

It must be remembered, also, that many materials and articles of commerce are practically as important as munitions and implements of war. Have we forgotten the slogan in the great World War, which was heralded into every nook and corner of our country, "Food will win the war!"

That slogan was true. Without food, armies cannot fight. Without food, the people behind the lines cannot work; they cannot produce. Without food, no nation can carry on war. It is not only important, but it is absolutely necessary.

Under existing law, products of American farms and American factories, with the exception of munitions of war, can be and, if the law is not changed, will be shipped in American vessels, owned by American citizens and manned by American seamen. What will happen when these ships are destroyed and sunk, either by submarine of Germany or by man-of-war of Great Britain? What will happen when American lives are lost at sea because of a torpedo fired by a submarine?

Have we forgotten the sinking of the Lusitania? Do we not remember the outraged feelings of the American people when the news of that disaster came to their knowledge? Can we measure the influence which that terrible disaster had upon the minds and hearts of the American people? Do we not remember many other similar episodes that provoked our people to a pitch of frenzied animosity? Do we want those things to happen again? But unless we change the present embargo law, they will happen again.

We know from experience that such things will inevitably happen, and that when they do happen, the feelings, the emotions, and the sentiments of the American people will be aroused to boiling point. We know that when American ships are sunk and American cargoes lost, the owners will call upon the American Government for support, and that such a call will have behind it a propaganda and a force that will be almost irresistible. The property involved will be of the value of millions, and if in these catastrophes American lives are lost, it will be beyond the imagination to conceive fully the influence that will be brought to bear upon the American Government to get into the war.

Under existing law, if goods are sold and shipped to one of the belligerent nations, the time will soon come when these American citizens will be calling upon the Government of the United States to collect their debts. This is not a fancy; it is not a dream; it is a mathematical certainty. We know from experience it is true. We remember in the last war American citizens sold war materials and all other kinds of materials, such as food and clothing, to belligerent nations.

When those debts were not paid, and when it became evident the belligerent nations owing the debts might possibly lose the war, thus making it impossible for the debts ever to be paid, these American citizens and corporations used every instrumentality within their power to push the American Government into the war, so that their debts might be secured and eventually paid. These creditors gave no heed to the terrible sacrifices that would have to be made in order to collect these debts. They did not think of and gave no heed to the certainty that American boys would have to die on foreign soil, that thousands of women would be made widows, that numberless children would be made fatherless in America—that these financial obligations might be made good.

These are some of the things that put us into the World War. To a great extent we made a collection agency of the United States Government. These debts had to be collected, even though thousands of American boys had to sacrifice their lives; even though unborn generations had to labor and toil to make those debts good.

When it became evident that the belligerent nations were not able to pay, then the next step taken was to induce the Government of the United States to lend the money of the people to these nations.

Many billions of dollars were thus loaned. It all came out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United States. The money was raised by the Government of the United States through the sale of bonds. The promises of practically all of these nations that borrowed the money have been broken. Nearly all of the debts have been repudiated, and still the American people are burdened for the payment of the outstanding bonds that were issued. This great financial influence was brought to bear to bring the American Government into the war. These facts are a matter of history. All this brought about our entrance into the war, and as a result the blood of our brave boys was coined into gold to pay the expense of this inhuman sacrifice of human life. This will probably happen again, unless we change the present law.

We remember what happened when American citizens traveling upon the high seas lost their lives on account of the depredations of one or the other of the belligerent nations. Based upon such happenings as these, those who for financial or other reasons wanted our country to get into the war were enabled to work upon the emotions and the sentiments of the American people, so that eventually they brought about a condition that was one of the greatest factors in forcing our country into that catastrophe.

Let me repeat: All of these things could happen again, will happen again, in my opinion, unless our embargo law is changed.

I have briefly outlined what might occur and what probably would occur, and what I believe must occur, if we follow those who are opposed to any change. It seems clear that unless a change is made in our present law, the chances are we will eventually be brought into the war. The things I have enumerated brought us into the other World War, and it seems logical they would bring us in again.

No man can tell with absolute certainty whether it is possible for us to keep out of the war. No one can foresee the changes that may occur in the immediate future. The course for us to pursue is the one least liable to get us in; the course to avoid is the one which in all probability would take us into the war.

I desire now to consider what changes are advocated by those who believe some changes of existing law are absolutely necessary in order to keep our Government at peace.

What is proposed by those who would change the Embargo Act and adopt the cash-and-carry plan? And does such a plan offer a greater probability of our escaping the engulfment of our country in war than existing law offers?

To my mind, it seems so clear the change suggested by the President will be an improvement, that it is difficult for me to understand the attitude of those who are opposed to any change in our embargo law.

It is proposed to make it unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any port of a belligerent nation. It is proposed to make it unlawful to export or transport to a belligerent nation anything of any kind until title to the property has been transferred and the goods paid for. Such property, whatever it may be, cannot lawfully be carried to its destination in any American ship.

Therefore, no American citizen will have any interest whatever in the property sold, and, if the property is destroyed on the seas, no American citizen will have any financial interest in it.

It is proposed to make it unlawful for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into any combat area upon the seas. It is proposed to make it unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on ships of any belligerent nation. It is proposed to make it unlawful for any American vessel engaged in commerce upon the high seas to be armed. It is proposed to make it unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase bonds or securities or other obligations of any belligerent government, or any political subdivision of such government. It is proposed to make it unlawful for any person within the United States to solicit or receive any contribution for any belligerent government.

If, in the present emergency, we are guided, as we should be, by our experience of 20 years ago when we went into the World War, then it seems to me there can be no choice between the two plans I have described. On the one hand, it is proposed that the present Embargo Act shall not be changed, and, on the other hand, it is proposed to change it and set up all these safeguards I have mentioned, in lieu of the present law. An examination of them will disclose to any unprejudiced mind that, taken together, these are safeguards against all of the causes that carried us into the Great World War. If they had been on the statute books at that time, it seems clear to me our chances of remaining out of that World War would have been greatly enhanced. If these safeguards are now enacted into law, our escape from entering into the present European war seems almost certain.

Twenty years ago, every few days the American people read of some American ship being sunk on the high seas or captured by a belligerent nation and taken into a port of that nation. They read of American lives being blotted out because of some act of a belligerent nation. These catastrophes, often horrible beyond description, excited the minds and emotions of the American people to such a degree that millions of our citizens became enraged, even frenzied, in their helplessness.

The result was the building up of a sentiment that could not be resisted, and Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, took the fatal step that brought misery and suffering to thousands of our innocent citizens, that heaped upon the backs of our taxpayers a debt we are struggling now to pay.

The action I have outlined is one which our Nation has a perfectly legal right to take. There is no dispute anywhere but that, under international law, we have a right to provide by law for all the things I have enumerated.

So far, I have been considering the question upon a strictly legal basis. I have ignored the question of sympathy, of moral right, of our belief in religious freedom and liberty. So far, I have suggested no action based upon emotion or a love of humanity. Basing our consideration entirely on cold legal deductions, we must reach the conclusion that it is far safer to enact the provisions I have enumerated than it would be to permit the Embargo Act to remain unchanged. From this cold-blooded legal consideration of our rights we must be brought to the conclusion that it is far better for our peace and security and for the happiness of our people to repeal the Embargo Act and enact in its stead the provisions of the proposed law.

Indeed, to me there is but one choice, and I am led inevitably to the conclusion that these changes in our Embargo Act are absolutely imperative if we are to avoid, as far as humanly possible, being drawn into the existing war.

In addition to our having a strictly legal right to do the things I have outlined, there is another compelling reason why we should take the step proposed. It is fair to say that our people do not believe in dictator governments, or in the barbarous and inhuman methods that are used by these dictators to increase their power and their dominions. The methods that Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin have adopted to further their unholy ambitions are barbarous, inhuman, uncivilized, unjustified, unmerciful, and murderous. We have no sympathy with the principles of such conquests, or with the methods used to attain them. Therefore, our sympathies, our hopes, our prayers, are all with the British and French Governments in this conflict.

It is self-evident today that England and France, fighting with their backs to the wall, are fighting not only the battle of humanity and civilization but they are faced with foes ruthless and murderous in their dishonorable and unjustifiable procedure.

Hitler and other dictators are representatives of paganism, and are fighting to destroy religion and to establish upon the grave of human freedom a despotism greater, more cruel, and more inhuman than any that has ever existed in the history of the world. They go on the theory that they are not bound to respect the rights or liberties of anyone, and that they have a right to capture and take by force any nation they are able to conquer. Their theory, if carried to its logical conclusion, means the destruction, the end, of our present civilization.

It is said by those who are opposed to any change in our embargo law the course I have outlined will be favorable to England and France. But it is equally true, if we fail to take the course I have outlined, and the present embargo law is kept intact, such action will be favorable to Hitler and other dictators. It is plain, therefore, that, whether we enact the proposals I have described or whether we permit the embargo law to stand unchanged, our action will result in helping, in a degree, one side or the other in the war.

It is fortunate, therefore, that in following our legal rights as universally recognized we are able to enact a law which will more likely keep us out of the war and at the same time puts us on the side of humanity and civilization.

We have a legal right to take either course. We decide our course on a perfectly legal proposition. If we decide to pursue the path most likely to keep us out of the war, we should be gratified to know such a course will help the right, rather than the wrong. Should there be any doubt or hesitation on the part of anyone who believes in liberty, who loves humanity, who loves his family, who wants to preserve civilization, as to the course we should pursue? How, under the circumstances, can we possibly hesitate?

I fervently believe the course I have advocated will keep us out of war and that such a course offers the greatest probability that our Nation may ride through the troubled waters in peace and honor.

One of the impelling reasons that took us into the World War was to make good the losses of American ships that occurred in the combat area. Another reason was to insure the payment of money loaned by American citizens. Another reason was to protect the right of American citizens to travel upon ships of belligerent nations. Another reason was that we permitted materials, such as foodstuffs and clothing, to be transported to belligerent ports in American vessels manned by American seamen.

All of these activities are prohibited by the administration bill now pending in Congress. None of these activities will be prohibited if we permit the embargo law to stand as it is.

At the beginning of the World War, on the floor of the United States Senate, I said our entry into that war was placing the dollar sign on the American flag. For this speech I was denounced as a traitor; I was burned in effigy; a prominent Federal official in a public address said I ought to be put up against a wall and shot; I became an outcast in my own country. I believe that time has vindicated the position I then took.

When we entered the World War we made the greatest mistake in the history of our Nation. We put the dollar sign on the American flag and went into the war. Now, 20 years later, let us keep the dollar sign off of the American flag and stay out of the war.

My friends, I have concluded. I bid you good night.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE M. REED

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 4, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLYDE M. REED, OF KANSAS

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me on last Sunday evening on the subject of the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Across the ocean to the east of us Europe is again engaged in its age-old pastime of war. For thousands of years that part of the earth's surface has fought over boundary lines, racial questions, religious differences, dynastic ambitions, and lust for power. The conflict waging now is not essentially different from those that have been waged for the past 10 or 20 centuries.

Ten days ago the Congress of the United States met in an extraordinary session on a call of the President. Tomorrow morning the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations will report an amendment to existing law concerning our relation to countries engaged in war. Tomorrow will begin a debate on the Senate floor that will go into history as one of the great discussions of our Congress. The issues are important and are such that they stir the emotions of our people.

These emotions have been deeply stirred already. That is evidenced from the pains that so many people are taking to inform Members of Congress of their feelings and opinions concerning the issues before us. I have received over 5,000 telegrams, letters, and petitions, mostly from people of Kansas, but including expressions from people over the United States. Other Senators are having the same experience—some in even greater proportion than my own.

These expressions indicate three things: A universal desire to keep the United States out of war; a decided preponderance of sympathy with Great Britain and France; a lamentable confusion in the minds of many—perhaps the majority—concerning the concrete issues before the Congress. It is to this latter element that I shall address this discussion.

Whenever human emotions are deeply stirred, reason abdicates and logic takes a vacation. It has always been so—it is so now.

People may write out of their emotions and disregard reason and logic, but Members of Congress responsible to the country for their acts have not that privilege. Members of Congress are human and have emotions the same as other people. But these emotions should be kept under control. I am trying to do that in dealing with my responsibility as a Senator. It is entirely natural, and not improper, for people to write me out of their emotions. It would be entirely improper for me to vote as a Senator out of my emotions and disregard what my reason tells me is the wise course to pursue.

Leaders whose voices carry throughout the Nation have expressed conflicting opinions. It is this conflict of statement that is, perhaps, responsible for much of the confusion which is reflected in the advice I receive from those who write me.

For example, the present law contains a prohibition called an embargo upon the shipment of arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerent nations. This embargo has been a part of our statutory law for about 4 years. We have had no chance to actually test its value as a factor in keeping out of war. Yet earnest opponents of any important change in the present law frequently, usually, in fact, frankly declare that "the repeal of the embargo is the first step toward war." That is an emotional declaration based upon opinion and not upon any actual experience. But it has had the effect of making the present embargo the symbol of peace and implanting in the minds of earnest people the fear that any change of modification of existing statutes would bring us into war.

On the other hand, President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress delivered on its convening September 21, asked for a repeal of the embargo provisions because, in his opinion, they were "most vitally dangerous to American neutrality, American security, and American peace."

The President further declared:

"I seek a greater consistency through the repeal of the embargo provision and a return to international law."

And still further the President stated that "repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue."

Here we have the issues joined by the opponents of repeal, the leaders of which are authors of the present law, and the Chief Executive of our Government. The Congress of the United States will determine the issue. The battle will begin tomorrow in the Senate.

In joining the issue the great leaders of the two sides take diametrically opposite positions and make flatly contradictory declarations. No wonder that the average citizen becomes confused.

With the most earnest respect for the opinions of my colleagues who take that position, I do not agree that the retention of the embargo is essential to preserving peace or keeping America out of war.

On the other hand, I do not agree with the President that the embargo is inconsistent with international law, and find no support in my reading of international law or of available authority on that subject for that statement.

The President proposes, after repeal of the embargo, the inclusion in the law of cash-and-carry provisions as regards the sale and export of articles, whether arms, materials of war, or articles of peaceful commerce when sold to belligerent nations.

I find no substantial authority for any belief that the present embargo is any more or less consistent or inconsistent with international law than would be the cash-and-carry system proposed to be substituted for it. It is my opinion, supported by virtually all of international law authority, that either may be consistent, and neither be inconsistent with international law. I do not think that either is essential to preserving the peace, and neither would take us into war or keep us out of war.

I further disagree with the statement of President Roosevelt in his message to Congress that the Embargo and Nonintercourse Act of the Jefferson administration "was the major cause of bringing us * * * into our own War of 1812." History does not support that view. The Embargo and Nonintercourse Act were repealed 3 years before the War of 1812 began. Furthermore, there is no similarity or parallel between those acts and the arms-embargo provision of our present law.

The fact is that the War of 1812 was declared by our Government for the purpose of enforcing our rights under international law on the high seas. England was stopping our vessels, searching them, and imprisoning our seamen, and seizing our cargoes. After protesting over a long period of years against these things, we declared war in an endeavor to stop them.

Furthermore, the insistence of the administration of President Wilson on the rights of our vessels and our citizens to enter into and travel through combat zones during the last World War was, in my opinion, a major factor in our entering into that war. We insisted upon our rights under international law; our vessels entered the war zone; some of them were sunk; some of our citizens were drowned; and the country became so inflamed that it supported a declaration of war.

So the facts are, that clinging to the so-called rights of neutral nations under international law got the United States into two wars. If we should decide to pursue the same policy now that our Government followed in the years preceding our entry into the last World War, our chances of becoming actively involved in a European war which is not of our making and none of our business would be greatly enhanced.

Some of my able and earnest colleagues in the Senate do not favor retaining the present embargo; do not favor the enactment of the cash-and-carry system, but do believe in depending entirely upon international law. I do not think this advisable. Getting into two wars through dependence upon international law is sufficient for me.

The present embargo is a limitation upon our rights as a neutral under international law which we may impose upon ourselves if we choose to do so.

Repealing the embargo and substituting a cash-and-carry system is a limitation upon our rights as a neutral under international law which we may make if we choose.

Neither, in my opinion, in any way conflict with international law.

Stating my points of disagreement with positions taken by able leaders on both sides who are just as sincere and just as earnest as I am is hardly sufficient. This Congress must take either negative action through refusing to repeal the present embargo, or affirmative action by repealing it and substituting other provisions. I must have a part in the final decision.

I shall use the balance of my time to express my own views.

I have not favored and do not now favor the principle of the embargo. This attitude was not recently taken. It has been my position over a considerable period of time. I cannot state the basis for that position any better than by quoting the language of an address I delivered at a public dinner in Washington on March 2 of this year. In discussing our foreign policy at the invitation of my congressional colleagues of both Houses, I said in part:

"In the event of a serious and prolonged war, means of carrying on will be sought in this country by one, and perhaps both, sides. We will be urged to do this and that and the other. My conception of true neutrality is to treat the rest of the world, aside from the Western Hemisphere, alike. They will want our foodstuffs, our fibers, our metals, and perhaps our manufactured articles. The courses that we may choose to follow and maintain true neutrality are these:

"1. To sell nothing to anybody, or

"2. To sell anything to everybody.

"I favor the latter course. We are a productive nation and have a surplus of food and other things above our own requirements. There is no reason, in my opinion, why we should deny to any part of the rest of the world, whether engaged in war or not, any part of the surplus we have above our needs. To do so would not only disturb our own economic situation but would unnecessarily deprive a world needing our surplus, and needing it more, perhaps, because of war, than would be the case otherwise.

"But to this policy I would attach a condition that a clear title to anything we sell to any nation or group of nations engaged in war must pass from American citizens to a foreign purchaser before the commodities purchased leave our shores. You can call this the cash-and-carry system if you will, or the come-and-get-it method, if you choose. I have no quarrel with phraseology on this point, but it represents my idea of a correct policy for us to follow."

I have not changed my views since the delivery of that address. These have always been my views. However, those views were expressed at a time when there was no declared war in the world. That situation has changed. It is now a question of changing our rules of neutrality after war has begun. I am giving deep consideration to this point, and my conclusions may influence the vote I shall cast.

I am opposed to either the President or the Congress seeking to define an "aggressor," and firmly opposed to this country undertaking any responsibility of that kind

Under the theory of international law our vessels and our citizens have a right to travel on the high seas, even through combat zones. We fought two wars to defend that right. The trouble with the theory of the right of neutrals under international law is that in times of war belligerents pay no attention to these rights unless it suits their purpose to do so. I fully recognize that in not insisting upon these rights we are placing a limitation upon ourselves, but, as between maintaining our theoretical right under international law and staying out of war, I am for staying out of war. Therefore I shall, with my vote, support enforcing that limitation upon ourselves.

I opposed the Bloom bill in the last regular session of Congress. It was reputed to be a cash-and-carry bill. It was nothing of the kind. It was a bill that, if enacted into law, would have vested the President with discretion to handle relations between the United States and belligerent nations very much as he chose. I was then, and I am now, opposed to increasing Presidential discretion.

President Roosevelt was greatly disappointed because Congress would not accept the Bloom bill, which presumably was prepared by the Department of State in accordance with his views. He was severe in his criticism of Congress for its failure to accept that bill. Fortunately, the President has receded from that position, and the bill to be laid before the Senate tomorrow is, according to the last draft I have seen, free from any attempt to increase Presidential discretion. The measure we will begin to consider tomorrow is much superior to the Bloom bill.

Our entry into war or our keeping out of war will be dependent not upon the retention or the repeal of the embargo, nor upon the enactment of a cash-and-carry system, but upon our will to stay out of war and the wisdom of executive and legislative leaders in interpreting and applying the overwhelming desire to maintain peace.

To the best of my judgment, my own vote will be so cast. I, too, will to stay out of war.

America's Catholic Youth and Europe's War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 4, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY BISHOP SHEIL

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered over the National Broadcasting Co.'s red network on the evening of October 2, 1939, by the Most Reverend Bernard J. Sheil, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago. The address is entitled "America's Catholic Youth and Europe's War."

In passing, let me say that the address is a most interesting and timely one on the current problem of the day; and I trust that in these busy moments every Senator will find time to read the address in its entirety.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This morning came news that would almost strike dumb every lover of America, every faithful son and daughter of the Catholic Church, every man and woman of good will hoping in these dark days for the reign of intelligence and wisdom and justice in the world.

George Cardinal Mundelein, archbishop of Chicago, is dead.

Yesterday afternoon I was with him and the symbolism of a moment of harvest—of reward for a life grandly lived—is today so startling as to be incredible.

He asked me to come out to his home at St. Mary's of the Lake. There, in the little town of Mundelein, he had built the most modern of all our Catholic seminaries to train American youth to be servants of America and of the universal church.

There, 20 years ago, with the imagination and the courage of youth he had begun to build out of a swamp one of the great institutions for the education of youth in America. There he determined to blend all that was timelessly beautiful and inspiring in the art and the philosophy of democratic America, as an eagerly welcomed part of the timeless and universal art and the timeless and universal philosophy of a universal church.

His own villa was an architect's replica of George Washington's home at Mount Vernon. The chapel at which his young seminarians prayed and sang Palestrina was an adaptation of an American-Colonial church in Lyme, Conn., which he had admired for its beauty and its simplicity as a boy. There side by side in a joyous sense of the mighty place of the art and the thinking of democratic America in the unity of man's achievements, were the crucifix and the blessed mother, the prophets and the saints, the schoolmen and the great popes—and George Washington and Abraham Lincoln and the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

Unseen by his boys, we knelt at vespers in that colonial chapel. Before us, quite unconscious of the presence of their great patron, 200 American boys in the surplice and biretta of the seminarian chanted the age-old vesper service.

We stood in the library of the seminary with its Renaissance colonnade. The brilliant coffered ceiling bore his coat of arms of the busy bee. It was lettered with the names of great scholars of the church. But he talked most of his pride in one particular item of that library, the complete autographs of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, of all the Presidents of the United States, of all the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

As he rode over his grounds he spoke with unconcealed gratitude that God had vouchsafed to him, as to few men, the good fortune to see really accomplished in his lifetime a little of the things he had dared begin.

He talked proudly of how enduringly he had built in concrete and steel and how even more enduringly he had built in young men.

He talked feelingly of how he had tried to make a full place in his young men's lives for flowers, and music, and art.

He talked of "the undone vast" that lay ahead of him to give the spirit of America its full place in the spirit of the church, and to give the spirit of the church its full place in the spirit of America.

Constantly he referred to something President Roosevelt had said in a speech at the Statue of Liberty; that it seemed as if God, in His wisdom, had for centuries purposely hidden this Western Hemisphere from the sight of Europeans, beyond the veil of the seas, that mankind might have a second chance in this New World after almost ruining the old one.

And he cleared carefully with me, for the second time, the speech which he wished and authorized me to make tonight at Cincinnati at the National Conference of the Catholic Youth Organizations which were so close to his heart.

What he authorized me to say was controversial. It was something he would not have wanted to have said for him, except that he felt that others had created a situation which might be mistaken to compromise the position of the Catholic clergy toward the Congress of the United States, and toward his great friend and admiration, the President of the United States, in this hour of great decision on national policies so closely affecting his beloved youth of the United States.

All today I have taken counsel with my conscience against the promptings that all voices should be stilled at this time of grief.

But kneeling in prayer beside him with the spirit of yesterday afternoon upon me, I have felt that I would be unfaithful to the trust he imposed in me, as probably the last act of his conduct of his archdiocese, if I failed to bear tonight the counsels of his practical wisdom and his spiritual tolerance which he had wished me to say to his countrymen for him—his last message of loyalty to the political processes of representative democracy—his last message of loyalty to the spirit of God's tolerance in this troubled world.

What I say from now on is what this patriot of America, this prince of the universal church, had specifically authorized and approved my saying, in his exultant happiness and vision of the greatness of America in the golden light of yesterday afternoon.

A few months ago I crossed the Atlantic on my way to Rome to have the privilege of a visit with the Holy Father.

A few weeks ago I came back.

The crossing to Europe I made by airplane, by the Clipper.

The crossing back was so different, on a little vessel diverted from her regular run to take care of American refugees like myself. There were submarine warnings and a ban on radio communication for fear of revealing position.

The genius of aeronautics, the symbol of youth, as well as youth itself, had already been abused by political leadership, stupid to the point of a crime against God, to burn the life out of Polish cities whose destruction the Holy Father had tried so desperately to avert.

As I bade farewell to friends in Paris they told me with tears in their eyes how happy I should be that I was returning to America, "the last best hope of earth," where men might still do justice, love mercy, and humbly walk with God.

To give mankind its second chance here in this New World, the course of America seems so clear.

It is to stay out of Europe until peace comes to Europe, and under no circumstances send our American youth into Europe's wars.

Last week I was in Washington. I was heartened beyond words at official feeling. Everyone in Washington, from the President down, is determined that the United States shall keep its youth out of war.

There are many of God's innocents in Europe for whom our hearts bleed, and every instinct of Catholic followers of the Prince of Peace is to resent those who break this peace. But it is not a callousness—it is an ultimate service to the greatest interests of humanity—that we do stay out of this war, to husband our strength for two great purposes.

The first purpose is to defend what may be left with us of civilization against the risks of a mad revolutionary Europe blindly rolling on toward new worlds to conquer for antichrist.

The second purpose is to be really able to help a Europe, purged by its war of the materialistic causes of war, to come to a state of mind conducive to a lasting peace that will not sow the seeds for another war.

I do not want to be misunderstood.

Our sympathies are not confined to the people of any one nation or of any one group of nations engaged in the conflict. Our sympathies are with the common men and women of all nations, for we know that they all want peace and liberty, not war and domination.

As I came home I tried to think why there should be such enormous differences between the hemispheres in the ability of peoples of the same European stock to live together in friendship.

I thought to myself as I saw America again:

"Thank God for our material resources of enough to go around."

"Thank God for our spiritual tradition of mutual tolerance."

"But thank God, most of all, that in these crucial revolutionary years in Europe we have had the matchless political leadership in foreign affairs of President Roosevelt."

To have lived through a few months of Europe is to have known as never before what a precious thing that gift of political leadership is.

This tragedy of miserable common peoples, helpless and hopeless to know where their leaders are taking them or what to do about it—is not a tragedy of the natural gifts which God has given to Europe. It is a tragedy of human leaders, who blinded by their materialism and their conscious or unconscious selfishness have over a whole generation, in every country, committed a crime of false stewardship against humanity and against God.

For the materialistic philosophy of political diehards, morally and intellectually bankrupt, an entire continent is to pay the price of moral and material anarchy.

In the face of all the teachings of Christianity those diehards in all European nations were determined to prolong or achieve the exploitation of others.

The end result has been the unconscious instigation of a merciless revolutionary movement which like all great revolutions in history will feed on itself and burn blindly on until it has burned itself out.

Only in the Vatican is there in Europe the gift of statesman's vision possessed by President Roosevelt.

It is not strange.

The foresight of a statesman is a sense of how great masses of people are going to react and move, and that foresight is the reward only of those who really understand, because they really love and sincerely serve God's common people.

A few days ago you perhaps saw reprinted in your papers an editorial from the Osservatore Romano, the official newspaper of the Vatican. Every American Catholic must glow with pride at the praise which that editorial of the Vatican gave to President Roosevelt's latest message to Congress, and the identity it established between the views of the holy father and the views of our own President.

Let me read you just one sentence:

"It is impossible," says that editorial, "not to perceive the almost literal identity of the essential points enumerated by the head of state of one of the most powerful and modern nations of the world, and the principles enunciated by the supreme religious leader with the highest spiritual authority of the world. For the august Pontiff, preaching springs from revealed truth; for the statesman, it comes from concrete experience."

And in particular the editorial praises the President's message for its "noble appeal to religion."

This recognition that the two greatest leaders of the world think alike on the greatest problem in the world and that both these leaders are our leaders should make American Catholics feel not only proud but safe. It is a matter of particular joy to us that at this time of crisis these two great sources of inspiration are flowing in one direction.

And it is in the spirit of the warmth and gladness of the Vatican's response to the President's message that we members of the Catholic faith in the United States must do everything in our power to strengthen the President in his mighty task of guiding America to safety.

That should give the key to the attitude of American Catholics on the recommendations of the President now before the Congress to keep the country out of war.

No one believes more thoroughly than do I, very conscious that I am a member of a religious minority in this country, in the democratic process of free and complete discussion and the sacred right of petition.

We all hope that this session of Congress will furnish a forum in which the American people as a whole can thoroughly educate themselves to their great problem and reach an honest and Nation-wide conviction of the wise course to follow during these dangerous days.

But it constitutes disrespect for wisdom and experience, and is a positive impediment to our democratic process, deliberately to bludgeon Senators and Congressmen with letters and telegrams which can only be counted and not read. Every intelligent man knows that, by and large, with whatever exceptions, when such communications are not the product of selfish political instigation, they reflect only uninformed emotions and only confuse those who are trying to find practical means to retain peace.

There is for Catholics a peculiar obligation not to seem to abuse the fortunate existence of our magnificently organized church—a church whose divine mission sets it apart from and above human partisanship. Non-Catholics of good will should be given no reason to feel that an organized minority of the church is resorting to pressure tactics against the rest of the community on an issue which affects every citizen of this our country.

It is sheer arrogance and impertinence for any citizen or group of citizens to pretend that they are the exclusive guardians of peace.

As the President said in his message, "We all belong to the peace bloc."

Of course, there may be honest difference of opinion as to the means best calculated to keep us out of war. But during these times of stress and high tension it is of supreme importance that we keep cool heads and exercise calm, deliberate judgment. It is not time for slogans and emotional outbursts.

The decision as to the wise course to follow in foreign affairs is an amazingly complicated business dependent on a sensitive balance of knowledge of a thousand factors, which few men have.

The devising of a course of action in such circumstances is the gift of a statesman.

It is derived, as the Vatican newspaper says, from "concrete experience."

It is not something to be divined by emotional charlatans who have become statesmen overnight and whose unctuous voices betray a first urge to hear themselves, no matter whose thought they convey.

You know what—and whom—I mean.

I lived through the last few crucial weeks in Europe itself. But I do not consider that qualifies me to set myself up as a prophet to urge on the world my judgment that the President's judgment is wrong.

This complicated problem of how to stay clear of war is a problem of judgment—of practical judgment—for experts in the business, not a matter of amateur logic or of good intentions. The "last best hope of earth" is now in the keeping not of our hearts but of our heads. Those of us who do not make such problems our business are really no more competent to be our own statesmen than to be our own doctor or our own lawyer.

Let us respect the processes of representative democracy by leaving the problem to Congress and the President whom we elected for that purpose, without trying to withdraw the election by high-pressuring their deliberations.

As between our great leader on the one hand, whose humanity, Christianity, and judgment have been proved time and time again in international affairs, and those, on the other hand, whose judgment has been proved to be wrong or has not been proved at all, there is only one common-sense course to follow for those of us who are not experts in the President's business.

It is to accept his leadership, to trust his solemnly expressed intentions to protect our youth from war, and to give him the benefit of unsolvable doubts.

But while we members of the Catholic faith place our trust in the ability and the integrity of the President to direct our united self-protection against external danger, we have an individual Catholic duty to keep our beloved democracy from breaking down within.

The greatest asset of that democracy is the intangible mutual respect that lets live here in productive peace the very same races and people that in Europe seek for each other's blood. In other countries ties of common race, common culture, common form of religion reconcile internal conflicts. We have no such bonds. These are the only ties by which we are bound together in a free nation, capable of a united will for self-defense, for self-preservation, our tradition of live and let live; our conscious appreciation of the necessity of friendship and trust in each other; our belief in a common future as a new people greater than ever the world has seen. We are—and never forget it—a composite people.

In the depths of the titanic struggle across the water many attempts will be made to turn our minorities against one another, to turn all of them against our leaders, and to destroy those slender bonds of the united will of a free people.

Those who preach race hatred and intolerance among us in such a world at war are traitors to our lonely democracy.

They menace our moral unity.

They divide our precious strength.

We Catholics are the greatest organized body within this country founded upon the teachings of the Christ who said, "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

We have a particular responsibility to continue the Catholic Church as a tremendous force for tolerance and mutual racial respect, so that Christianity, humanity, and American democracy can survive.

It is a clear lesson of history that whenever racial hatred gets a real start in a land, it is the beginning of the dissolution of civilization in that land.

No man can be both honest and intelligent if he professes to want to safeguard peace in America at the same time he preaches the kind of racial hatred which has destroyed peace everywhere else in the world.

What we need in this country today—with all its magnificent pent-up energy of youth straining to find an outlet—is a real vision of mankind's second chance. We need a vista of building here greater than we know—a civilization so generous, so magnificent that youth of all religions and races will care much more for what they give to that magnificence than for what each of them gets out of it—an America to which a spiritually exhausted world may turn as to the monastery in the mountains of the Lost Horizon.

Let there be no mistake about it. The supreme battle of the modern world is the battle for God and the moral law. There are powerful, well-organized forces in the world today which are aggressively and fanatically anti-God. The vast resources of many governments themselves are being employed to uproot from the minds and the hearts of peoples the sacred ideas of God, religion, and morality.

That is why we have powerful and compelling reasons to thank God on bended knees that we live in a country where religion is in honor; that we have a great Executive who shows by word and example that he has a profound belief in God and supreme reverence for divine Providence.

Eager, vigorous, courageous, enlightened youth is the one force which can and will scrap the deadly international policies of lying and deceit, chicanery, and hypocrisy which have brought the world to such a sorry pass.

In the titanic struggle before us, in which the destiny of civilization will be determined, we must have young men and women who are prepared to throw themselves into that struggle with dauntless courage and quenchless enthusiasm.

What will give them that enthusiasm? Not the material prizes for which too many men and women of my generation have wasted their lives. This young generation—and I know them so well—are the most idealistic, just because they are the best educated and most sophisticated generation the world has ever seen.

They will not work from greed or to protect greed.

They will work, as no men or women have ever worked before, for the moral law, to make a world dedicated to God that by their own idealistic standards is worth living in.

That is why everyone who really wants to save our American democracy should support in every possible way those—and I care not of what denomination—who are to strengthen youth in their devotion to God and the moral law.

In creating a united will of a free people to keep America safe for democracy, those who are laboring in the churches building the Nation's moral front are building the real fighting front.

In the world which such a youth will build all men will live as enduring friends and mankind as a single united body bound by one faith in God and one truth from God.

In that world, war will be banished forever and peace forever honored.

While we are watching our own youth build that world, let us, in compassion, remember the youth of Europe who were not fortunate enough to have our second chance.

These are the beautiful words of charity of our beloved cardinal adapted from his last letter to his clergy, with which he was most anxious I should close:

"Let us pray for the victims of war, pray for the wounded and maimed, for the orphaned and homeless.

"Pray for the repose of the souls of the men and boys, hurried into eternity in the springtime of youth, in the strength of young manhood, not of their own volition, pawns on the chessboard, fodder for cannon.

"Pray for those others who loved their country and were willing to offer the supreme sacrifice that their children might have freedom and prosperity—and peace."

The Boyhood of Lincoln

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 4, 1939

ADDRESS BY ROSS F. LOCKRIDGE

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, one of the things we cherish most in Indiana is the Lincoln tradition. In the hills of southern Indiana Lincoln spent the formative years of his life, and we are endeavoring to preserve the story of his boyhood.

On October 1, 1939, a distinguished Hoosier historian, Mr. Ross F. Lockridge, delivered, under the auspices of the Boonville Press Club, in Spencer County, Ind., a most interesting and informative address about the boyhood of Lincoln.

I ask unanimous consent that this address may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Hoosiers of southern Indiana, I have been requested to speak upon a subject rather specifically worded as follows: "On this spot let us erect a suitable Lincoln monument." Although I shall adhere to this subject, yet I think I should say that I do not mean to waive entirely the possibility that it might be found feasible to erect such a monument at one of the other great Lincoln sites in Spencer County.

I wish to say that, in my opinion, there are at least three other very notable sites in this county, connected with the boyhood and youth of Lincoln, which might offer eligible locations for a monument to Lincoln—the Hoosier youth. These are: The site of his log-cabin home at Lincoln City, in what is now the Nancy Hanks Lincoln Park; the site of one of the log school houses where he attended school, on State Road No. 62, about a mile south of Gentryville; and the site of the Lincoln landing on the Ohio River in Rockport.

I think it will be agreed by all that any one of these places, and possibly others, would be eligible for such a monument. Indeed, we might broaden our consideration here today to cover the general subject: "Let us erect a suitable Lincoln monument in southern Indiana." I wish to call your attention to the fact that there are several Lincoln monuments of heroic proportions already erected in Indiana, but not in southern Indiana. I shall mention three of these: The magnificent monument of Lincoln in front of the Lincoln National Life Building at Fort Wayne, representing him in the pride of his young manhood just as he was leaving Indiana; the impressive monument of Lincoln as President, located in the courthouse yard at Wabash; and the heroic statue of President Lincoln in University Park, Indianapolis. There is a splendid monument to Lincoln nearer this spot than any of these, but it is not in Indiana. I refer to the very handsome Lincoln Memorial on the Illinois side of the Wabash at Vincennes, where he entered Illinois as a full-grown man in 1830.

Certainly it is most timely and opportune that a movement be launched here today to erect a monument in the form of a statue of heroic proportions, as a fitting recognition of the 14 formative years that Abe Lincoln spent as a growing youth here in southern Indiana. I speak only for myself when I say that I shall have no interest in any such movement that does not contemplate a Lincoln monument of quality, caliber, and cost fully equal to, if not superior to, any of these others that I have mentioned.

And now I shall address my remarks to the eligibility of this particular place for such a purpose. I am happy to say that there are abundant human and historical associations that nominate this handsome historic roadside park, the Abe Lincoln Ferry Park, which we are dedicating today as an eminently fitting site for a monument to Abe Lincoln, Hoosier, in his particular character as a ferryman or flat-boat man.

Right here the Hoosier youth, Abe Lincoln, spent the greater part of his time during about 9 months of his seventeenth year (1825–26) operating a ferry across Anderson Creek as a hired hand of James Taylor. The old pioneer river road at that time crossed Anderson Creek here between where the present road crosses it and where it joins the Ohio—probably a little nearer the Ohio than the modern road. There was no bridge. Anderson Creek was deep and was often swollen so that it was dangerous, if not impossible, to ford it. So Abe ran a ferry here with a small flat boat that would carry one team and wagon at a time. Anderson Creek was properly known then as Anderson River. It was recognized as a navigable stream. By act of the Indiana Legislature January 17, 1820, Anderson River was declared navigable as far as Hurricane Fork, near St. Meinrad.

I think it very important in this connection to note the actual conditions that prevailed here at that time. While Abe was working here, a small village showed signs of starting at this place. Later it became known as Maxville, which was laid out and platted in 1841. A few scattering houses were built and some business places were erected. It flourished for several decades during steamboat days, but with the decline of river traffic it passed away entirely. During the time that Abe worked here, in the years 1825 and 1826, steamboating was just beginning to enjoy its early heyday on the Ohio. La Belle Riviere was enjoying its temporary distinction as the Main Street of America. The first steamboat passed this place less than 15 years before. Even before Maxville became a village the mouth of Anderson Creek was a notable stopping, landing, and loading place. It became a favorite loafing place for men and boys of the community, both during daytime and evening. Here, around a campfire while waiting for passengers, Abe enjoyed many happy hours, telling stories and taking part in rough country frolics. He was just then reaching his full height of 6 feet and 4 inches. On every foot of this ground he ran and jumped and wrestled with the husky youths and strong men of this pioneer river settlement. So I think it must be noted that from the standpoint of the physical development of this remarkable boy, this spot suggests some very significant associations for our consideration now. What could be more appropriate than the erection right here of a statue, depicting that husky youth just as he looked here—just like he was when he lived, and worked, and played here on this spot?

There are associations here also that suggest some very important features in the development of his mental faculties and in the formation of some of the peculiar habits for which he became especially noted.

Just then entering upon his greatest awakening of mental curiosity and his intellectual enjoyment of all human contacts, the boy Lincoln cultivated his growing habit of storytelling here while listening with interest to the wonderful yarns of men who had been in many strange places. The rivermen and the steamboat travelers were of vast interest to him. Abe boarded all the boats and talked with all the folks, both passengers and crew, at every opportunity, thus rapidly broadening his views of the big outside world. It is easy to believe that his chief ambition at this time was to be captain of a steamboat.

This was his first experience as a riverman and it took him entirely out of the little backwoods settlement into a new and strange world. He must have observed many remarkable flotillas here and certainly came into very intimate contact with some of them. During that very time, probably early in January 1826, the famous Boatload of Knowledge conducted by Robert Owen and William Maclure, with their illustrious company of teachers, scientists, and artists, passed this way on their voyage to New Harmony. Young Robert Dale Owen was on that boat. He was destined to influence President Lincoln greatly in his preparation and issuance of the Proclamation of Emancipation by a famous letter that "stirred the President like a trumpet call." Whether or not Abe actually talked with members of the Boatload of Knowledge here as they passed on that eventful voyage, he had full knowledge of it later and of the great social experiment at New Harmony, of which Dennis Hanks said in later life that "it well nigh druv' Abe crazy." During that time he was reading the New Harmony Gazette and thus became familiar with the principles of the Owenite Community of Equality. Certainly many of the humanitarian ideals of Robert Owen and of Robert Dale Owen were adopted by Abraham Lincoln.

It was just about this time, or probably a few months earlier, May 25, 1825, that the celebrated Marquis de Lafayette went up the Ohio past this place and was wrecked upon the huge rock at Lafayette Springs just about Cannelton, some 12 miles from here. Lafayette was compelled to camp there around a campfire at the spring in the rock for several hours, which attracted the attention of the whole countryside. Lincoln knew of all these things and was deeply affected by them. His experiences here broadened his opportunities for reading and enlarged his choice of books. He was afterward quoted as saying that he read every book "within a radius of 50 miles" from his home, which was only about 15 miles from here. A life-sized, or heroic statue, here, would surely reflect the significance of all these vital associations.

I hope I can give adequate emphasis to one significant event that occurred here, which I consider most outstanding in its effect upon the mind and heart of this developing youth.

It was right here that Abe earned the first dollar he could rightly call his own. His regular pay, as a hired hand, went to his father. But Abe became ambitious to do something for himself, so he built his own scow in order to do some business on his own account along the river here at odd hours. Abe told one day in Cabinet meeting how he earned his first dollar at this place. Secretary Seward wrote down the story in the President's own words, as follows:

"I was contemplating my new boat, and wondering whether I could make it stronger or improve it in any part, when two men with trunks came down to the shore in carriages, and asked, 'Will you,' said one of them, 'take us and our trunks out to the steamer?' 'Certainly,' said I. I was very glad to have the chance of earning something, and supposed that each of them would give me a couple of bits. The trunks were put in my boat, the passengers seated themselves on them, and I sculled them out to the steamer. They got on board, and I lifted the trunks and put them on the deck. The steamer was about to put on steam again, when I called out, 'You have forgotten to pay me.' Each of them took from his pocket a silver half dollar and threw it on the bottom of my boat."

Here the President paused and gave thoughtful emphasis to the remainder of his statement.

"I could scarcely believe my eyes as I picked up the money. You may think it was a very little thing, and in these days it seems to me like a trifle, but it was a most important incident in my life. I could scarcely credit that I, the poor boy, had earned a dollar in less than a day; that by honest work I had earned a dollar. The world seemed wider and fairer before me. I was a more hopeful and thoughtful boy from that time."

It was right out here in the middle of the Ohio River where that episode occurred.

Surely it goes without saying that a monument erected here depicting that lusty boy, as he was then, looking out over the beautiful Ohio where that important incident in his life occurred, would impress all that may be privileged to look upon such a monument, with the touching significance of that episode, which was to make of him "a more hopeful and thoughtful boy." Moreover this incident was to have some very practical and immediate results. It was this incident, or another like it, that gave Abraham his first experience in law. Kentucky jurisdiction ran to the low-water mark on the Indiana side and there were two Dill brothers operating a ferry across the Ohio at this place under a Kentucky license. They filed charges against Abe and brought him before Squire Samuel Pate, a Kentucky justice of peace, near here on the other side of the river, to be tried for running a ferry without a license. Abe pleaded his own case. He said he did not take passengers across the river, but only to midstream so they might board steamers that would not stop. There was no other way for them to take such steamers here. There was no law covering such a situation. It was a work of simple necessity. He had not "set them over the river" and therefore had not violated any law. Kentucky did not require a license for such service.

Judge Pate sustained Abraham's argument and dismissed the case. This was the beginning of his interest in law and in courts, and he frequently crossed the Ohio here in his flatboat to visit that Kentucky judge and to talk with him and hear him try cases. He also attended corn huskings and other frolics across the river as well as on this side.

It goes without saying that a monument erected here on the banks of the Ohio River would, of course, illumine the elemental influence that this great river had in determining the character and even the public career of Abraham Lincoln. Therefore I wish to call attention to some related experiences that Lincoln had on the Ohio River at other places than here at Anderson Creek.

Beginning with his flatboat experience here at Anderson Creek, Abe broadened his river activities rapidly. In 1827 he worked several weeks as a day laborer on the Portland Canal around the falls of the Ohio at Louisville, and the following year he made that famous trip from Rockport by flatboat all the way to New Orleans.

The rivermen of the Ohio and the Mississippi always regarded Lincoln as one of themselves. This was expressed in a dispatch from Rockport, Ind., May 21, 1860, when he was nominated for President:

"Old flatboat men claim him as one of their number, and as he was a safe pilot in guiding hundreds of boats through the torturous windings of the Father of Waters so they are quite willing to trust him with the helm of the ship of state."

Abe's flatboat experiences had some strangely practical results. While practicing law at Springfield, Ill., he invented and patented a device for improving the handling of flatboats. His intimate knowledge of flatboats was responsible for a unique development in the history of naval warfare during the Civil War. When the Swedish inventor, John Ericsson, was turned down by the Navy Department on a new model that consisted simply of two guns on a revolving turret mounted on a broad, flat surface, like the deck of a raft or flatboat, the persistent Swede appealed to the President. Abe was interested immediately. He said, "I'm not an authority on battleships but I am an expert on flatboats, and this looks to me like it is built on sound flatboat principles." He accompanied the Swede to the Navy Department and insisted on a trial. The result was the Monitor, a strange looking craft, like a cheese box on a raft, which won that signal victory over the Merrimac, March 9, 1862. This revolutionized naval warfare, introducing the iron-sheeted cruiser. I think this is worth a statue on the beautiful Ohio.

At this point I want to attempt a constructive interpretation of the more than passing influence that all of this river life and these associations had upon the boy, who was destined to be the emancipator of a race and the savior of a nation.

Abe's early life near the Ohio River, his flatboating experience here at Anderson Creek and on the Ohio, together with his two long trips down the Ohio and down the Mississippi to New Orleans, made a profound impression upon his very being. From all this he got an unalterable understanding of the physical integrity and unity of America. To him the Ohio River was always the beloved connecting link between Kentucky, the happy home of his childhood, and Indiana, the happy home of his boyhood. He could not contemplate this well-loved river as a hostile border. He had lived on both sides of this river, he'd played on both sides, he'd worked on both sides, and he had courted girls on both sides of it. He had stone bruises on his feet, made on both sides of the Ohio. He had earned his first dollar upon it. He had flatboated up and down its broad surface. He had looked lovingly upon it year after year from both sides.

If the Union should be divided, it would have to divide here at the Ohio. This was incomprehensible and impossible to Abraham Lincoln. He could not give up his dear Kentucky as he knew it here. All this was in his heart and mind when he made that immortal appeal in his first inaugural address to the North and South.

"Physically speaking, we canot separate. We cannot remove our respective sections from each other nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face; and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. It is impossible then to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before. Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among friends? Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, you cease fighting the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you."

I have no doubt at all that when he made this classic appeal he had immediately in his mind this beloved river as he knew it best right here; and that out of this came that almost incomprehensible love of union, which was to be the most dominating single influence in his career as the man of the ages.

Abraham Lincoln's love of union cannot be explained by any application of academic principles. It was fundamentally a part of him. It had simply grown into him so deeply that he was permeated with it through and through. It was taught him by the greatest of all teachers, great Nature, as he contacted Nature here in this organic relation of land and water.

Thus his love of union became elemental in his nature through soil and water—the soil of Indiana and the soil of Kentucky and the waters of the Ohio. The integrity of the Union became the stanchest factor of his convictions. Though he hated slavery with all the intensity of his nature, his love of union was greater than his hatred of slavery. He often said in the very heat of the antislavery contest:

"Much as I hate slavery, I would consent to the extension of it rather than that the Union should be dissolved, just as I would consent to any great evil to avoid a greater one."

And out of that deep and fundamental conviction he declared officially right when the fight against slavery was hottest:

"I would save the Union. I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored the nearer the Union will be 'the Union as it was.' If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union."

To this he added:

"I intend no modification of my oft-declared personal wish that all men everywhere could be free."

In fact, he had already prepared a rough draft of the Emancipation Proclamation and was only awaiting a favorable opportunity to issue it when it might be most helpful to the Union. Now, I think it is clear that a monument here, where he had his most consistent contact with the Ohio River, would inspire profound reflection upon the historic background that made him the "savior of the Union."

And here I want to make reference to what is perhaps the most intimate suggestion that could be offered as to the significance of a monument at this place. This suggestion is that a monument here will be truly representative of his entire life in southern Indiana.

This junction of Anderson Creek with the Ohio River here may be taken as the very heart of the so-called Hoosier Lincoln country. It was at Tobinsport, Ky., some 20 miles up the river from here, where the Lincoln family is believed to have crossed the Ohio into Indiana in 1816. They came down past Lafayette Springs near Cannelton and are supposed to have camped there one night, right where Lafayette was shipwrecked some 9 years later. They came on through Troy down this old pioneer road, then north and west, to the place where they made their new home about 15 miles from here. The town of Rockport, which is about 17 miles down the river from here, is also about the same distance as Troy from the Lincoln home—about 15 miles. Rockport, on the Ohio, became Lincoln's home town and county seat. There he heard law cases tried and borrowed law books. From there he made his great flatboat trip to New Orleans in 1828.

The Lincoln farm home, about 15 miles northwest of here, is now a part of the Nancy Hanks Lincoln Park. There his mother and only sister are buried. It was there that Abraham Lincoln was "raised," as he said. There he got his schooling from Hoosier schoolmasters in Hoosier log schoolhouses. There he lived from the age of 7 to the age of 21, from the fall of 1816 to March 1, 1830.

So it follows naturally that a monument here would accentuate to all the world the fact that Abraham Lincoln was a Hoosier. He was a genuine Hoosier. The origin of that now well-known term has never been fully agreed upon, but its original meaning and application are well known. It came into being while Lincoln lived in Indiana, and it came to be applied to the people of Indiana. Whatever its derivation, it signified at that time a rough and husky fellow, such as those Indiana backwoodsmen were, such as Abe certainly was. The very year the Lincolns left Indiana this popular term became classic through the poem The Hoosier's Nest, by John Finley, which was given to the world on New Year's Day 1830:

"I'm told, in riding somewhere west,
A stranger found a Hoosier's nest—

* * * * * * *

Two rifles placed above the door;
Three dogs lay stretched upon the floor—
In short, the domicile was rife
With specimens of Hoosier life."

Lincoln was brought up in such a Hoosier's nest. He was "raised" a Hoosier.

Finally a monument at this place looking directly upon the Ohio will be a fitting symbol of what this beautiful river meant to the heart and soul of Lincoln. Although the great river boats that Lincoln loved to see and to board at this place have passed away, just as his humble ferryboat has passed away, yet the beauty of the river remains the same. It offers here a picturesque prospect for recreation, meditation, and inspiration linking the forever-changing present with the immutable past. While birdlike planes soar far above it, mingling with the fleecy clouds in the azure blue—symbols of a progress that the Hoosier youth, farseeing as he was, could not foresee—this splendid modern highway will continue to bring speeding throngs in ever greater numbers to this place to enjoy its scenic beauty and to contemplate here, just as Abe Lincoln did, the age-old history and the mystic charm of the beautiful Ohio. I have no doubt that he contemplated it in the spirit expressed in the lines of a Hoosier poetess, Bessie H. Wolford, who dwelt beside it:

"When the trees that God planted in Eden were young,
When the nations of earth were one kindred and tongue,
Ere a leader arose to make Israel free,
Or the Nazarene wandered by fair Galilee,
Then, as now, thou wert flowing forever and ever,
Through ages of silence, O beautiful river.

* * * * * * *

Flow on, bearing with thee the tide of the years,
Our joys and our sorrows, our smiles and our tears;
Flow on with unchanging, unchangeable motion,
Like thee, we move on to eternity's ocean;
Till life shall be lost in the life of the Giver,
Onward, flow onward, O beautiful river."

With all these influences going into our very beings—as they went into him—as we look upon a suitable monument of the boy Lincoln here, we may enter into the very feelings of that wonderful youth who got some of his "raising" here.

The Ohio River is the river of Lincoln, just as truly as it is the river of George Rogers Clark and the river of La Salle—La Belle Riviere. It flowed through the very spirit of his youth, even as it flowed through the very heart of America. To him it was the backbone of America—the great American way. Standing here upon the very ground that was so often pressed by his feet, gazing upon the river, where his eyes rested lovingly upon it and upon fair Kentucky, we may enter into something of the formative influences that determined the career of this "man of the ages" and feel kinship with the "better angels" that ever attended him.

"Born in Kentucky, raised in Indiana," as he said, and contacting the Ohio intimately throughout his youth, with loved ones forever at rest on both sides of it, we may believe that out of these associations and memories came the inspiration of his appeal to the North and South in the classic conclusion of his first inaugural address:

"We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break, our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature."

Surely all this vast range of associations should be in the contemplation of those who are charged with the movement to erect a suitable monument to the Hoosier boy, Abe Lincoln, in southern Indiana. There is today no suitable statue of Lincoln as a boy. Certainly there ought to be one at least, and it ought to be here in southern Indiana, where he spent most of his boyhood years. The erection of such a statue would be a fine objective memorial to him. He was himself decidedly objective in his habits of thinking. He liked to see things in their natural and objective relations.

Such a statue ought to be erected on the Ohio River. There is, I believe, no Lincoln statue now on the banks of the beautiful Ohio. There are Lincoln monuments, of course, in some Ohio River cities, such as Cincinnati and Louisville, but these statues are not directly on the river. Such a statue should depict him in his youthful character, as a riverman—a ferryman or flatboatman—as he was here. Surely there is an abundance of human and historical associations to elect this place—the Abe Lincoln Ferry Park—as a proper location for such a statue.

And so I conclude by reiterating my subject: On This Spot Let Us Erect a Suitable Lincoln Monument.

Keeping America Out of the War

EDITORIAL FROM WILMINGTON (DEL.) JOURNAL-EVERY EVENING

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening, of the issue of Wednesday, September 20, 1939. The editorial is entitled "America Can Keep Out."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening, of September 20, 1939]

AMERICA CAN KEEP OUT

With Congress on the eve of a special session, now is as good a time as any for every American to abandon the mistaken notion that sooner or later this country must get into the war. There is no excuse for this kind of thinking. There is no reason for voicing this kind of judgment.

On the contrary, it will be vastly to the benefit of the nation if all its citizens resolve herewith to have no more to do with the philosophy of futility which has captured the minds of so many of their fellow-citizens. A defeatist attitude is unworthy of Americans. More than that, it is positively dangerous.

It is true, of course, that the United States was unable to stay out of the World War. But we are people of a poor state, indeed, if we have not learned, from the bitter experiences of that conflict, what course we must follow to avoid a repetition of all the horrors and all the loss of blood and treasure which marked our other adventure on foreign fields.

Let us, then, say to ourselves and keep repeating to ourselves that America must stay out of this war, whether it last 2 months or 10 years.

Let us, by no act of ours as a Nation, encourage any other country to believe that we are going to war. Let us focus our main attention, not on the continent of Europe and its never-ending quarrels and hatreds, but on the continent of North America where our primary interests lie and where our future destiny rests.

Americans today are called upon to save no democracy except their own. They are under no obligation to anybody except other Americans. Their great function, perhaps their one function, in these days of crisis is to demonstrate to all the world that they can make their own democracy work and that those who live under its shining aegis can be happy, peaceful, and contented.

Americans have no mission and no purpose to reform other nations or to alter their pattern. If the Germans want nazi-ism let them have it. If the Russians like communism or the Italians prefer fascism that is their privilege. If the Japanese think they fare best under army rule who are we to tell them that they are misguided?

Americans, moreover, have no right to preach or to moralize. They have faults of their own which need to be corrected. They have economic and social troubles which need to be cured. In short, America has its own business to mind, a business which exacts every ounce of its energy and attention.

America can keep out of the war. It will keep out of the war provided its people so resolve and so determine. The great mass of our citizens are for peace. They can have it by refusing steadfastly to accept the alternative or to take any step which makes the alternative inevitable.

Democracy at Bay

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 4, 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. ERNEST H. WILKINS, PRESIDENT OF OBERLIN COLLEGE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the assembly address delivered by Dr. Ernest H. Wilkins, president of Oberlin College, on September 20, 1939. The subject of the address is Democracy at Bay.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We meet under the heaviest shadow that has darkened any college opening within your lifetime—a shadow darker, in some ways, than that which shrouded us in the Septembers of the World War.

What will the year bring forth for us? The shadow is not likely to diminish or to disappear. Will it remain a lowering menace, or will black storm descend upon us also?

In Europe, where the storm rages most furiously, the issue is clearly drawn. Clearly drawn, that is, as a present and immediate issue—less and less clearly drawn if one takes into account the actions and inactions that have led to the catastrophe. But now, in September 1939, there confront each other, on the lands, on the waters, and in the skies of Europe, forces which are fairly to be called forces, respectively, of dictatorship and of democracy, of tyranny and of freedom. On the one side, a ruthless lust for domination, which has crushed freedom even in the land of its own growth, and has by force and fraud reached out to enslave still other lands; on the other side, nations bred in the knowledge and the use of freedom, rising at last with infinite reluctance to meet what seems to them an ineluctable challenge.

It is not all utter black against pure white. Among the motives of the darker side there is an element of legitimate resentment and disillusion; and among those who stand on the darker side the vast majority, despite present compulsion, would engage far more gladly in works of light than in works of darkness. And on the brighter side the hands and hearts of the combatant democracies are by no means unstained.

Yet the present European conflict is in its essence, nonetheless, a mortal struggle between tyranny and democracy; and the outcome of that struggle is inestimably momentous, not for Europe only but for the whole world.

Meanwhile, in the Far East another aggressor still wages pitiless war upon the most peace loving of all the nations of the earth. And if that struggle is now for us surpassed in immediate concern, we may well remember that it is growing ever more bitter for the vast hordes of those who have already suffered, for the inoffensive millions from whom the crash of hurtling destruction is never very far away.

Where do we stand in such a world, as nation and as democracy? Where do we stand in point of danger; where do we stand in point of duty?

That we stand in some degree of danger no one can reasonably deny; but it is easy to overestimate or to underestimate the degree of danger in which we stand.

By danger I mean, of course, danger of drifting or being drawn or being driven into war. The experience of war, even if it should not terminate in defeat, would be catastrophic, not only in its unspeakable self and in the misery of its subsequent depression but in the impairment of democracy which would inevitably attend it and would be all too likely to linger and to increase after its close.

We stand in danger, in various ways, from Germany, from England and France, from Japan, and from ourselves.

We stand in double danger from Germany—first, because of German submarine activity; and, second, because, following a German success in the war, we should become a proximate objective for further conquest.

Under our Neutrality Act as it now stands we cannot export arms, ammunition, or implements of war to the belligerents, but we are free to export to them materials which are classed or will soon be classed as contraband. Germany is blockading Britain by submarine. Under international law Germany has the right to stop and search American merchant vessels and to remove contraband or tow a contraband-carrying vessel into port. She has the right to sink such vessels if they refuse to stop or resist search and seizure, but not otherwise. German submarines cannot transship contraband and cannot tow vessels into port; and Germany considers that these circumstances create an exception which justifies her in sinking any vessels carrying contraband—a doctrine which this country does not accept. We may then expect such sinkings. If they are not too numerous, if they take place in European waters, and if they are carried out without great loss of American life, we shall presumably content ourselves with protests. If Germany goes berserk, as she did before, our mounting resentment will impel us toward war and may push us in. Yet Germany certainly does not want us in the war; and our own resistance to entrance as a result of submarine activity is apparently much greater than it was 25 years ago. I rate this danger, therefore, as very real, but not immediate.

We stand in some measure of danger from Germany, also, because nazi-ism is avowedly bent not only on European but on world conquest; and because if the present war beats down England and France, the Atlantic becomes a Rhine. On our peace day last spring I quoted to you several statements of Nazi ambition for world conquest. Let this one song-refrain suffice as reminder of them all:

"Today Germany is ours, tomorrow the whole world.
Heute gehört uns Deutschland und morgen die ganze Welt."

But I think that the danger from such mania for conquest, though real, is less than it was last spring; for up to that date the mania had not been challenged—and now, at last, the challenge has come.

If Germany should prevail and should so weaken England and France that they could no longer serve as barriers, we should face across the open sea a rampant planetary madness inflamed with victory, jealous of our power, covetous of our resources, and hostile to our democracy. Moreover, if Germany should overwhelm France and England, democracy would disappear in those two countries and in the remaining smaller European democracies as well, and that disappearance would immeasurably impair the strength of the democratic principle in our own land. At the moment it does not look as though Germany could so prevail, though stalemate looks more probable than a Franco-British victory; but if the unholy alliance of Germany and Russia—an alliance which cynically proves the hypocrisy of the Nazi abhorrence of communism and the Communist abhorrence of nazi-ism, and confirms both regimes as twins in sheer dictatorship—if that unholy alliance should become an active military alliance, then the danger to England and France, and to ourselves would be very greatly increased.

We stand in danger, in a different way, from England and France. It would be greatly to their advantage to have us enter the war on their side; and it may be expected that they will try to get us in. They can make a strong case for our intervention. But I believe that our resistance to propaganda, even to propaganda based on fact, is definitely greater than it has ever been before. This danger, then, though it exists, is also secondary rather than immediate.

We stand in some slight danger from Japan. Japan, like Germany, is imbued, as I pointed out in my peace-day talk last spring, with the mania for world domination—a mania which rests, in her case, in a deeply rooted conviction of her own divinity. But the menace of that madness is probably less than it was last spring—partly because of the continuance of Chinese resistance, partly because of the momentary loosening of ties between Japan and Germany. On the other hand, that madness is unquestionably being fed by a growing conviction of British helplessness. Moreover, our own Government this summer, in its denunciation of our commercial treaty with Japan, took a step which was intended and was felt as punitive. There is therefore danger of retaliation—danger which will be increased if we take further action adverse to the interests of Japan. Even so, the danger from Japan alone could hardly be rated at this time as more than slight. But if Germany should succeed in bringing about an active triple military alliance between herself, Russia, and Japan, then our Pacific danger would be more than triply multiplied.

We stand in danger also from ourselves—from those who might expect to make large gains of any sort if we should enter the war, and from sensationalism and the emotional response thereto. But in both these fields we have new curbs, which will suffice at least to check our progress on the old road to war; and if our danger increases it may be expected that such curbs will be increased as well. We stand in danger also from those leaders, who, while honestly desiring to keep us out of war, may through unwisdom advocate measures which would tend to bring us in.

And we stand in danger from all the imperfections of our own democracy—the cleavages, the injustices, the ignorance, the selfishness, all that impairs a democracy, noble despite these imperfections, but potentially so much nobler still. The presence of such flaws and tensions in the body politic renders it weaker and more unsteady than it would otherwise be, more liable to yield to pressure, more liable to topple into war.

Yet with the many dangers faced and thus assessed, this seems to me a fair conclusion: In Europe democracy is truly at bay; our own democracy, though endangered, is not yet at bay, but it must stand on guard. In other words, while the danger of our being drawn into the war is extensive and varied, my present judgment is that that danger is not immediate. It is all too clear that we may be drawn into the war, but I do not think that our entrance is inevitable. On the contrary, my present opinion is that we can stay out, if we are sufficiently determined to do so, and if we exercise a perpetual vigilance.

What, then, is our duty with reference to our inner danger, with reference to Japan, and, most of all, with reference to the European war?

I have already alluded to the curbing of war profits and of sensationalism, and I shall turn presently to the problem of our neutrality. To the perpetual theme of our inner betterment, I shall not revert today.

As for Japan, it still seems to me, as it did last winter when I talked to you on the dilemma of neutrality, that the President's failure to apply the Neutrality Act to the war between Japan and China was inexcusable. He certainly frustrated the intention of the law and of its makers; the nonapplication of the act is certainly operating now, as I always thought it would, to the advantage of Japan, and we have kept greedily on with the utterly foolish business of arming a country which, though traditionally and most desirably a friend, is at the moment a potential enemy. Our proper present action with regard to Japan seems to me, therefore, to be the all-too-belated application of the Neutrality Act to the war between Japan and China.

As for the European war, the situation is much more complex. The two general possibilities are, of course, that we should go in, and that we should stay out. I believe, as the great majority of our citizens most obviously believe, that unless circumstances change markedly, we should stay out, but as intelligent and influential men and women we can hardly let our minds rest in that negative conclusion unless we have faced squarely the case for intervention.

The strength of that case has indeed been indicated by much that I have already said in the course of this address. Forces which are now, on the whole, forces of evil are engaged in mortal struggle with forces which are now, on the whole, forces of good. The forces of evil are specifically forces of dictatorship; the forces of good are specifically forces of democracy. Shall we stand by and watch passively while the evil ravages the good, while dictatorship moves to the destruction of democracy? England and France are fighting not only their war but ours; are barriers between ourselves and rampant madness. Shall we stand by and take the chance that they will win for us? The appeal is twofold; it summons our sense of chivalry, and it excites our own defensive self-interest.

Too late. If only, before disaster fell, if only we had evolved some effective form of world organization or quasi world organization. If only we had taken our part in the League of Nations, imperfect though that instrument was, of necessity, even at its best. If only we had achieved Streit's great plan for the federal union of the strong democracies. It is fundamentally because of the world's failure to establish some such organization that the cataclysm has come upon us, and in that failure the share of the United States is very large indeed. For such world organization I have labored and hope again to labor, and in that task many of your predecessors and many of you have been and will again, I hope, be with me. And if such organization may gleam beyond the darkness of this war, then perhaps even this war may find its compensation.

But for the moment we have no such organization, and we know only too well the shattering horror of war and the long misery that follows in its train. Shall we plunge into that horror and that misery? Shall we let this country take you and hundreds of thousands like you as fodder for cannon and bombs and gas, for abysmal depression, and perhaps for revolution? The time may come when overwhelming need of self-defense will force us to do even this. But unless that time should come, our entrance, as a separate nation, into this conflict of separate nations, would be a wild knight errantry and an inordinate sacrifice. Unless that tragic time should come, our greatest service to the stricken world lies rather in the safe maintenance and the constant perfecting of this haven and stronghold of democracy. And we need you for that maintenance and for that perfecting.

We should, then, stay out. But it remains true that England and France are fighting our war, are barriers between ourselves and rampant madness. Can we do nothing, shall we do nothing to help them, beyond the giving of our unsubstantial sympathy?

That general question, reduced to practical and immediate terms, means this: Our Neutrality Act now prohibits any export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent states; shall we so amend it as to make such export possible? It is to consider precisely such an amendment that Congress has been called into session tomorrow.

If we adopt such an amendment, we shall do so primarily because it would help England and France, while not helping Germany. Obviously such an amendment, though mentioning no nations, would be in fact unneutral. Would the passage of such an amendment be wise or unwise? Specifically, would it diminish or increase the chances of our being drawn into war?

That is a critical question. It is not an easy one; it leaves plenty of room for differences of honest opinion. I shall state my own opinion, not to impose it on you, but because I think you are entitled to know where in this matter I stand.

When the adoption of such an amendment was proposed last spring I favored it. The nations concerned were not then at war, and the action would not then have had the unneutral character which it would have now. And if the action had been taken then, it would have constituted such evidence of our prospective support for England and France that it would have tended to prevent the war.

Too late. The time for preventive action is past, and the adoption of the same amendment now would not serve to stop the war.

In my present judgment, it would tend to draw us into the war, for it would enrage Germany; it would lead to German sabotage in munitions plants in this country; it would establish in us a mood of quasi belligerence; and it would cause a great development of the munitions industry, which would then crave continued and ever larger markets for its satisfaction.

I am opposed to the amendment also for a still deeper reason. I said a moment ago that if we should adopt it, we should do so primarily because it would help France and England. I am very much afraid that we should be adopting it, secondarily, because it would help the munitions industry and the various industries which are most directly subsidiary thereto. And that motive seems to me not less than hideous. I said to you last winter that I believed that the private export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war should be unlawful at all times—always excepting export to nations declared to be our own allies. I moved from that position last spring, in view of the possibly preventive character of the action then proposed. But I have now returned to that position, and hold it with increased conviction. If at tragic last we must strike for our own defense, then we may well help to arm those who are aiding us in that defense. Until then let there be no export of machines of death.

I would revise the Neutrality Act, not by lifting the arms embargo but by prohibiting the export of secondary war materials in American vessels, or in foreign vessels except on the cash-and-carry plan. In my judgment, the one thing most likely to get us into the war would be the sinking of a series of American vessels carrying secondary war materials to England and France. Congress ought, therefore, to make it impossible for American vessels to carry war materials to any belligerent.

I am aware that the imposition of this further restriction would in some measure check the immediate expansion of American industry. But if American industry would only look clearly into the future, it would realize that every war gain would be more than swallowed up in a postwar depression. The cost of peace, the cost of refraining from war trade, may be high, but the cost of peace is infinitely less, even in dollars, than the cost of war. And the cost of peace is a cost in dollars only—the cost of war is a cost in dollars and in human flesh and blood and spirit.

The power to declare war or to keep this country out of war lies in Congress, which will meet tomorrow. The Members of Congress are not inaccessible gods or dictators. This is a democracy; the Members of Congress are just our representatives—yours and mine. In the last analysis, and on the whole, they will do what they think we want them to do. Then, if you want them to keep us out of war, tell them so.

To those of you who are upperclass men, the idea of writing to your Congressman is not new. If any of you need advice as to the writing, the Oberlin Peace Society will help you, in accordance with directions which you will find in the Review, which will be placed in your hands as you leave the chapel.

If any one of you fails to do his part toward keeping us out of war, then if war comes, he shares the blame. If any one of you does his part toward keeping us out of war, then if we do keep out of war, he shares the praise.

May that praise be yours to share.

Keeping America Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REUBEN T. WOOD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Congress has been convened in special session because of the situation in Europe to consider changes in our present neutrality laws, to safeguard the interests of the United States, and to determine what course should be adopted to insure against our being drawn into the European conflict.

The important question facing us is what we shall do concerning our position on neutrality and legislation which affects it. I have never believed, nor do I now believe, that our present neutrality law should have been passed. I am convinced that our failure to repeal the arms embargo section of our neutrality law was a strong contributing factor to Hitler's decision to invade Poland, the incident which launched the present European conflict. We should have never departed from the long-established principles of conducting the foreign policies of this Nation under international law. We should return at once to normal foreign policies under international law, which would be our most effective safeguard against war.

Our present neutrality law has not worked. An embargo on supplies to belligerent nations will not prevent us from being drawn into armed conflict. Rather, it will tend to increase our danger of becoming embroiled in war. We have been selling arms to Germany for years, even though we had a treaty with Germany in which Germany promised it would not import arms, and thereby we inadvertently contributed to German preparedness for its aggression on Poland. That has not drawn us into war. For many months we have been selling arms to China and war supplies to Japan. We are not in the far eastern war. Holland, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland all were neutral nations during the last World War, yet all of them sold war supplies to one side or the other, or to both sides. They did not become involved in that war. The arms embargo provisions of the present neutrality law forbid us, apparently, from selling arms to Germany, Poland, Britain, and France, because Britain and France have declared war, but not, apparently, from selling arms to China and Japan, which are waging an undeclared war. It allows us to sell arms to Italy and Russia, which in turn can sell to Germany, but does not allow us to sell to Canada. It lets us sell anything but arms to anybody, belligerent or not, and carry the goods to them in our own ships. We can sell Britain and France the metals and other materials to make arms, and we can deliver them in our own ships, but we cannot sell them arms made in this country from these same materials. We can sell tractors, but not tanks; cars, but not armored cars. There can be no moral or material difference between selling arms and selling the materials to make them.

We should continue our normal trade with the world and pass such legislation at this session of the Congress as will accomplish the following purposes:

First. Prohibit our citizens from going into war-danger zones.

Second. Forbid our ships to carry contraband of war.

Third. Prevent the convoying of our ships through danger zones.

Fourth. Require all purchases made in this country by belligerents to be upon a strict cash-and-carry basis.

Fifth. Take the profit out of munitions of war.

Sixth. Prevent all forms of war profiteering.

Seventh. Prohibit the making of any foreign loans.

Eighth. Adequately prepare this Nation against any attack which may be made upon it.

I am unalterably opposed to the sending of a single soldier or battleship to Europe. The people of the United States do not want war, and so long as we hate war and love peace we can keep out of the war in Europe.

The radio and the newspapers should be very careful not to engage in any jingo propaganda in the interests of the military junkers and war profiteers, as our greatest danger now and in the months to come is and will be war propaganda. We can and should have a sensible and accurate reporting of the European war news by the radio and the press.

The mothers, fathers, sons, and daughters of this Nation want peace, and every vote I cast upon legislation affecting this vital question will be a vote which I conscientiously believe to be a vote for peace and against war.

Results Under Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program During First Half of 1939

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

REPRINT FROM COMMERCE REPORTS OF AUGUST 19, 1939

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following reprint from Commerce Reports of August 19, 1939, issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, United States Department of Commerce:

RESULTS UNDER RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM DURING FIRST HALF OF 1939

(Prepared by the Trade Agreements Unit, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce)

Continuing the trend evident in previous years, United States exports to the countries with which reciprocal-trade agreements have been concluded made a more favorable showing during the first 6 months of 1939 than exports to nonagreement countries. Reflecting unsettled conditions throughout the world, total United States exports from January 1 to June 30 registered a decline from the high level at which they had been maintained in the same period of 1938, but the percentage of decrease was appreciably smaller in the case of the trade-agreement countries than in that of the countries with which no agreements were in effect. Taking the average for the 2 years 1938 and 1939 against the average for the preagreement years 1934 and 1935, in order to obtain a broader comparison, a substantial increase is shown in exports to both the agreement and nonagreement groups during the period January to June, but the increase is considerably greater for the agreement countries.

CONTRIBUTION OF TRADE AGREEMENTS TO FOREIGN COMMERCE

Obviously, the movement of international trade is determined by many factors, whose influence it is impossible to segregate or to appraise with any satisfactory degree of accuracy, and the reciprocal-trade agreements concluded by the United States have constituted only one element in the expansion of our exports sales. However, in view of the continuance over an extended period of a better export trade with the countries that have lowered or stabilized their tariffs or other trade barriers affecting American products, it seems reasonable to conclude that trade agreements have been contributing effectively to an expansion of our foreign commerce.

Also on the side of imports the statistics record a freer movement of trade with the agreement countries. Comparing the returns for the first half of 1939 with those for the corresponding period of 1938, it is found that imports from the countries with which trade agreements are in force expanded more rapidly than imports from other countries, and the same is true if the average for the first 6 months of 1938 and 1939 is compared with the average for the first 6 months of the preagreement years 1934 and 1935.

That imports in 1939 increased appreciably over those of the previous year, while exports declined, is explained by the abnormally small foreign purchases by the United States in 1938 following the business recession, imports of such raw materials as rubber, tin, wool, and hides and skins being particularly affected. With the return of better conditions in the first half of 1939 an expansion in the demand for imported products was an entirely natural development.

Since the trade agreement signed with the United Kingdom on November 17, 1938, became effective on January 1, 1939, that country is included in the trade-agreement group for the first time, but only so far as the comparison between 1938 and 1939 is concerned. To compare the average for these 2 years with the preagreement period would be meaningless from the standpoint of trade-agreement results, since the United Kingdom agreement was effective in only 1 year. The statistics of our trade with the United Kingdom have therefore been omitted entirely in making the longer comparison. That trade, particularly on the side of exports, is so important that its inclusion or noninclusion in either group largely determines the relation between the agreement and the nonagreement countries.

RELATIVE CHANGE IN EXPORTS

For the first 6 months of 1939 exports to the trade-agreement countries, including the United Kingdom and its Crown colonies and Ecuador, declined in value by $62,500,000, or 7 percent compared to the same period of 1938, whereas the value of exports to other countries with which no agreements have been concluded declined by $112,900,000, or 16 percent. An examination of the statistics of our trade with the individual countries immediately reveals that the decreases which took place in exports to the United Kingdom and Canada alone were more than sufficient to account for the entire decline for the agreement group.

That there was a falling off in the value of American goods sold to the United Kingdom in the first half of 1939 was primarily due to the poor showing made by certain agricultural products, notably wheat, cotton, and tobacco, for which that country is our leading foreign market. In the case of wheat, materially lower prices in 1939 were to a large extent responsible for the decreased value of our sales. The reasons for the abnormally small exports of American cotton are too well known to require special mention. Purchases of American leaf tobacco by the United Kingdom were exceptionally heavy in 1938, and our smaller exports in the first half of 1939 were still appreciably higher than in the same period of 1937.

Only a comparatively small part of the apparent falling off in exports to Canada during the first 6 months of 1939 is attributable to purchases by that country for its own use. Although the United States statistics show nearly $30,000,000 worth of corn exported to Canada in the first half of 1938, but less than $1,000,000 worth in the same period of 1939, careful investigation has developed the fact that a large part of the 1938 total represented corn which, although recorded as destined to Canada, was actually merely in transit through that country and eventually reached other destinations. Total corn exports from the United States since the beginning of the current year have been far below the 1938 level both in quantity and value.

Considering our export trade as a whole, the statistics for January to June 1939 show clearly that the decline in value from the high level of the previous year relates almost exclusively to crude materials and crude foodstuffs, and that falling prices were in large measure responsible. Exports of manufactured goods, that is to say of the types of products for which it has been possible to obtain the most effective concessions through the negotiation of trade agreements, represented approximately the same value as in 1938. For most crude materials, particularly crude foodstuffs, a highly competitive world market exists and other factors than trade agreements exercise a dominant influence on the direction of international trade. The four trade-agreement countries which account for practically all of the decline in our exports to that group in 1939, namely, the United Kingdom, Canada, Belgium, and the Netherlands, are all heavy purchasers of our raw products. For all of the other agreement countries, except Cuba and Honduras, increases are recorded.

RELATIVE CHANGE IN IMPORTS

For the first 6 months of 1939 imports from the trade-agreement countries, including the United Kingdom and its Crown colonies, and Ecuador, increased by $92,400,000, or 16.6 percent, compared to the same period of 1938, while imports from the countries with which no agreements have been concluded increased by $41,200,000, or 10.2 percent. In the case of imports, finished manufactures represent a much smaller part of our total trade than is true of our exports during the first half of 1939—20.6 percent against 56.8 percent—and for a number of leading raw and semifinished materials required by American industry, such as rubber, tin, nickel, and hides and skins. Trade-agreement countries, notably the United Kingdom, the British colonies, and Canada, are the principal sources of supply. As has already been noted, imports of industrial materials were below the normal level in 1938, but revived in the first half of 1939. Much of the expansion in our purchases from the United Kingdom, the British colonies, and Canada was due to this fact, these countries alone accounting for nearly two-thirds of the entire increase in imports from the trade-agreement group, with the balance widely distributed.

To sum up, the changes shown by the statistics of our foreign trade during the first half of 1939 may be considered as representing a return to a more normal relationship between exports and imports, following a year in which exports were maintained at a high level, while imports showed an exceptional decline. Separating the countries with which trade agreements were in effect from the nonagreement countries, exports to the agreement group show a relatively small decline, for which adequate explanation is found in decreased shipments of basic commodities to certain leading countries, due to general market conditions, while the increase that took place in imports from trade-agreement countries is accounted for primarily by an increased demand for raw materials and may therefore be considered a healthy development. Even with the changes indicated, trade with the agreement countries left an export balance of $175,300,000, exports to that group having had a total value of $824,400,000 for the 6 months January to June 1939, against imports valued at $649,100,000.

Only 1 of the agreements was in operation throughout 1935, 6 throughout 1936, 12 by the middle of 1936, 15 by the middle of 1937, 17 by the middle of 1938, and 18 by the middle of 1939, including the agreement with the United Kingdom (covering also Newfoundland and the non-self-governing British colonies). The last agreement concluded (with Turkey) became provisionally effective only on May 5, 1939, and Turkey is, therefore, not included in the above calculations as an agreement country.

[2] These figures do not include Ecuador, the United Kingdom (including Newfoundland and non-self-governing British colonies), and Turkey with which agreements have been concluded but where the period during which the agreement has been in effect is too short to justify inclusion for purposes of comparison.

[3] The apparent discrepancy shown by these figures in comparison with the other totals is due to the noninclusion of trade with Ecuador and the United Kingdom and its Crown Colonies.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED C. GARTNER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

RESOLUTION OF CITIZENS OF NORTHEAST PHILADELPHIA

Mr. GARTNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Northeast Philadelphia, as follows:

We, the people of Northeast Philadelphia, assembled for the consideration of the neutrality problem confronting the people of the United States, petition our Representatives to present the following resolution on the floor of the Congress of the United States, now in session.

It is the sincere judgment of the citizens assembled that if the present neutrality law is made less strict by the lifting of the embargo on arms to warring nations, regardless of how they are paid for or how they are transported, it will be detrimental to the welfare of the American people, because:

(1) It is conceded by all that one group of warring nations will benefit more than the other, giving rise to a hatred for the United States by the nations less favored. This hatred will, no doubt, reflect itself in reprisals as the pressure of war becomes greater. These reprisals will undoubtedly lead us into war.

(2) America is a nation the population of which is made up of immigrants and descendants of immigrants of various nations. If our Government takes sides in this world crisis, which the lifting of the embargo is tantamount to, it will destroy the affections of large portions of our people for our Government and our Nation; and instead of being a united people in this crucial period we will experience internal dissension, which will be detrimental to our national welfare for generations to come.

(3) By lifting the embargo on arms and shipping them out of the country it definitely prevents our Nation from attaining that state of preparedness so vital to our own interests and defense at this time. Let us give employment, but let us keep the products of industry for our own welfare.

(4) By keeping nations at war armed tends to prolong the desire for struggle, with consequent greater loss to humanity, and retards the desire for settlement of the disputes of the warring nations at the conference table.

We further petition our Representatives in the Congress of the United States to strongly urge our Government to turn their minds and energies from thoughts of a war to the finish, which merely piles up hatred and vengeance for future wars, to thoughts of peaceful adjustment of world problems, even to the extent of asking for a conference of all nations, and foster the spirit of the brotherhood of man among nations, to the end that humanity might bind up its wounds and look into the future with a real, sincere hope for justice, peace, and contentment.

Roosevelt vs. Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein an editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 29, 1939, entitled "Roosevelt vs. Roosevelt":

ROOSEVELT VS. ROOSEVELT

A few days ago we published an editorial entitled "PITTMAN vs. PITTMAN" in which was quoted Senator PITTMAN'S eloquent argument of 2 years ago in favor of the arms embargo he now wishes repealed. Mr. PITTMAN said that it was the arms trade which got us into the last war and would get us into the next one if we tolerated it. He warned especially against amending this law after a war has begun. To do that, he said, would infuriate the nation which would be injured by the change and bring about reprisals which would force us into the conflict.

Next in the series was an editorial entitled "Hull vs. PITTMAN."

It quoted Secretary Hull's remarks in opposition to proposals to amend the Neutrality Act. He said that to amend the act in the midst of war would be most unwise and dangerous.

And now we offer "Roosevelt vs. Roosevelt." The quotation which follows is from the President's "I hate war" address, delivered at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14, 1936. The arms embargo was then, as it is now, the law of the land and Mr. Roosevelt, far from desiring to have it repealed, spoke approvingly of it. He said:

"It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by the Congress would, in the event of a war on some other continent, reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens. Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. * * *

"Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

"They would tell you—and unfortunately their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this, and that, and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. * * *

[This forecast was incorrect at every point. There has been no clamor from business or industry for war profits. But in his message requesting the present special session of Congress to repeal the law in question, Mr. Roosevelt said, on September 21, 1939: "From a purely material point of view, what is the advantage to us in sending all manner of articles across the ocean for final processing there when we could give employment to thousands by doing it here?"]

"It would be hard to resist that clamor [continuing the quotation from Mr. Roosevelt's 1936 speech]; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that comes from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

"If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.' It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous."

That was in August 1936, just a little more than 3 years ago. Today it is not the munition makers who are clamoring for repeal of the embargo; one after another of the industrial associations has taken a stand against repeal. It is Mr. Roosevelt himself who wants to take the steps which 3 years ago he said would get us into war.

In this connection, perhaps one more quotation from the Chautauqua speech may be pertinent. Mr. Roosevelt said:

"The effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State."

This was not the only occasion on which Mr. Roosevelt spoke with enthusiasm of the law forbidding the export of lethal weapons to belligerents. In his message to Congress a few days ago he spoke of "the grave doubts expressed as to its wisdom by * * * officials charged with the conduct of our foreign relations, including myself." But when on February 29, 1936, he signed the joint resolution of Congress continuing the embargo, he said:

"By the resolution approved August 31, 1935, a definite step was taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations. It provided that in the event of the Executive proclaiming the existence of such a war, thereupon an embargo would attach to the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war destined to any belligerent country. * * * By the resolution I have just signed the operation of the August resolution is extended and strengthened until May 1, 1937."

He went on to record in a tone of great satisfaction that he had issued an embargo proclamation promptly after the outbreak of hostilities in Ethiopia and continued:

"It is true that the high moral duty I have urged on our people of restricting their exports of essential war materials to either belligerent to approximately the normal peacetime basis has not been the subject of legislation. Nevertheless, it is clear to me that greatly to exceed that basis, with the result of earning profits not possible during peace and especially with the result of giving actual assistance to the carrying on of war, would serve to magnify the very evil of war which we seek to prevent. This being my view, I renew the appeal made last October to the American people that they so conduct their trade with belligerent nations that it cannot be said they are seizing new opportunities for profit or that by changing their peacetime trade they give aid to the continuation of war."

These quotations from Mr. Roosevelt's papers are cited not so much to demonstrate his inconsistency and his amazing capacity for believing what at any moment he wants to believe, regardless of the facts, but to raise the question why he now takes precisely the opposite view from that which he held only 3 years ago. The answer is not at all obscure. Mr. Roosevelt as long ago as October 1937, when he made his speech dedicating the outer bridge in Chicago, had made up his mind that if England and France got into war against Germany, they would be fighting our war for us. To one who holds that belief there can be no such thing as neutrality in the sense of detachment from the struggle.

Mr. Roosevelt says today he doesn't want to become an active participant in the war, but if he has his way in the matter of the embargo, it will be infinitely more difficult than it now is to stay out of the war. By the repeal we shall have served notice that we accept the Roosevelt thesis that the allies are dying for us. That is not a comfortable position for a proud nation and it will be particularly uncomfortable if Mr. Roosevelt's expectation that we shall make a great deal of money out of the arms trade is realized.

With his capacity for self-deception, Mr. Roosevelt may actually have persuaded himself that he doesn't want this country to get into the war. But his mind and his principles are singularly fluid, as the record of his previous commendation of the embargo proves. Once the embargo is lifted, a serious obstacle to American entrance into the war will have been removed. If Mr. Roosevelt doesn't recognize that fact, the explanation lies in his amazing capacity for believing at any moment exactly what his emotions and ambitions command him to believe.

Neutrality Then and Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, for centuries European nations have engaged in warfare. We here in America love peace.

Almost every American desires to remain neutral in this war. We were drawn into the last World War through our emotions, our sympathies, because some of our leaders sold us the idea that we should "make the world safe for democracy." That war brought us untold suffering, an exorbitant bill which we are still paying; caused us to lend billions to France, Great Britain, and their allies, none of which has repaid except Finland, and the world is no more "safe for democracy" than before.

Because some bankers and munitions makers, among whom were the Du Ponts, President Roosevelt's in-laws, made millions upon millions of dollars selling munitions to Uncle Sam and to the Allies, Congress proposed in 1935 to put an end to war profiteering and to pass neutrality legislation which would keep us out of future wars. That proposal was given long, earnest, and prayerful consideration by Congress. It was finally adopted by an overwhelming vote.

When the civil war in Spain was raging and European nations were in danger of becoming involved Congress passed a special act which prohibited the selling of arms to either faction, and Secretary of State Hull, to aid us in keeping out of war, proposed that we continue the embargo and opposed its repeal.

If the repeal of the arms embargo in 1937 and 1938 would tend to involve us in the Spanish war, what reason is there to believe that the repeal of the present legislation would now keep us out of war?

Senator PITTMAN is now the most vociferous of all Senators in asking that the arms embargo be repealed, but unfortunately for the Senator's record of consistency, he played a leading part in obtaining the passage of the present Neutrality and Arms Embargo Acts. In May of 1937, pointing out that international law was no safeguard for this country, he said:

> We relied upon international law for every assertion of our neutral rights, but this reliance brought us no benefits or protection and was our undoing.

Then, according to the Senator, because we had failed to force Great Britain to respect our undeniable rights on the high seas and because under the international law we had furnished arms, munitions, and other contraband of war to the Allies, we became involved in the World War. The embargo of exportation of arms to belligerents was adopted, according to Senator PITTMAN, as an effort to keep us out of any foreign war.

To prove that the present Embargo Act was designed to and will aid in keeping us out of war, we do not need to rely upon the statements of Senator PITTMAN, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Secretary of State Hull to that effect, for we have the words of the "big chief" himself. President Roosevelt had something to say about this law before the third-term bug bit him, and here is what he said on August 14, 1936:

> It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by the Congress would, in the event of a war on some other continent, reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens. Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster.
> Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.
> They would tell you—and unfortunately their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work.

It is not the businessmen who are asking for repeal, for their organizations have gone on record as opposed to repeal. It is the President who now asks for the repeal of the law which in 1936 he said closed the doors on war profiteering and was of aid in keeping us out of a foreign war.

Wholeheartedly and enthusiastically I agree with the statement made by the President at that time when he said:

> If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—"We choose peace." It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous.

When on February 29, 1936, the President signed the joint resolution of Congress continuing the embargo he said:

> By the resolution approved August 31, 1935, a definite step was taken toward enabling this country to maintain its neutrality and avoid being drawn into wars involving other nations.

When Senator PITTMAN, Secretary of State Hull, and President Roosevelt made the foregoing statements the world was at peace except for the civil war in Spain. An overwhelming majority of Senators and Congressmen and of our people then believed that we had taken a long step forward toward world peace. The only difference between those days and the present is that now there is a world war, and the President's friends, his personal associates, and those who are dependent upon the continuance of his administration are booming him, without rebuke from him, for a third term as President, and in addition he is asking for the powers of a dictator.

Let us abide now by the statements then made by the President, the Secretary of State, and the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

These are the undisputed facts:

First. A few international bankers and munitions makers, at a cost to this country of billions of dollars, of hundreds of thousands of lives, made a wartime profit out of the sale of munitions. The President now asks that we permit the sale of munitions on a 90-day credit to nations which still owe us more than $5,000,000,000 on our loans to them during the last war. If he sells on a 90-day credit, you and I know that, if at the end of the 90 days the bill is not paid, he will be asking that credit be further extended. If the former Allies cannot get the money to make a payment on the last war debt, where will they find the cash to pay for munitions now?

Second. Congress, at the demand of the people, voted to put an end to war profiteering, to destroy one of the motives which might again involve us in a foreign war.

Third. To keep us out of war, by a vote of more than 4 to 1, and with the approval of Senator PITTMAN, of Secretary of State Hull, of President Roosevelt, after debate, and, it is to be hoped, patriotic and prayerful consideration, Congress passed the Neutrality Act.

Fourth. Now the President wants to repeal the Neutrality Act which he, his Secretary of State, and Congress, the people's representatives, put on the books to keep us out of foreign wars.

Fifth. According to Secretary of State Hull, relying upon international law, we became involved in the World War.

Why return to the procedure which involved us before? Why, for the sake of war profits, repeal this legislation, which we all considered our safeguard?

Let us continue in force the embargo which the President, the Secretary of State, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Congress devised and enacted to keep us out of war.

Diplomatic Correspondence Incident to European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTERS BY THE PRESIDENT AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD copies of diplomatic correspondence with certain foreign governments, containing pleas for peace by the President of the United States and suggestions that belligerent nations refrain from the bombardment from the air of civilian populations or of unfortified cities; also a statement by the Secretary of State regarding neutrality.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
August 24, 1939.

The following is the text of a communication dispatched this evening by the President to the President of the Polish Republic:

"His Excellency IGNACE MOSZICKI,

"President of the Polish Republic, Warsaw, Poland:

"The manifest gravity of the existing crisis imposes an urgent obligation upon all to examine every possible means which might prevent the outbreak of general war.

"With this in mind, I feel justified in suggesting that certain possible avenues of solution be considered.

"The controversy between the Government of Poland and the Government of the German Reich might be made the subject of direct discussion between the two governments.

"Should this prove impossible or not feasible, a second avenue might be that of submission of the issues to arbitration.

"A third method might be conciliation through a disinterested third party, in which case it would seem appropriate that the parties avail themselves of the services of one of the traditionally neutral states, or a disinterested republic of the Western Hemisphere wholly removed from the area and issues of the present crisis. Should you determine to attempt solution by any of these methods, you are assured of the earnest and complete sympathy of the United States and of its people. During the exploration of these avenues, I appeal to you, as I have likewise appealed to the Government of the German Reich, to agree to refrain from any positive act of hostility.

"Both Poland and Germany being sovereign governments, it is understood, of course, that upon resort to any one of the alternatives I suggest, each nation will agree to accord complete respect to the independence and territorial integrity of the other.

"It is, I think, well known to you that speaking on behalf of the United States I have exerted and will continue to exert every influence in behalf of peace. The rank and file of the population of every nation, large and small, want peace. They do not seek military conquest. They recognize that disputes, claims, and counter claims will always arise from time to time between nations, but that all such controversies without exception can be solved by peaceful procedure if the will on both sides exists so to do.

"I have addressed a communication in similar sense to the Chancelor of the German Reich.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

AUGUST 24, 1939.

The following is the text of a communication dispatched yesterday by the President and delivered today to the King of Italy by Ambassador Phillips:

"Again a crisis in world affairs makes clear the responsibility of heads of nations for the fate of their own people and indeed of humanity itself. It is because of traditional accord between Italy and the United States and the ties of consanguinity between millions of our citizens that I feel that I can address Your Majesty in behalf of the maintenance of world peace.

"It is my belief and that of the American people that Your Majesty and Your Majesty's Government can greatly influence the averting of an outbreak of war. Any general war would cause to suffer all nations whether belligerent or neutral, whether victors or vanquished, and would clearly bring devastation to the peoples and perhaps to the governments of some nations most directly concerned.

"The friends of the Italian people and among them the American people could only regard with grief the destruction of great achievements which European nations, and the Italian nation in particular, have attained during the past generation.

"We in America having welded a homogeneous nation out of many nationalities, often find it difficult to visualize the animosities which so often have created crises among nations of Europe which are smaller than ours in population and in territory, but we accept the fact that these nations have an absolute right to maintain their national independence if they so desire. If that be sound doctrine, then it must apply to the weaker nations as well as to the stronger.

"Acceptance of this means peace, because fear of aggression ends. The alternative, which means of necessity efforts by the strong to dominate the weak, will lead not only to war but to long future years of oppression on the part of victors and to rebellion on the part of the vanquished. So history teaches us.

"On April 14 last I suggested in essence an understanding that no armed forces should attack or invade the territory of any other independent nation, and that this being assured, discussions be undertaken to seek progressive relief from the burden of armaments and to open avenues of international trade including sources of raw materials necessary to the peaceful economic life of each nation.

"I said that in these discussions the United States would gladly take part. And such peaceful conversations would make it wholly possible for governments other than the United States to enter into peaceful discussions of political or territorial problems in which they were directly concerned.

"Were it possible for Your Majesty's Government to formulate proposals for a pacific solution of the present crisis along these lines you are assured of the earnest sympathy of the United States.

"The Government of Italy and the United States can today advance those ideals of Christianity which of late seem so often to have been obscured.

"The unheard voices of countless millions of human beings ask that they shall not be vainly sacrificed again."

Arrangements for Ambassador Phillips to deliver the message to the King in person at Turin, Italy, were made by Premier Mussolini and the Italian Foreign Minister Ciano. Ambassador Phillips was authorized to give Premier Mussolini a copy of the communication.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
August 25, 1939.

The following is the text of a communication dispatched this evening by the President to the Chancellor of the German Reich:

AUGUST 25, 1939.

His Excellency ADOLF HITLER,
Chancellor of the German Reich,
Berlin, Germany:

I have this hour received from the President of Poland a reply to the message which I addressed to Your Excellency and to him last night. The text of President Moszicki's reply is as follows:

"I highly appreciate the most important and noble message which Your Excellency was good enough to address to me.

"I would like to emphasize that the Polish Government always considered direct negotiations between governments as the most appropriate method of solving difficulties which may arise between states. We consider this method all the more fitting when adopted between neighboring countries. It was with this principle in view that Poland concluded pacts of nonaggression with Germany and the Union of Soviet Republics.

"We consider likewise the method of conciliation through a third party as disinterested and impartial as Your Excellency to be a just and equitable method in the solution of controversies arising between nations.

"While naturally wishing to avoid even the semblance of availing myself of this occasion to raise the points at issue, I nevertheless consider it my duty to point out that in this crisis it is not Poland who is proffering any claims or demanding concessions from any other nation.

"It is therefore only natural that Poland agrees to refrain from any positive act of hostility, provided the other party also agrees to refrain from any such act, direct or indirect.

"In conclusion may I express my ardent wish that Your Excellency's apepal for peace may contribute toward general appeasement, which the people of the world so sorely need to return once more to the blessed path of progress and civilization."

Your Excellency has repeatedly and publicly stated that the ends and the objectives sought by the German Reich were just and reasonable. In his reply to my message the President of Poland has made it plain that the Polish Government is willing, upon the basis set forth in my messages, to agree to solve the controversy which has arisen between the Republic of Poland and the German Reich by direct negotiation or through the process of conciliation.

Countless human lives can be yet saved and hope may still be restored that the nations of the modern world may even now construct a foundation for a peaceful and a happier relationship if you and the Government of the German Reich will agree to the pacific means of settlement accepted by the Government of Poland.

All the world prays that Germany, too, will accept.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
September 1, 1939.

The President at 4:30 o'clock this morning addressed the following message to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, and Poland:

"The ruthless bombing from the air of civilians in unfortified centers of population during the course of the hostilities which have raged in various quarters of the earth during the past few years, which has resulted in the maiming and in the death of thousands of defenseless men, women, and children, has sickened the hearts of every civilized man and woman, and has profoundly shocked the conscience of humanity.

"If resort is had to this form of inhuman barbarism during the period of the tragic conflagration with which the world is now confronted, hundreds of thousands of innocent human beings who have no responsibility for, and who are not even remotely participating in, the hostilities which have now broken out, will lose their lives. I am therefore addressing this urgent appeal to every government which may be engaged in hostilities publicly to affirm its determination that its armed forces shall in no event, and under no circumstances, undertake the bombardment from the air of civilian populations or of unfortified cities, upon the understanding that these same rules of warfare will be scrupulously observed by all of their opponents. I request an immediate reply.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
September 14, 1939.

STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE

The Secretary of State made the following statement at the press conference on September 14 regarding neutrality.

The Government of the United States has not abandoned any of its rights as a neutral under international law. It has, however, for the time being prescribed, by domestic legislation, certain restrictions for its nationals which have the effect of requiring them to refrain from the exercise of privileges which but for such legislation they would have the right to exercise under international law, such as the right to travel on belligerent vessels, to make loans and extend credits to belligerent governments, et cetera. These restrictive measures do not and cannot constitute a modification of the principles of international law but rather they require nationals of the United States to forego, until the Congress shall decide otherwise, the exercise of certain rights under those principles. Furthermore, this Government gives the widest possible notice to American shipping regarding danger areas as the information is acquired by it. This Government also warns American nationals and American shipping against actual danger in any other respect as situations involving such danger are brought to its attention, whether those situations result from lawful or unlawful activities of the belligerents. It endeavors to exercise all due diligence in the protection of American lives and property and of course must expect American nationals likewise to exercise due diligence in keeping clear of danger—actual or potential.

In the letters which I addressed to Senator PITTMAN and Representative BLOOM on May 27, 1939, I stated the situation as follows:

"The rights of our nationals under international law may properly be restricted by our own legislation along certain lines for the purpose of avoiding incidents which might involve us in a conflict. In indicating certain restrictions upon the exercise of our rights as a neutral I do not wish to be considered as advocating the abandonment of these, or indeed of any, neutral rights; but there is reasonable ground for restricting at this time the exercise of these rights."

The principles of international law as regards neutrals and belligerents have been evolved through the centuries. While belligerents have frequently departed from these principles on one pretext or another, and have endeavored to justify their action on various grounds, the principles still subsist.

This Government, adhering as it does to these principles, reserves all rights of the United States and its nationals under international law and will adopt such measures as may seem most practical and prudent when those rights are violated by any of the belligerents.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., OF WISCONSIN

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I offer for printing in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] last evening in the National Radio Forum, sponsored by the Washington Evening Star, over the National Broadcasting Co. network. The subject of the address is the Pending Neutrality Legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

You know that Congress is now debating a change in our foreign policy. It is making a decision on keeping or repealing the prohibition against the shipment of deadly weapons. This is not an ordinary debate. It is one of those times in life when you make a decision from which you may never again be able to retreat. Even if the decision is wrong, we go on suffering the consequences of one grave mistake.

There are times like that. It was like that when the German people voted for Hitler in 1933. Once they had taken that decision, they were never given a second chance to go back and change their minds. A man tired of life leans out over the roof of a 10-story building. There is a moment, a brief moment, when he can pull himself back. He decides not to. After that it does him no good to change his mind, to decide he wants to live.

You and I are at the edge of that roof now. For the first time we really feel the pushing of people who want us to close our eyes and jump.

The real issue is not being discussed much. The real issue at stake is our own national interest. Is it to start going into the war? Is it to keep out? I am for keeping the country out. I have been for the arms embargo since it was proposed, and I am still for it. The people who applauded it in 1935 and 1937 and are against it now are the ones who have changed their policy. Some of them have changed it from staying out to risking a little plunge into war, partly for the "fool's gold" it will bring, partly because they are willing to take sides. But you cannot take sides and then pull back. That was the lesson of the last war for us.

Let us not delude ourselves. Once we have taken sides through action by our Government in order to make arms available to England and France, the pressure will be terrific to get us into the war.

Before we take such a step, which may ultimately put us in such a situation, let us examine our national interest and determine what course we should follow in order to safeguard it. Our great national interest is to preserve our own democracy and to make it work. I am as much opposed to dictatorship of every kind or description, foreign or domestic, as any living man, and my record will show that I have done my share to preserve civil liberties and maintain democracy. Therefore, I ask the question: Have we any evidence upon which to base the assumption that democracy will be preserved in Europe if England and France win with or without our aid? Our country joined them once before to make the world safe for democracy. You remember the tragic result! Are they prospective allies to whom we can entrust the safekeeping of our national interest and the future of America?

Let us review the record of these partners who will soon be asking us to join them in another waltz of death and destruction. Briefly, then, Great Britain and France used propaganda—much of it false—between 1914 and 1917 to get us into the war on their side; then they pretended to accept our high-sounding war aims, such as the 14 points, making the world safe for democracy, etc. At Versailles they pulled out the secret treaties and in wanton disregard of the 14 points and the armistice they proceeded to grab the spoils. In the years after the war they helped to strangle every effort toward democracy in Germany. They thus became the illegitimate parents of nazi-ism and all the terrible things it has brought with it.

Great Britain backed up Japan when she grabbed the first hunk of China in Manchuria and left us holding the bag when we tried to stop it. Great Britain and France, despite all our efforts to cooperate in checking Mussolini's gobbling up of Ethiopia, finally got together and agreed to let him have it. Then came Munich. Then democratic Czecho-Slovakia, pledged protection by France specifically, was betrayed by them into Hitler's clutches. And now Poland! Is this record from 1914 to 1939 one to inspire confidence and trust? The answer is, No!

Today we know as little of the actual war aims of Great Britain and France as we did before the secret treaties were published in the last war. Once more we hear the glittering, high-sounding generalities about "saving civilization," but we don't know what lies underneath the surface. We don't know what chunks of other nations' territories they may be offering neutral nations to join their side. If they win, will they write a more terrible treaty than they wrote in 1918? Will Europe be torn to shreds, the swag divided again, and this time, if we go into the war, will we have to maintain an army abroad to stand guard over the wreckage? This would mean universal military training and conscription at home and billions of taxes upon the people of this country for countless generations. It is clear that we cannot preserve democracy abroad simply by taking sides in this war.

It is equally clear that we will destroy it at home if we become involved in the war. Remember that we are the only powerful nation left where democracy is still alive and working. War is democracy's greatest enemy. It cannot live under war conditions. If we enter the war, our own democracy would be the first casualty. Then we would inevitably have a dictatorship such as we have never seen before. In the very nature of war psychology labor would be virtually conscripted, collective bargaining abrogated, the farmers would have their prices fixed, business would be regimented if not taken over by the Government, the press and radio would be censored, and men from 21 to 45 drafted to fight overseas.

I fear that after the war is over we would have a difficult if not an impossible task in trying even to restore democracy here at home. The world would then be in a state of chaos and collapse, revolution would inevitably be rampant. In such a situation plausible arguments would be made to continue the dictatorship. Those political parties and persons responsible for our getting into the war would then hesitate to restore full rights to the people, lest in wrath, disillusionment, and suffering the people would punish those they blamed for their dead and their misery.

You know that the slogan makers are busy again. This is to be a war to "save civilization" instead of democracy. The trouble with that cry is that modern war cannot achieve its objective. It cannot do so because it destroys such vast quantities of manpower and wealth. Economic collapse follows in the wake of modern war just as certainly as night follows day. This is one of the tragic lessons we should have learned from the last war. More than $300,000,000,000 of wealth was destroyed in that war. Great Britain, France, and their Allies tried to squeeze the last drop from the fruits of victory. They took millions of square miles of territory, billions of marks in reparations payments or in payments in kind, and yet despite all they exacted at Versailles, economic collapse seized the victor nations and shook them to their very foundations.

One thing we can be sure of in this war is that the advance of science and invention since 1918 will make the destruction much greater than in the last one. I am convinced that a few months after this war is over, no one will be able to tell the victors from the vanquished. Suffering, chaos, and collapse will be abroad in every nation which has taken part in the war. For those reasons I think it is just so much eye-wash to say that unless we get into this war and bring about a victory for Great Britain and France that the Nazis will begin to attack nations in this hemisphere. I do not believe any nation or group of nations can arise from the ashes of war's destruction to challenge the most powerful nation on the face of the globe.

But for the sake of the argument, and in order to try and think the whole thing through, let us suppose that the Nazis win, and that by some miracle they make the fruits of victory compensate for the destruction of manpower and wealth they themselves have suffered, and let us further assume that they then decide to begin military and naval operations across 3,600 miles of ocean in this hemisphere. I say that in such an eventuality then is the time for this Nation to gird its loins for war. A war fought with this hemisphere as a base, where all the advantage of thousands of miles of ocean would be on our side, where we would be operating from a comparatively sound economic and financial base and, equally important, where we would not be dependent upon allies whose past record does not inspire confidence and trust.

Make no mistake about it; we can have an invulnerable hemisphere. No nation or group of nations can successfully attack it if we but provide the necessary Army, Navy, and the bases needed for their efficient operation. This policy requires that we do not permit strategic islands to fall into hostile hands. It means that we interpret the Monroe Doctrine to include the prohibition of penetration by foreign nations through propaganda or otherwise in this hemisphere. The great body of expert opinion on national defense agrees that we can make this hemisphere safe against all comers. The destiny of our Nation should be worked out in this hemisphere and not in Europe or Asia. In the end, our ideals and way of life will be infinitely more secure and it will cost far less than participation in a foreign war.

Our great opportunity for service in the cause of civilization is to stay out of this war and thus preserve in this hemisphere a haven of sanity in a world where madness now prevails. We can then concentrate on our own problems and prove that democracy can work in a modern economic environment. Then when the war is over we will indeed be in a position to give the world succor and leadership. We will have kept the lamp of democracy and tolerance alight. We will have demonstrated the soundness of our way of life and war weary and disillusioned people will see in our example the way to rehabilitate civilization in their own lands.

But if we become involved in war, we will be in no position to help anyone, not even ourselves. For we will suffer the same economic collapse which will be abroad in every nation that engages in this war. We will have snuffed out democracy. Intolerance and hate will be rampant in the country, and a staggering debt will be piled on top of the forty billions now owed by our Government.

But if we want to stay out of war in Europe, and I know most of us do, we must not take steps that will take us into the war. It is one thing for you and me to take sides in our capacity as private citizens; it is a far different thing when our Government takes sides.

In other words, we cannot have our cake and eat it, too. We either make up our minds to stay out of this war in Europe or by a series of steps we will ultimately find ourselves in it.

It is perfectly clear that if we repeal the arms embargo after the war has started, it will be regarded abroad as an efficient act of our Government to take sides in this war. In Great Britain and France, they will hail it as they would a great military victory.

They will say in so many words that we are coming in. In Germany it will be equally clear that we have taken sides against them. Senator VAN NUYS, of Indiana, was frank about it Sunday night over the radio when he said, in effect, that what the advocates of repeal were trying to do was to find a way to wipe Hitler off the face of the earth without our country getting involved in war. But this cannot be done with any certainty. If arms, ammunitions, and implements of war on a limited-credit and carry basis are not enough, then long-term credit will next be provided. The Johnson Act, passed to prevent nations owing us ten billions since the last war from floating any more loans until they pay up, will be repealed and, if this is not enough, the same arguments which are now being made for repeal of the arms embargo will be made for our sending troops abroad.

There has been a lot of confusion created in the public mind over this issue. Speakers over the radio have been leading the people to believe that the Congress and the country must choose between repeal of the arms embargo and cash and carry. This is not the case. Cash and carry is not an alternative to repeal of the arms embargo. If we are determined to keep out of the war, we can have cash and carry for all other commodities and also maintain the arms embargo. But without the arms embargo cash and carry is a very feeble safeguard against our involvement in war. We can, and should, prohibit American citizens from traveling on ships of warring nations. In short, every safeguard against incidents which might be the cause of our being drawn into war in the bill pending before the Congress can and should be passed. And at the same time we can keep the embargo against the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, which is now in full force and effect.

The repeal of the arms embargo will not only be an unneutral act but it will also result in a tremendous expansion of our munitions industry. The present plant capacity of this industry is backlogged with orders from our own national-defense program. If Great Britain and France can buy arms, ammunition, and implements of war here, as the administration advocates, it must be either at the cost of setting aside our own rearmament program or hundreds of millions of dollars must be immediately invested in new plant capacity. This will result in a bulging out of our economy to meet the wartime demand. This will, in turn, provide great inducements for the repeal of the Johnson Act once the purchasers are out of cash. Then loans will be floated, and we will find ourselves right where we were in 1916 and 1917. Let me quote from Ray Stannard Baker, President Wilson's official biographer, who certainly is not biased against him:

"* * * by the end of the year 1914 the traffic in war materials with the Allies had become deeply entrenched in America's economic organization"— and the possibility of keeping out of the war by the diplomacy of neutrality, no matter how skillfully conducted, had reached the vanishing point. By October, perhaps earlier, our case was lost."

Now, mark these words—

We not only need to keep the arms embargo to prevent our economy from becoming top-heavy but we should amend the cash-and-carry proposals now pending in the Senate to limit the war trade in other commodities, and thus prevent it from sidetracking our own rearmament program. We must not let our natural and exhaustible resources be drained away. Only in this way can we make certain that our Nation will not become economically and financially dependent upon the success of one group of warring nations.

Our patriotic course is clear. We should keep the embargo on arms and enact all the other features of the pending bill designed to reduce incidents likely to lead to war. We should limit the trade in other commodities to a strict cash-and-carry basis, not credit and carry. We must restrict this trade so as to protect our resource base and not permit an uncontrolled wartime commerce to develop which will help to drag us into war in Europe or in the Far East. We should concentrate on making democracy work at home, and thus maintain our civil liberties and preserve our way of life. We have a great opportunity to build up an intercontinental economy in this hemisphere. We can provide an army and navy to defend it for a fraction of the cost of our involvement in war abroad. We do not have to accept as the solution of our problems the employment resulting from trade produced by slaughter and destruction.

We can utilize our idle manpower, productive capacity, and idle capital to restore our natural-resource base, to rehabilitate and conserve our human resources, to develop our Nation and this great and rich hemisphere. Here is a program that will give us a dynamic America, restore that equality of economy opportunity that characterized the development of our own physical frontier. Here is a program which gives this generation a rendezvous with destiny in this hemisphere instead of death in some other.

I put this program up against the program of taking sides, against the program of selling arms, against the program of intervention in a long, weary war which will probably end abroad in revolution and end here in dictatorship.

The decision of Congress depends on which program the people choose.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVA B. ADAMS

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered over the radio last evening by my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] on the subject of the pending legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I AM A PACIFIST

I am a nationalist, an isolationist, an insulationist, and a pacifist; that is, I am a pacifist until the Monroe Doctrine shall have been violated or our territory actually invaded. You have heard that Senators with that kind of a complex are opposed to lifting the present embargo on arms. In my case that is not true. I want either a complete and absolute embargo or a realistic substitute adopted, like the cash-and-carry plan, which will approach in its effect an absolute embargo, so that all danger of getting into this war will be removed. No half-way measure will afford any protection whatever.

THE DISTORTIONIST

One professional distortionist has said that our present arms embargo has "brought on the current European war," and another has said its repeal is "the road to war." Both statements are perfectly ridiculous and contain not one scintilla of truth.

For many months I have been diligently studying the foreign policies of the United States. Two years ago I helped to enact the existing neutrality law, and I have read and reread the proposed Pittman bill from cover to cover.

In the intensely absorbing debate now occupying Congress the issue is surprisingly simple, even though in its implications and reactions it may be far reaching and involved. This is the meat of the proposition: Shall we sell to belligerents all vital materials, including munitions, for cash to be carried on their own bottoms, as recommended by the President, or place an embargo on finished munitions to the belligerents and handle other vital materials, which have been declared contraband by all warring states, just as though there were no war?

THREE COURSES

To me, at least three distinct courses appear open for America to pursue during this crisis.

We may return to international law and espouse the doctrine of the freedom of the seas and be in a war within 30 days; or

Secondly, place an absolute embargo on arms, munitions, implements of war, and all declared contraband such as wheat, oil, cotton, etc., to belligerents and so-called neutrals alike, and by the imposition of an embargo completely isolate ourselves and thereby remain at peace. That is drastic action, but if we are going to take the embargo cure we better do a complete job of it. No half-way measures such as the present embargo law will suffice. Placing an embargo on three or four finished articles to two or three nations will afford us little or no protection. If embargo be the answer, follow it to its logical conclusion, which is absolute. President Jefferson tried the embargo plan in 1807 and it ended in tragic failure. In the World War munitions only amounted to 13 percent of our war exports, while raw materials and other goods totaled 87 percent. England and Germany do not distinguish between guns and raw materials, and therefore our munition embargo advocates are in error when they do so.

The third course which we may adopt is the so-called cash-and-carry or come-and-get-it policy—the Pittman bill. It will work.

SELF PRESERVATION

Nations at war have murderous designs upon each other and restraint on the part of any of them is only relative at best. War is positive evidence that selfishness is on a murderous rampage. Belligerents, by the very nature of war, are wholly selfish, and neutrals must be selfish at least to the point of self-preservation.

I have a right to walk down the street through a murderous riot, but common sense tells me to substitute discretion for valor and keep out of trouble. There is nothing particularly noble in keeping out of trouble by surrendering one's rights unless self-preservation be noble and fighting be ignoble.

While domestic considerations must control the passage of our neutrality policies, yet impartiality and fairness should govern their application to international affairs so that there shall be at least no discrimination. Neither the present Neutrality Act, the proposed revision, nor any other so-called neutrality act which we might enact can possibly be uniform in its effect upon every foreign state. We cannot help that. Any far-reaching act by us will throw the commercial world out of adjustment to some extent. The very best that we can do is to apply our laws uniformly to all without a hint of favoritism or variation, and if we do that no one should complain.

CONTRABAND LISTS ISSUED

England and Germany have each issued their contraband list for the European war. Today England would seize and confiscate and Germany would sink any United States ship loaded with oil, wheat, cotton, or munitions destined to their respective enemies. Neither England nor Germany draws a distinction between oil and munitions. Either may be used in the war machine, and yet our existing law places an embargo on munitions and places no restraints whatsoever upon the shipment of oil, wheat, and cotton. American merchants have the right now to sell such designated contraband to belligerents, and American ships have the right to haul it under what might correctly be termed the "credit and delivery" system now in vogue. I most sincerely hope that we are able to change the existing law before some American vessel is sunk, thereby developing an incident which will incite our citizens to war.

Congress does not represent Russia or Germany or France or England. Congress represents 130,000,000 American men, women, and children and has the duty of legislating in behalf of their security, welfare, and happiness. Her acts need not be ratified in Europe so long as Congress seeks to only place limitations upon the conduct of her own citizens.

Since England and Germany make no distinction between wheat and machine guns insofar as their respective blockades are concerned, why should Congress place an embargo on the one and permit the other on the high seas in American bottoms, where it will likely force our Nation into a grave situation?

IT'S OUR MOVE

It is neither illegal, under our laws, contrary to international law, nor is it unethical to change the laws of the United States which have not been ratified by other nations in treaties. After this war broke out, England and Germany each seeking to blockade the other, named a list of articles which they decreed should be contraband. Who is there to argue that after such a pronouncement by a belligerent, a neutral may not adjust itself to that warring nation's arbitrary declaration in designating contrabands? To contend otherwise is to hold that only belligerents have rights. If England and Germany notify us that they will seize or sink American vessels carrying shipments of wheat or cotton or oil, why should not our Congress prohibit such shipments by law before they are seized or sunk?

STOP-WATCH DEAD LINES

When Canada declared war on Germany a few days ago we immediately proclaimed that fact, and the sale of arms and munitions to that country was automatically prohibited. An hour was set as the deadline for this event. Millions of dollars worth of bombers were rushed from the United States to Canada to beat that deadline. The delivered bombers were to be used for destructive purposes, and we knew that when they were delivered. Looking at it strictly from a moral standpoint, did the hands of the clock make a righteous act wicked? If an embargo on arms is justified on moral grounds today, it was justified last month. Immoral acts are not subject to hairsplitting legalisms and stop-watch deadlines.

I do not believe that any studious American can read carefully the existing Neutrality Act and not fully realize that its revision is pressing and necessary. Today under it we can sell and deliver to our hearts' content arms and munitions to Russia, Italy, China, and Japan. Arms and munitions are made to kill people and destroy property, and they have no other use. If we are placing our embargo on such articles for moral reasons, why sell them to anyone at any time? Why not place an embargo on these death-dealing instruments under all and every circumstance? Our policy under existing law is like prohibiting the sale of opium to known addicts only and permitting its sale to everyone else.

THE PITTMAN BILL

This is the provision to be found in the Pittman bill which has won for it my enthusiastic approval: When a state of war exists, "it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any article or material to any state" at war. Existing law does not deny the right of any American vessel to load up with a cargo of declared contraband, other than finished arms and munitions, and to head straight to Liverpool or Hamburg. That law must be changed, and at once.

The Pittman bill prevents our vessels from carrying on any trade or commerce with a belligerent. It denies any citizen of the United States the right to travel on any vessel of a belligerent. It prohibits American vessels engaged in foreign commerce to be armed. It stops the solicitation and the collection of funds by or on behalf of warring powers. It restricts the use of our ports by submarines, warships, and armed merchantmen of belligerents. It greatly strengthens the control over arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It provides for granting safe passage in American vessels of the American Red Cross and medical personnel, medical supplies, food, and clothing for the relief of human suffering. In short, it is a complete program for the safe conduct of American citizens when war rages, and it attempts in a sensible, realistic way to avoid every violent incident before it occurs. Why such an extreme departure from international law in the interest of safety does not have the instant approval of every isolationist, insulationist, and pacifist in the land is beyond my comprehension. The pending resolution is the closest thing to a complete and effective embargo which it is possible for the Congress to enact. No state is going to declare war on us for carrying out honestly and earnestly such a pacifist policy.

WORLD WAR LESSONS

America should have learned many lessons in our last experience with a World War, the most important one being how to keep out. We got in trying to uphold the doctrine of the freedom of the seas. Under the Pittman bill, we will properly abandon that doctrine made obsolete by the joint blockading tactics of England and Germany, and we will prohibit American vessels from engaging in every character of trade with belligerents. By such self-imposed, drastic restraints upon our own citizens, and by that means only, may we hope to avoid conflict with the English man-of-war and the German submarine. Such complete surrender of rights by the world's foremost naval power is a signal victory for modern-day ruthless submarine despotism and English blockade tactics. What further compliance can either of these belligerent powers ask?

I desire to make it plain tonight, with God as my witness, that I would rather face an enemy firing squad than vote for a "measure short of war" or one which would be a single "step toward war." With that fixed conviction in my heart, I have examined every line of the existing law and every word in the pending Pittman bill and have applied to every provision in both this test, and this test only, "Is it a step toward war? Is it a measure short of war?" Applying that test without prejudice I have discovered that the present Neutrality Act is woefully weak and dangerously incomplete, and I have found the Pitman bill sensible, comprehensive, and complete except in two particulars, which I shall now point out.

BEWARE OF CREDIT

The Pittman neutrality bill as introduced should be amended so that it will be a genuine cash-and-carry bill and not a credit-and-carry. To extend credits of any kind in any amount for any length of time, even for 90 days, is inexcusably unneutral. For the United States to extend credit to a belligerent is tantamount to financing his war, and if we finance his war our boys will follow our dollars into his fight as surely as the sun rests. This dangerous provision in the bill will doubtless be corrected on the Senate floor. Neither do I believe that the President, Congress, nor anyone else should define combat areas. We have gone so far in abandoning all claims to the freedom of the seas in the pending bill that we should not lose the effect of that courageous surrender by setting up areas now to embarrass and endanger us. With these two exceptions the Pittman bill goes a long way toward insuring American peace in a war-mad world where great powers are fighting with their backs to the wall for their very lives.

THE CORRECT SOLUTION

The President recently stated with great truth that the people of the United States are the best informed people on earth. He could well have added that once they grasp the facts they are quick to reason out the correct solution. Every Senator has received thousands of letters, mostly from parents pleading that we "keep out of war." My letter writers differ widely on how this shall be accomplished, but they are united in the great objective of staying out of war. Even our businessmen, who are supposed to reap vast profits, and our farmers, who are expected to receive high prices in a war boom, know now that war business is bad business. Many of my correspondents say, "Keep us out of war; do not change the neutrality law." They do not mean to be so glaringly inconsistent. They do not realize that the existing law is less than half a law. They have been reading headlines and swallowing slogans without following through. The debate in Congress will bring everything out in the open, and when the American people have all the facts before them their verdict will be sound and sensible. Every phase and every point in this controversy will soon be known. That is well, for in a democracy everyone is charged with the responsibility of helping formulate governmental policies.

THE ROAD TO PEACE

The Pittman bill, if enacted into law, calls for a severe sacrifice on the part of American citizens, and especially the shipping interests; but if we escape this cataclysm of war that sacrifice will be worth a thousand times its cost and will pay rich dividends in values which cannot be measured in gold.

If the American people will accept the great sacrifice called for in the Pittman bill in the right spirit, control their natural hotheadedness, deflate their war enthusiasm, adequately improve their national and hemispheric defense, correct domestic social disorders, curb their prejudices, and act justly toward other states, even though they violently disagree with them, and earnestly seek and humbly follow divine guidance, a long and lasting peace will be their reward.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address which I delivered over the radio last evening, having to do with the pending joint resolution.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, while I am talking to you at this moment, there are hundreds of American merchant vessels, with American crews, slipping through European waters, carrying goods to one belligerent or the other, goods aimed to help or hurt one side, in this bitter European war.

In my opinion this must be stopped and stopped at once, otherwise we face the same danger that we faced just before we were drawn into the World War. At that time, back in 1917, in the 3 weeks' period just before we entered the war, 6 of our merchant vessels were sunk, with the loss of 63 of our American seamen, and as a consequence we were drawn into the war.

Referring to this, Senator PITTMAN said to you on the radio the other night, and I quote: "The patience of the American people was worn out, the patience of the President and of Congress ended. The Congress, by an overwhelming vote, declared war with Germany." Hon. Alfred E. Smith on the radio Sunday said, and I quote him, "I believe that we should prevent the transportation in American ships, of any goods to warring nations. It is undoubtedly the absence of such a law in 1917 that brought us into the World War. There is only one way to avoid a repetition of this experience, and that is by keeping American ships, and American passengers, out of trade with belligerents."

The President, in his message to Congress on the opening day, said, "This Government must lose no time or effort to keep the Nation from being drawn into the war." Well said, Mr. President! But, fellow countrymen, nothing is being done to put an immediate end to American vessels slipping through the war waters of Europe.

The arms-embargo-repeal bill, now being debated in the Senate, contains in sections 1, 2, and 3, a definite and worthy prohibition of this practice, and should be enacted into law at once, in my opinion. Every hour that passes between now and enactment of sections 1, 2, and 3, is an hour of danger to everyone of the 130,000,000 men, women, and children of America. The sad feature is, that instead of enacting sections 1, 2, and 3 into law at once, and then taking up the arms-embargo-repeal section of the bill, the Senate has insisted upon holding up passage of these safeguarding sections until it completes debate on the arms-embargo-repeal section of the bill, which, everyone says, will run for several weeks and, perhaps, for months.

I say put first things first; the people of this country have a right to expect the Senate to put first things first, by taking up sections 1, 2, and 3 immediately, and voting them into law, and then going on with this debate on the embargo-repeal section.

I trust you understand what I mean when I say that time is of the essence, and we cannot afford to "fiddle while Rome burns." We cannot afford to debate embargo repeal for weeks or months and allow our ships to sail in the war zones where, based upon our prewar experience, they are likely to be sunk. This would get us into war quicker than anything else. Whether we enact sections 1, 2, and 3 into law immediately or hold them up until lengthy debate is ended on the arms-embargo-repeal clause may very well mean the difference between our being forced into the war or kept out of it. The choice is yours, for I am glad to say that there is now pending in the Senate a motion, which I offered on the floor this afternoon, that the pending bill be separated into two parts, so that sections 2 and 3, to get our ships out of the war zones, could be enacted into law at once and not be held up by leaving them in the bill containing the much-debated arms-embargo-repeal clause.

The procedure that I am urging will not in any way delay final vote on the embargo on arms provisions. It will merely set up an order of procedure, which will place first things first, which calls for consideration and vote on the emergency provisions before debate and vote on the repeal clause.

In view of our present unprotected situation, with our vessels on the high seas carrying cargoes to all belligerents, many now located in the danger zones off the European shores, American property and American lives are at stake.

Should the Senate refuse to adopt my motion, and during the next few weeks of debate on the arms-embargo-repeal clause should there be a repetition of our experiences in the war zones of 1917, I say that those who refused to put first things first will have a serious and tremendous responsibility. It will then be too late; lives and property will have been destroyed, public opinion will have become inflamed, and we may find ourselves on the brink of entrance into another European war, the last of which cost the United States approximately $47,000,000,000 and produced thousands of deaths and maimed bodies. We will be embarking upon a world war, the last of which found, as stated by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, 74,000,000 mobilized, 10,000,000 men killed, 3,000,000 men maimed, 19,000,000 men wounded, 10,000,000 disabled or incapacitated for the balance of their lives, 7,000,000 orphans, and 5,000,000 widows.

Two days ago Dr. Edwin Borchard, professor of international law at Yale University, declared that Great Britain admitted that in the World War her merchant ships sometimes flew the American flag or had the American flag painted on her sides to mislead German submarines, and attempted to justify the practice as a "war ruse." He asserted that the Lusitania flew the American flag on the trip preceding the one on which she was sunk.

We do not know whether England is making use of such practice during the present war, but we do know that it is a practice which imperils American vessels in the war zones, and jeopardizes our determination to stay out of the present war.

Fellow citizens, this is our opportunity to prevent a recurrence of our experience of 1917. Whether we shall hold up passage of these safeguard provisions throughout the controversial debate on the arms-embargo-repeal clause, or whether we shall adopt a motion to make these safeguards into law at once, and then proceed with debate on the arms-embargo-repeal clause, is up to the Senate and up to you, for you can write or wire to your Senator and to me, and help to get action now, to enact sections 1, 2, and 3 immediately. Ask your Senators to support the Tobey motion. The vote on the Tobey motion is expected to be taken this Saturday.

I made the motion in the Senate today in all sincerity, motivated by one desire and one desire only: To protect my country immediately against occurrences that might again draw us into the European conflict, as they did 22 years ago.

A Washington newspaper has recently quoted one of the Senate leaders as saying that he did not "fall" for the suggestion that these emergency provisions be disposed of immediately, leaving action on the embargo repeal to be taken up immediately thereafter. "It would have been a smart move if anybody had 'fallen' for it," the leader is quoted as having said.

Has the time come in this country when a Member of the Senate cannot honestly make an effort to do something in that body which he feels is constructive, and which he honestly feels is urgent, in order to preserve the lives and property of millions of citizens, without having his motives smirched by such innuendoes?

Nothing in my action is designed to be deceptive or to be a "smart move." There is not a bit of partisanship in it. I am not asking any Member to "fall" for anything.

On the contrary, I am frankly asking every Senator to stand with me for a principle, and support this move to protect our country from circumstances likely to draw us into the war.

Let me repeat: Sections 2 and 3 of the Senate neutrality bill set up safeguards which will take our American merchant ships out of the war zones and put an end to the dangers of our being drawn into the war as we were in 1917, due to their being torpedoed.

It has been acknowledged by both the proponents and opponents of repeal of the arms embargo that the preponderance of debate will be with reference to section 18 of the bill, namely repeal of the arms embargo. In other words, the time consumed by the Congress in debating the controversial issue of repeal of the arms embargo would hold up enactment of sections 2 and 3 of the joint resolution, so that, during the many weeks before final enactment of the joint resolution, American vessels will be allowed to continue to carry materials to all belligerents—this without transfer of title—and American vessels will continue to be allowed to travel through combat areas.

Based upon our experience preceding our entrance into the last European conflict, this makes extremely likely the sinking of American vessels in combat areas carrying goods bound for a belligerent state, with resultant loss of American goods, ships, and seamen.

During every hour that passes between now and the date of final enactment of the measure, we are placing American lives and property in jeopardy, and upon occurrence and reoccurrence of such tragedies public opinion, molded through the press, radio, and motion pictures, and through passionate debates from the platform and floors of Congress, will follow the course that it followed preceding our entrance into the last World War.

The Tobey motion, now the unfinished business in the Senate, makes a separate bill of sections 1, 2, and 3, and seeks immediate enactment of these safeguard provisions.

If our ships are sunk, propaganda will play its part to get us in the war.

Let me illustrate by one of our outstanding experiences preceding our entrance into the last war.

Upon the sinking of the Lusitania it was stated that this vessel was carrying a substantial cargo of munitions to a belligerent, and that it thus was subject to sinking by the enemy. The London Daily Express, in an issue published 4 days after the torpedoing, said, "It is untrue that the Lusitania was carrying ammunition on its final voyage."

One American refused to believe the Express, however. This is described in an article published in the Sunday Oregonian on September 17 of this year, which was as follows:

"Senator Robert M. La Follette, of Wisconsin, father of the present Senator LA FOLLETTE, said the Lusitania had been carrying munitions for the allied armies. Immediately terrific outcry went up against him. He was accused of being a traitor and an agent of the Kaiser. A threat was made to expel him from the Senate. He stood his ground and asked the Treasury Department for the Lusitania's bill of lading. He was told it had been turned over to the State Department.

"He demanded that the State Department show him the bill of lading. He wanted to show the country the Lusitania was not the peaceful merchant vessel the people thought it had been. The State Department refused his demand on the basis that the bill of lading was to be retained for diplomatic correspondence. Walter Hines Page, American Ambassador in London, urged the President to put the United States in the war at once.

In his book, Road to War, Walter Millis, of the New York Herald Tribune, has said the sinking of the Lusitania was the first big stride in this country's involvement in the conflict. Not until after the war was the nature of the ship's cargo disclosed. The collector of customs at New York, revealed that the Lusitania carried large quantities of ammunition consigned to the British Government, including 4,200 cases of Springfield cartridges; Winston Churchill himself, English Cabinet member, subsequently admitted this.

If my motion is denied and similar events take place, the people will look back to this day in the Senate and know that the opportunity was turned down by this body.

As we contemplate the action which I propose, let us remember the fruits of war.

While 20 years have elapsed, yet the evidence of the human, material, and financial wreckage of that war is all around us. If we would stir up our minds by way of remembrance, go to the neuropsychiatric hospitals, as I have, which are scattered all over this country, full of shell-shocked and mentally incapacitated cases, to the cripples of America, to the saddened homes, to the crosses in the cemeteries. Observe the national debt, the decline in public morals, the body blows at democracy. All these and many others are the fruits of the last war.

Then fellow citizens, recall the immortal words of Kipling and say in your hearts with me—

"Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!"

Repeal of Embargo Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTER BY HON. KENNETH McKELLAR, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], on the subject of the proposed repeal of the Embargo Act.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 25, 1939.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your recent letter about the Embargo Act has been received and carefully noted.

Every sane American wishes to keep out of this European war. The only question is the best way.

The present Embargo Act forbids the sale of manufactured arms, implements, and ammunition to nations at war. This would appear to be fair and neutral, but in reality it is not, because in the present situation the Embargo Act puts us on the side of Germany, as that country buys arms and ammunition not from us but, if at all, from Russia, Italy, the Baltic States, and other nearby countries. On the other hand, the act is very injurious to England and France, because they are geographically more isolated, but have better access to the seas, and naturally buy most of their purchased arms and ammunition from the United States. It is also unfair to Canada, our neighbor, whose welfare and territorial integrity are of concern to us under the Monroe Doctrine. We have been at peace with Canada 100 years, and now cannot sell her an airplane or truck if used for war purposes. Therefore, instead of the present Embargo Act being a neutrality act, it is an act which favors aggressor nations and operates against peaceful nations. If continued, it would likely involve us in conflict. To be truly neutral, our country should treat all nations at war alike.

I am sure you do not wish to favor one country over others. I do not, though the British are my kin and I greatly admire them. But I have not forgotten that neither France, England, nor Germany is paying her war debts to us. All three nations owe us large sums. Our experience in the late war and the failure of these nations to pay their just debts to us constitute our best insurance against war now. This is no time to become a partisan of any foreign nation at war.

I utterly oppose war. Therefore, as the present Embargo Act favors Germany, I approve the repeal of that act (which German propaganda is trying so hard to retain); and I favor the passage of an act providing for real neutrality and the best method of keeping us out of war. The so-called cash-and-carry plan of the President and Secretary Hull, which treats all nations at war alike and permits us to sell to any nation which will pay for our goods and carry them away in its own ships, is, in my judgment, the best plan, and certainly will greatly lessen the chances of our being involved in this war.

You say you want the present Embargo Act retained and nothing else done. Under that law, any nation at war may buy raw materials of war and manufacture them into guns and ammunition, and the materials may be carried to such belligerents in our ships. Should any of our ships bearing such materials be sunk by any one of the nations at war, the sinking of the ship might involve us immediately. Therefore, in dealing with arms, ammunition, or materials of war I do not want them transported in our own ships.

Under the present law our merchant vessels may enter war zones, our merchants and manufacturers may keep title to the war materials until they reach the belligerents, and limited credit may be extended the belligerents by United States merchants. Do you want this state of affairs to exist? I am sure you do not.

The President has recommended, in the interest of American safety and peace, that American ships shall not carry war materials, arms, ammunition, or supplies to nations at war; that American merchant vessels shall be prohibited from entering into war zones; that American citizens shall be prohibited from traveling on belligerent ships or in dangerous areas; that the title to goods bought in this country shall be transferred in this country, so that we may not be involved, and that no war credits shall be extended to belligerents. I am in favor of an act prohibiting or regulating all these things so that our country may not become involved. It is the best way to secure our peace. My one aim in this crisis is to prevent America from becoming involved in this war.

One Tennessean wrote me in part as follows: "I have just returned last week from a trip to Chattanooga, Nashville, and Paris, Tenn., and without exception everyone I talked to expressed himself as I have to you." (That is, in opposition to the repeal of the Embargo Act.) This statement naturally astonishes me because I do not think it remotely reflects public sentiment in the State.

Within the past 10 days I have been to the county seats of 29 counties in Tennessee and to at least 6 other towns, seeing hundreds of leading citizens in every county I visited, and in every instance discussing neutrality with them. With a single exception in Murfreesboro, no one expressed himself or herself to me in opposition to the repeal of the Embargo Act, but all favored the President's plan to safeguard and keep our country out of war.

I agree with you that this is no time for party politics, and no party politics is being played here now. Republicans and Democrats alike have joined for the purpose of taking the best steps for keeping us out of this war. I think the President's measure will be passed by a 2-to-1 majority in the Senate. We all want peace. There is no absolute guaranty of peace, of course, but we want to take the most effective steps possible to secure it.

I have received a few very bitter letters in favor of retaining the embargo, and showing much heat and bias, letters which would not have been written if the writers had been acquainted with the facts as I have just given them to you. I regret to receive such letters, but I forgive the writers because in this case I know they do not know what they do in thus writing.

All of us here are striving, under the leadership of President Roosevelt and of our own Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, to keep us out of this unrighteous, uncalled-for, devilish war, brought about not by the great body of the splendid German people but by a single despot who is temporarily in control of them. I ask you to have confidence in us in this matter. At such times threats and denunciations do no good. It is time for all of us to act together for America, for our boys, and for peace.

I favored the present embargo law when it was enacted. Like most other men in public life, it seemed to me then that it would really result in our country being neutral in case of a foreign war. Now that actual events have demonstrated the contrary, I advocate repeal of the law. The facts stated will show you that I have had an open mind on the subject, and that my votes and actions have been governed by a desire for peace and to have us neutral in fact, and not merely in name.

I want your views and cooperation at all times, but I hope you will not be led to write because of the untrue propaganda which is being sent out by radio and otherwise by all three of the nations at war.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely, your friend,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

Position of Senator Murray on Phases of Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTER FROM HON. JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a form letter which I have sent to several of my constituents, expressing my position on some phases of the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

DEAR SIR: I regret very much that you received a form letter from my office, but I am sure you will understand that it is utterly impossible for me to personally answer the thousands of letters, telegrams, and post cards coming to me at this time.

I appreciate your observations on my stereotyped opposition to "foreign controversies and wars." I must confess that the American people are pretty well fed up on generalities of that kind. It is kin to the expressions, "I hate war," "I will not vote to send American boys across, etc.," and "This is a step into war." In the language of Shakespeare, they have become "dull," "stale," and "unprofitable." Yet, if I failed to expressly state in some form my opposition to such foreign involvement, I would be suspected by some oversuspicious constituent of concealing my intentions. I assure you that I am absolutely opposed to involving this country in foreign controversies or war, and I hope you will accept my word for it.

You are anxious to have a less ambiguous expression of my position and you suggest that in my statement, which you have already received, I have retained "a great many loopholes of interpretation" through which I may be able to escape in a possible nefarious design to involve the United States in a bloody foreign war. I assure you I had no such intention in mind when I formulated that letter. I want to be frank about everything I have to say in connection with this serious and perplexing problem confronting our country. I regret that you appear to hold some suspicion, and yet I don't wish to criticize you because I believe you are sincere in your anxiety to learn my true position. I hope you will feel that I am just as honest, sincere, and patriotic as you are, and that I am anxious to safeguard my country from this war just as much as you. I have nothing to conceal and want to make myself as clear as the English language will permit.

I will try to answer fully the questions which you have propounded. First you ask, "Can the United States afford to have its hands bloody with the blood of European men, women, and children killed with munitions, scrap iron, and steel bought in this country?" I am surprised, and would be offended did I not believe in your sincerity, to be asked such a question, the answer to which is so perfectly obvious. Certainly the United States cannot afford to have its hands bloody with such traffic, but you are entirely mistaken when you say that the President's cash-and-carry policy makes this possible. As a matter of fact, it is the present "embargo act" which you appear to support that makes this possible and permits the hands of the United States to become so bloodied. Under the Embargo Act we are now engaged in sending steel, scrap iron, and munitions to Europe, and will continue to send them to Europe as long as the Embargo Act remains in operation. The Embargo Act does not prevent the shipment of steel and scrap iron direct to Germany or to France and England. It only prevents the shipment of manufactured munitions, made out of steel and scrap iron, direct to Germany or to France and England. But it permits the shipment of munitions made out of scrap iron and steel direct to Italy and to Russia—allegedly neutral nations but in fact allies of Hitler—and obviously such munitions can be transshipped from Italy and Russia or from any of the other neutral nations into Germany. You will see, therefore, that it is not the cash-and-carry act that produces this situation, but is in fact the Embargo Act, which, you may innocently be led to believe, is perfect.

The United States is engaged at this very moment in sending steel, copper, and scrap iron to all of the belligerent countries now engaged in war and murdering women and children with bombs and munitions. If I could stop this with my vote, you may be sure that I would do so. I would vote to embargo the steel, copper, scrap iron, cotton, zinc, and every other metal and material which goes into munitions immediately. But, my dear sir, there isn't a chance in the world to take such action. All the hypocrites and fakers in the United States who are now attacking the cash-and-carry plan will be against a general embargo of these materials I have mentioned. Senators from the wheat-growing States who are vigorously attacking the President's proposals and insisting on the embargo of munitions insist on the right to sell and make all the blood money possible out of the shipment of western wheat to the belligerents to feed and sustain their soldiers in the field while engaged in killing men, women, and children.

The Senators from the South will all insist on shipping all the cotton and other commodities the South produces and sells to Europe for use in prosecuting the war so that the South may profit from such traffic. All the Senators from the oil States will insist on furnishing all the oil and gasoline that the murderous armies of Europe need for the purpose of propelling the airplanes that drop the bombs on defenseless towns and villages, murdering innocent women and children. The same is true with reference to every other commodity produced in the United States going into munitions.

Senators from States which may be affected will oppose the embargo being extended to copper, cotton, wheat, meat, steel, scrap iron, and everything else that Hitler needs and which he will get through Italy and Russia; and which France and England need and may be able to get by direct shipment. Some critics of the President's proposals know, of course, that no general embargo will ever be voted, so they are contented to wrap the American flag around themselves and befuddle the minds of innocent people by pretending that if we embargo munitions alone and stick our heads in the sand, our hands will be clean and unsoiled by the blood of women and children in Europe.

No more false and hypocritical argument can be made than that. Under the Embargo Act we are absolutely allowed to ship direct to Germany or to her adversaries, as well as to all the neutral nations in Europe, all the steel, copper, scrap iron, cotton, and other materials they require for the fabrication of munitions to bomb the towns and villages of Europe. Germany, of course, does not need manufactured munitions because she has the most gigantic munitions factories in the world and has also come into possession of the great Skoda factories in Czechoslovakia and the munitions plants in Poland. She needs no manufactured munitions, and she can get all the materials she requires with which to fabricate munitions through Russia and Italy (her allies), and other neutral nations on the Continent. Germany's adversaries are the only ones in need of finished munitions. We cannot ship munitions to Canada; but we can, under the Embargo Act, ship munitions to Italy or to Russia which may be transshipped to Germany. Therefore, under the Embargo Act, Germany can get munitions from the United States if she needs them.

What we are seeking to do under the Embargo Act is to take away from France and England their traditional right and privilege under international law to buy munitions in the only neutral country capable of supplying them. In other words, we are depriving Great Britain and France of their natural geographical advantages as sea powers in possession of transportation facilities, and giving Hitler, who needs no munitions, a powerful advantage which he would not have under international law.

I would be in favor of undoing this favoritism and denying all belligerents everything that goes to make war, and then our hands would be perfectly clean. Of course, that would result in a serious industrial upheaval in this country, just as it did in 1807 during the Napoleonic wars when Jefferson put such a plan in operation.

I think I have made myself as clear as can be expected. I would like to ask you, as one of my constituents: Do you approve of the kind of neutrality that the present embargo gives us? I realize that it is possible I may be mistaken in my views. I welcome advice from my constituents, but I sincerely hope that they may not unconsciously become purveyors of false propaganda set in motion by foreign influences in this country.

Next you ask if I "think the present war is being fought over ideologies represented by the phrase 'Democracy versus Dictatorships' or is it being fought by large powers each jealous for its economic power and political domination of the European scene?" I am surprised that you would ask such a question of anyone having a semblance of knowledge of Europe. No one but a moron would conceive that the present war is a war over ideologies such as you describe. It is obviously the result of the economic national and racial injustices and conflicts growing out of the Versailles Treaty. It is the result of a failure of European statesmanship, and I don't intend to attempt to figure out just where the burden of the blame lies among the various European nations involved in European power politics; but that it is not a struggle between the democracies and dictatorships is so obvious that no amount of window dressing could deceive a high-school student. If you believe that Senators here are so naive as to imagine that this is a war of ideologies, you have indeed a poor conception of the situation.

In conclusion you ask, "Just what do you mean by a 'system of real neutrality?' Candidly, with all due respect, I hesitate to discuss this matter with you because I am afraid that you may misunderstand me and suspect my motives and intentions. I do not want to quarrel or argue with you. Personally, I have a clear conscience and am not trying to hold a brief for either of the belligerents. It is very difficult to discuss the meaning of "neutrality" in a letter. Briefly, the principles of neutrality have grown up over the centuries under international law. These principles and rules are based on the wisdom and experience of mankind for centuries, and have become the accepted basis of neutral conduct in the world. In modern times, of course, powerful warlike nations have ignored and defied international law. They have sunk neutral ships and forced neutral nations into war, and, as a result, we have this struggle today in neutral countries to work out plans and policies designed to prevent involvement in war. Under international law, neutral nations have always been permitted to deal with the belligerent countries and sell them both materials of war and manufactured munitions. Major wars dislocate and upset the industrial and internal affairs of neutral nations. Normal trade is interrupted, and in some degree they are forced to go into war trade in order to prevent complete industrial collapse and unemployment. All nations, under international law, heretofore recognized this situation and permitted neutrals to carry on war trade. Many nations relied upon this policy; they had access to munitions and materials of war and neglected to build up huge military armaments, as I will explain later.

Neutrality does not mean that a neutral nation must balance the scales exactly in dealing with belligerents in order to see that one side has no advantage over the other. A neutral nation leaves the belligerent nations just as it finds them and offers to deal with both on an equal basis. If one belligerent is in a position, because of its control of the seas, to have access to some neutral nations where materials and munitions can be purchased; and the other nation, because of geographical difficulties, is unable to reach them, that is not the fault of the neutral nation. It is the result of the geographical position of that particular belligerent, and that is exactly the situation in this war. Germany has access to the materials and munitions of Italy, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Russia, and other neutral nations in the Baltic and in the Balkans that the Allies are shut off from. Germany can buy from those countries but France and Great Britain cannot. However, Great Britain has access to the United States and some other countries because of its sea power and transportation facilities. If we embargo munitions and materials, we are, therefore, shutting the Allies out and leaving Germany in a position of great advantage; we change international law to the advantage of Germany, and we are unneutral.

The question is, What should our position be? I didn't create the principles of neutrality, so please don't blame me if you find fault with them. If you feel that a neutral nation should refuse to sell war materials or munitions to a belligerent nation, you are perfectly within your right in advocating this view. Some nations, you know, neglect to build up extensive munitions plants for the manufacture of war materials and depend more or less on neutral nations in time of war as a source of supply. The United States has always recognized this situation. The United States bought most of its munitions in Europe during the World War. In case of war again this country would undoubtedly buy many materials and munitions of war from other neutral countries. If France and Britain have failed to take time by the forelock and provide for their military requirements, they, of course, will be offended and will claim that we are violating neutrality by refusing to give them access to war materials and munitions in this country.

The whole problem is a difficult and very delicate one, I realize. If all nations adopted the embargo system and refused to sell munitions or war materials, then all nations would have to become highly militarized and equipped with munitions plants of sufficient magnitude to supply all their wants in time of war. This, of course, would saddle such a back-breaking burden on the people that it would eventually destroy many nations. Only God can tell the true course we should follow in this darkened world. I think the United States might be right if it could embargo everything and set an example to the whole world by having nothing to do with mass murder. But certainly it can't take a position of being half in the war and half out, as it does under the present Embargo Act.

I can't continue this discussion longer, but I hope you will understand me. I do not believe that I am infallible and that I know the exact answer to this dangerous and threatening question of neutrality. As I have told you, I am willing to embargo everything that contributes to the murder of innocent men, women, and children in war, if the Congress of the United States would be willing to take that step. We would be assuming a tremendous responsibility. It might seriously strain our economic system. I feel, however, that I should vote for such a course if a substantial number of Senators consider it feasible and not destructive. I would like to so vote to express my abhorrence of the diabolical conditions in Europe which now threaten civilization. It must be evident, however, that if we can't embargo everything, the only honest, intelligent position we can take will be to sell all belligerents for cash and require them to take title and carry the commodities in their own boats.

I think I have made my position as clear as I can, and have left few, if any, loopholes. If you have any advice to offer me, I assure you that I am willing and anxious to have it; but I hope you will feel that I am sincere and honest in this matter—just as honest and sincere as you are. I will always appreciate advice from my constituency; but, as I have said, I hope and trust that they will not become unconscious purveyors of propaganda. In the midst of all the perplexities and perils that now menace our country, I have only one thought, and that is to protect my own country and to injure or handicap no other nation in the world.

Hoping that you will accept this full explanation in the spirit in which it is given, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY.

The Young Men and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I will relate an incident that happened on September 20 last in the city of Indianapolis which, I think, well illustrates the attitude of our young men on the war now raging in Europe. I submit the information which I shall present without any coloring and without bias for the light it throws on what our young men are thinking about the war and the danger of America's involvement.

There is no finer group of young men in this land of ours than those who comprise the Junior Chamber of Commerce. In every city where this organization exists its members are taken from the cream of the young manhood of the community. They are chosen to represent the various businesses and professions, the many and varied activities that make the community life. They are responsible, alert, serious-minded young men who wish to perform their full duty to their fellow men and their Maker. In Indiana our State Junior Chamber of Commerce has a membership of over 2,000 young business and professional men. The Junior Chamber of Commerce of Indianapolis has over 200 members, and it is a very live and forceful factor in our city and State. At the head of the Indianapolis group as its president is Mr. J. Russell Townsend, Jr., a very capable and public-spirited young businessman who enjoys the universal respect and confidence of our people.

I was unexpectedly honored with an invitation to be a guest of the Indianapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce at a regular noon luncheon of the chamber at the Canary Inn on Monument Circle. There was a full attendance and as I surveyed the crowd of fine-looking, serious-minded young men I felt that it was an honor, indeed, to be their Representative in the Congress of the United States.

After the meal the conversation turned toward the war and I could see that was the subject uppermost in their minds. Members of the Junior Chamber of Commerce are all between the ages of 21 and 35 and war will take a terrible toll from them if we become involved. Nevertheless it was made apparent in a thousand ways that these men were thinking primarily not of themselves but of America. Their talks were in the highest patriotic vein. Willingly would they die for their country if it were attacked, or if it were in any real danger, but they did not see why their blood should redden the soil of Europe in the settlement of age-old European boundary disputes that have been going on a thousand years and that will still be going on a thousand years after we are all dead and gone. "We should keep out of Europe and its whole ugly mess," was the dominant thought of that group.

The tide of conversation turned to the legislation now pending in Congress to wipe out the existing neutrality law and to repeal the embargo against the shipment of munitions. What did the young men think of that? They had but one thought which was the view of all present and that was that repeal of the embargo would be a most dangerous step from the standpoint of the peace and security of America and that it probably would be the opening wedge that would get us into the war. There was no difference of opinion in that group. Without a single dissenting voice resolutions were adopted opposing repeal of the munitions embargo and favoring the retention of the present Neutrality Act. The resolution that was adopted endorsed and reaffirmed a resolution previously adopted by the Indiana Junior Chamber of Commerce at its State meeting at Gary on September 16, which was textually, as follows:

Whereas the experience of this Nation prior to its entrance into the last World War indicates that one of the major forces causing the actual declaration of war on the Central Powers was the huge industrial and agricultural dislocation which threatened its internal economy should the allied powers be unable to continue their purchases of goods; and

Whereas this Nation is only now recovering from the tremendous industrial and agricultural overexpansion resulting from so supplying goods and munitions to the belligerents of the last World War; and

Whereas any great further addition to this Nation's stock of precious metals threatens to disrupt the monetary standards of the world and deprive the present monetary metals of much of the present value; and

Whereas the industrial and agricultural interests of the Nation would best be served by now concentrating their efforts on the supplying of useful goods to other neutral nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by a majority of the delegates of the Indiana Junior Chamber of Commerce present at its eighth annual convention, That the present Neutrality Act should be retained, and that this resolution be communicated to the President and the United States Senators and Representatives from Indiana.

Also it was resolved by the Indianapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce that American ships should be prohibited from entering all dangerous waters regardless of the cargo carried and regardless of the destination.

The young men of the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Indiana have no sympathy for Hitler or Hitlerism, dictators or dictatorships, but they believe that if we do what is best for our people, for the present generation, and for all posterity in the long train of ages to come, we will stand squarely and firmly on the ancient doctrine of keeping America out of Europe and Europe out of the Western Hemisphere. They do not see how we can stay out of the war in Europe and go into it, too, as they are fearful we would be doing if we plunge into power politics and become the arsenal and supply house for one set of fighting powers. They do not understand why we should seek to wipe out the sins of Europe with the blood of our American boys. And that, I believe, Mr. Speaker, is what the young men of America are thinking today.

The Challenge of Nihilism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. MAURICE S. SHEEHY

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by Dr. Maurice S. Sheehy, of the Catholic University of America. The address affords helpful sidelights on the pending question.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To be neutral on neutrality appears most difficult at the present moment. There are some things toward which a neutral attitude is for me impossible. I am not neutral toward sin; as a clergyman my life is dedicated chiefly to preventing the agony of soul involved when individuals prefer created gods to their Creator. I am not neutral toward disease and, insofar as in me lies, will strive to eradicate it. I am not neutral toward the United States of America, which has given me and all its citizens freedom and the right to pursue life in accord with the will of God. For it, if necessary, I would gladly offer what few remaining years of life may be given me. Nor could my attitude toward the Catholic Church be described as neutral, for from it I have received abundantly of the spiritual treasures within its keeping.

I am neutral toward neither nazi-ism nor communism, both of which have been condemned either explicitly or implicitly by Pope Pius XI, and I detest with all the powers of my soul the triumph of nihilism which has been accomplished by a union of those forces.

Nihilism began as an intellectual movement in Russia in the 1860's. It rejected the obligations of traditional morality and the "tyranny of authority." It appeared to die for a time, and then was dragged forth from its odoriferous grave by the Communists as the precursor of the order in which the individual becomes a slave to the state. Nihilism is a pseudo religion which rejects any sort of doctrine, indulges in complete moral skepticism, and politically is nothing more or less than absolute despotism. To the present triumph of nihilism in the union of nazi-ism and communism, I propose to devote most of the time assigned me on this broadcast.

However, before doing so, I can but deplore the hysteria, the confusion, and the acrimonious disputes which rage over the country today on the highly confused neutrality issue. One of the entertaining legacies of the late Gilbert Chesterton is a book called The Man Who Was Thursday. In this book, which deals with plots and counterplots, with secret messages and messengers bearing the names of the days of the week, a happy culmination is the discovery that all are bent upon the same goal and enrolled in the same army.

Today all Americans are concerned about the same goal—peace and security. May I recall a few messages from the President of the United States bearing upon this point? In his message to Congress last January, President Roosevelt stated:

"An ordering of society which relegates religion, democracy, and good faith among nations to the background can find no place within it for the ideals of the Prince of Peace. The United States rejects such an ordering and retains its ancient faith."

Again, on September 3, President Roosevelt declared:

"It is right that I should recall to your minds the consistent, and at times successful, efforts of your Government in these crises to throw the full weight of the United States in the cause of peace."

At the time the President made this statement, I happened to be in Europe at a vantage point where I could see that both the activities and messages of President Roosevelt contributed notably, if not successfully, to the preservation of the peace of the world.

On September 3 the President stated:

"I hope the United States will keep out of this war. I believe that it will. And I give you assurance that every effort of your Government will be directed toward that end. As long as it remains within my power to prevent, there will be no blackout of peace in the United States."

On September 21 President Roosevelt added:

"These perilous days demand cooperation between us without trace of partisanship. Our acts must be guided by one single, hardheaded thought—keep America out of war."

With these utterances the President of the United States placed himself at the head of our army of peace, and that army is no racket. Working along parallel lines and with indefatigable zeal, Pope Pius XII was spending himself to preserve or restore the peace of Christ for our war-torn world. So marked have been the similarities, both of expression and deed, of the President of the United States and the Holy Father that Observatore Romano, Vatican newspaper, made the following comment:

"It is impossible not to perceive the almost literal identity of the essential points enumerated by the head of state of one of the most powerful and modern nations of the world and the problems enunciated by the superreligious leader with the highest spiritual authority in the world. For the Pontiff, preaching springs from revealed truth; for the statesman, it comes from experience."

Perhaps I should also extend my declaration of unneutrality to two men? I yield to the Holy Father my heartfelt loyalty and devotion, and at the same time I respect as the legally elected head of our State, Franklin D. Roosevelt. The efforts to make the latter a "war monger," to question either his sincerity or integrity in this hour of grave crisis, is a crime that outrages every impulse of decency in the intelligent American. May I recall a last message of the cardinal archbishop of Chicago, "Only in the Vatican is there in Europe the gift of statesman's vision enjoyed by President Roosevelt."

It happens that I know more or less intimately the leaders of both parties who are debating the present neutrality bill. Without exception, each leader is a man of unquestioned integrity. And if a fluoroscope could reveal the inner workings of the hearts of BORAH, or JOHNSON, or PITTMAN, or BYRNES, and their colleagues, there would be revealed both the finest Americanism and the most earnest devotion to peace.

Only yesterday a Senator telephoned me this message, "Tremendous pressure is brought to bear upon me to vote contrary to what I believe are the best interests of the Nation." And I told him, "This country is safe as long as every man votes according to his conscience." Then he asked, "What is the Catholic position on this bill?" To which I answered, "There is no 'Catholic position' on this bill."

Now, may I speak above the coalition of world forces, which I have called Nihilism? My thought is largely due to a most remarkable book, perhaps the most significant in recent months, called the Revolution of Nihilism. The author is Hermann Rauschning, the former leader of the National Socialist Party and ex-president of the Danzig Senate, who, because he was ordered to arrest Catholic priests and disenfranchise Jews, retired from his post. In his book, written 2 years ago, Dr. Rauschning states:

"A German-Russian alliance means simply the confluence of two streams which run toward the same sea—the sea of world revolution."

Now, one of the best-informed writers of our day is a man named Adolf Hitler, whose best-known work is Mein Kampf. Hitler has written:

"Therefore, the fact of forming an alliance with Russia would be the signal for a new war, and the result of that would be the end of Germany."

In regard to the first statement, Herr Hitler ranks both as prophet and as historian. The second statement implies that in such an alliance Germany would be absorbed by the Soviet. May God prevent such an eventuality for those many noble souls of German birth!

Then Hitler continues:

"Those who are in power in Russia today have no idea of forming an honorable alliance nor of remaining true to it if they did."

These are courageous words, but I suspect that at least 6 months must elapse before they can be fully verified by their author.

Then Hitler continues:

"It must never be forgotten that the present rulers of Russia are blood-stained criminals; that here we have the dregs of humanity, which, favored by the circumstances of a tragic moment, overran a great state, degraded and extirpated millions of educated people out of sheer blood lust, and that now for nearly 10 years they have ruled with such savage tyranny as was never known before."

Alas! how true. And into that power last week Herr Hitler delivered the fate of millions of Poles. Already their churches are being razed and the emblems of religion torn to the ground. Is it any wonder that a few days ago Pope Pius XII wept with the Polish delegation which came to see him as he prayed:

"May Christ, who wept at the death of Lazarus and over the ruins of His fatherland, gather and some day compensate you for the tears you spill over the death of Poland, which will not die."

At this point I should like to quote from the Omaha True Voice, official publication of Bishop James H. Ryan. Last week it stated editorially:

"The Catholic cannot but view the Nazi-Soviet military alliance as the work of Satan himself. The leaders of both these peoples are arch enemies of the Church of God. One of them the late Pope Pius XI publicly called 'an enemy of the Cross of Christ.' * * * We see nothing ahead but disaster and destruction for catholicism as long as the Nazi-Soviet union endures."

But let Herr Hitler continue to describe the new rulers of millions of Polish people:

"It must not be forgotten," he states, "that these rulers belong to a people in whom the most bestial cruelty is allied with a capacity for artful mendacity and believes itself today more than ever before called to impose its sanguinary despotism on the rest of the world."

These words were uttered before Herr Hitler and Stalin began dancing cheek to cheek.

Nor does the idea of world conquest seem to be foreign to the author of Mein Kampf:

"Today we number 80,000,000 Germans in Europe. The correctness of our foreign policy will not be established until, a bare century hence, 250,000,000 Germans are living on this continent, and living, not squeezed together as factory coolies for the rest of the world but as peasants and workers who reciprocally assure each other livelihood by what they produce."

If one wonders where these people will live, probably some information may be secured by inquires made in Austria, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. And the song which Mr. Hitler has taught his youth to sing as they march under his banner contains these lines:

"Heute gehört uns Deutschland, Morgen die ganze Welt—"

"Today we own Germany, tomorrow all the world."

Is it any wonder that in a recent poll of the Institute of Public Opinion, in answer to the question, "If Germany should defeat England, France, and Poland in the present war, do you think Germany would start a war against the United States sooner or later?" Sixty-three percent answered affirmatively? Now, that, to my mind, is nonsense; it is nonsense due to propaganda, and the propagandist is Adolf Hitler.

Now let me return to another passage from Herr Hitler's pen:

"How can we teach the German worker," writes Hitler, "that bolshevism is an infamous crime against humanity if we ally ourselves with this infernal abortion and recognize its existence as legitimate?"

That, Mr. Hitler, I would like to insert parenthetically, seems to me to be your personal problem.

And then he adds:

"The struggle against Jewish bolshevization of the world demands that we should declare our position toward Soviet Russia. We cannot cast out the devil through Beelzebub."

May I add to this scriptural allusion an old saying, "He must have a long spoon that would eat with the devil."

Now let me return to Dr. Rauschning's Revolution of Nihilism. He writes:

"There will be no ordinary coalition between two powers for normal practical purposes. Germany and Russia, if they come together, will radically transform the world."

Now some of my listeners, no doubt, are asking, "Is it any of our business?" Let Germany and Russia divide Europe and Asia as they desire—if they do not annoy us. Again let me quote Herr Rauschning:

"In the National Socialist view the political situation in America is unstable and can be developed into outright revolution; to do this is both a tactical aim of the national socialism, in order to hold America aloof from Europe, and a political one in order to bring North and South America into the new order. By its ubiquity and its tactics of universal menace, national socialism is preparing to occupy the key position for colonial domination, for domination of the great sea routes, and for the domination of America and the Pacific."

These are strong words, too strong to command my assent. I do not think there is remotely in the mind of Mr. Hitler any thought of disturbing directly the people of the United States. Yet during the month of January, which I spent in South America, I heard broadcast after broadcast from Germany uttering the vilest lies and the most vicious propaganda about our country in order to poison South America against us.

The real peril to the United States is not the domination of nazi-ism in this hemisphere but the domination of the world by communism.

If there should be any doubt about where Communists stand at the present hour, then may I call attention to the words uttered by the leader of the Communist Party, William Z. Foster, before the Dies committee last week. When asked by Chairman Dies, "In the event of war between the United States and Russia, where would your allegiance lie?" Mr. Foster refused to answer. Foster also stated (according to a report in the New York Times) that if the United States entered the war on the English-French side, he would not support the United States. Then he made a very interesting statement which I hope Mr. Hitler will hear sooner or later: "The Soviet Union has stopped Hitler in the East and has smashed the Fascist axis."

Now I hate war, as does every civilized being. At a rather tender age I was privileged to render some meager assistance to soldiers returning to base hospital 28, and the memory of ruined bodies, broken hearts, and disordered minds has never left me. War, means for millions of youth, death. But in our concern for peace at home we are apt to overlook what is going on in Europe, and if the twin forces of disaster which now must salute as their field marshal Stalin converge upon this hemisphere, then there can be no peace.

Our solemn obligation is to devote ourselves not merely to procuring for America peace here and now, but to insure the youth of America against the surging tide of nihilism.

The Share of the Domestic Beef Market Supplied by the American Beef Producer

---

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

STATEMENT BY THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement issued by the Department of Agriculture on the domestic beef market:

The American beef market belongs to the American farmer, and is controlled and dominated by him. Since 1923 annual imports of cattle and beef have averaged only 3 percent of our total domestic production. These imports have varied from year to year in accordance with the level of cattle and beef prices. In 1929, for instance, when prices were high, imports equaled nearly 6 percent of domestic production. During the depression, as prices declined, imports also declined until in 1931 they equaled only 1 percent of domestic production. Later, when prices improved, imports again expanded somewhat. In 1937, when prices were around predepression levels, imports were equal to about 5 percent of the domestic production.

Live cattle from Canada and Mexico, together with canned beef, largely corned beef from South American countries, comprise the bulk of these imports. The imports of canned beef, in terms of carcass beef, exceed those of live cattle.

Imports of live dutiable cattle during the past 3 years have been coming in at about the predepression level. For the 1936–38 period they averaged 439,360 head annually, as compared to 454,670 for the 1927–29 period.

Imports of canned beef in recent years have on the average exceeded somewhat the predepression levels, as the United States has come to depend almost entirely upon South America for its canned beef.

Prior to 1934 this country had practically ceased producing canned beef, as facilities for this type of canning in the packing industry were very limited, and as American packers apparently found that other methods of sale were for the most part more economical. Before the war quantities were canned domestically, but this beef came largely from low-grade cattle and was inferior in quality to that now imported. As a rule, much of the inferior quality beef previously put up domestically in cans is now sold as sausage ingredients and utilized in the manufacture of sausages. Domestic packers have usually found a better outlet in the fresh-meat trade for the domestically produced beef of the grade from which the imports of canned beef have been produced than has been possible through the domestic canned-meat industry. Consequently, we have come to depend upon South American canned beef.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 2, 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. PAUL J. RAVER, SEPTEMBER 29, 1939

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River, 150 miles from the ocean, at the head of the tidewater, is the most important Government project in Oregon. Built primarily for navigation, Bonneville has, as a byproduct, a present development of 86,400 kilowatts. There are now being constructed two units, with 104,000 kilowatts additional capacity. Ultimately there will be developed 518,000 kilowatts when the plant is fully completed.

The question in the minds of our people is, Will this great development result in the increased use of electricity in the Northwest, at low cost to the rural and domestic consumers, or will the overlords of the private utilities steal for their own selfish purposes this great heritage? The Niagara power resources were so stolen, with the aid of corrupt governmental agencies. The people have derived no benefit from the low-cost Niagara energy. However, Niagara has been immensely valuable to the monopolies, who are said to have made a quarter of a billion dollars from the monopolized use of a natural resource belonging to the people.

Many times I have said, "The only way for the people to enjoy low rates on electricity from Bonneville will be through their own distribution systems. Low-cost electricity can never be attained over the wires and through the meters owned and controlled by the Wall Street utilities."

The first Bonneville administrator was Mr. J. D. Ross, who died just as he was getting his plans into operation. For several months there was no administrator, and Engineer Carey was acting in that capacity. Then Mr. Frank Banks, the reclamation engineer in charge at Grand Coulee, was given a temporary appointment. On September 15 Dr. Paul J. Raver was designated Administrator, and is now in charge of this great project under permanent appointment from the Secretary of the Interior. On September 29, 1939, Dr. Raver delivered a speech before the City Club of Portland, Oreg., on the subject, Bonneville at Your Service. This address will be read and studied with much interest by thousands in the Northwest, who have been impatient over the endless delays and uncertainties in governmental action in relation to Bonneville project. It clearly indicates the course which will be followed by the administration in selling and distributing the surplus electric energy developed at Bonneville. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks this address of Dr. Paul J. Raver, administrator of Bonneville power project, as follows:

When Mr. Snow and Mr. Scott invited me to appear before the City Club they asked me to speak freely and fully about Bonneville. They asked me to discuss not merely the immediate question of power distribution, but rather the broad implications of the Federal program for developing the Columbia River. We are all interested in Bonneville power. But we are more interested in what this power can do, how it can help solve the daily problem of earning a livelihood.

It is gratifying to make my initial talk before a civic group which is devoted to the sober consideration of the basic problems of the region. I have looked back through some of the bulletins of the City Club and observed the broad, open-minded approach it has taken to the controversial issues of the past few years. I noticed your members were concerned with the power issue as far back as 1928, when you made a study of the proposed merger of the two Portland electric systems. I was glad to see that you approached the question from the standpoint of economics, from the proposal's dollars and cents significance to the community.

I noticed also that your organization has discussed the question of Bonneville from time to time. I was gratified to find that you viewed Bonneville as a means rather than an end. I was gratified to observe that you saw beyond the initial savings and immediate benefits that low-cost hydroelectric power can bring. Important as these immediate savings are—representing hundreds to thousands of dollars for the merchant and the property owner—of far greater importance are the long-term benefits of integrated development of the Columbia River for the welfare of the entire region.

Let me assure you at the outset that I have no preconceived views about Bonneville. I believe I come here with an open mind, with a willingness to listen rather than dictate, to learn rather than to teach.

I have spent a good part of my life on this problem of power. I have studied its significance in an industrial State like Illinois and in an agricultural State like Tennessee. I have studied it from the standpoint of State regulation, rural electrification, industrial utilization, and from probably every other angle, but always, I believe, from the standpoint of economic distribution in the public interest.

Nowhere, however, have I found a region where power is so all important a factor in the lives of its people. Too many persons, I am afraid, have regarded power—and particularly Bonneville power—as something apart from their daily livelihood, a matter remote from their immediate concern. To most of us it has meant merely the electric bill at the end of the month, and probably the complaint that it is too high. That is a usual complaint, perhaps as prevalent as the discussion of the weather. Maybe we'll be able to do something about it besides talking.

I am glad to find that there are those who see in Bonneville more than an opportunity for cutting a few cents off our light bills. I do not wish to convey the impression that I am disparaging cheap power in the home. (My wife would never let me do that.) Frankly, I see little reason why power that costs $2.60 in Tacoma costs $5 in Portland. I hope that with the aid of Bonneville you and I can help close that gap. But more of that at a later time.

Right now I want to pay tribute to those farsighted individuals and civic groups who regard Bonneville as the key project in the long-time development of a great river system for all its potential values: agencies like the Northwest Regional Council and the various planning commissions and other progressive civic groups. With them I believe that Columbia River power must be used on every economic front—the farm, the home, and the factory. And I hope this program for building power use will be more than a beating of drums. I sincerely trust that the Bonneville project can unite with our State and local institutions—both public and private—to explore the opportunities for the most valuable utilization of our hydropower.

Before going into the broader aspects of Bonneville, let us understand each other clearly about the present situation. I have brought myself and my family to the Northwest to work and to live. My job is to put Bonneville to work, to pay off the entire cost of the power development.

Like the manager of any enterprise, I have rather specific instructions from my board of directors. The Congress of the United States has directed me to carry out certain policies. With these policies some of you may not agree. But they are the law of the land and their existence must be recognized.

First. The Bonneville act requires the Administrator to encourage the widest use of all energy generated at the dam. To meet that requirement, uniform wholesale rates have been adopted.

Second. Congress has directed that this electricity shall not be monopolized by limited groups. In compliance with this mandate, a region-wide transmission system is being constructed.

Third. The congressional act requires that Bonneville be operated for the benefit of the general public, and particularly rural and domestic customers.

Fourth. The Bonneville law requires that 50 percent of the power be reserved until January 1, 1941, for public and cooperative systems. That is being done.

Fifth. The act specifies that preference in the sale of power shall at all times be given to such nonprofit agencies as public districts, cities, and cooperative systems. That is the law.

Sixth. I am authorized to prepare resale rate schedules, if advisable, to insure low-cost power out at the end of the line. Such retail rates are being studied now.

Seventh. I am required to cancel contracts with private companies on 5 years' notice to meet the demands of public and cooperative systems. I hope we will be able to develop Bonneville so rapidly that no cancelations will be necessary.

Gentlemen, those seven points are the law of the land. Within their framework we must solve the problem of marketing Bonneville power for the widest general welfare.

Like any business investment, power must pay its way. Every cent allocated to power must be returned to the Federal Treasury, together with a reasonable rate of interest. The sale of this power makes possible one of the greatest navigation projects since the construction of the Panama Canal. Similarly, power sales from Grand Coulee will make feasible an unprecedented irrigation project.

These two projects are the beginning, not the end. There is enough power in the Columbia River to pay for more of these great humanitarian developments. Nearly 12,000,000 kilowatts can be harnessed—power worth $200,000,000 a year when sold at the lowest wholesale rate in the Nation. And, gentlemen, those huge blocks of power cannot be sold if we continue to use power on the basis of scarcity rather than plenty. True, our power use in the Northwest is above the national average. But so are our resources, our educational standards, our income.

Unless we are prepared to use power abundantly, we cannot hope for the fuller development of the Columbia River. We cannot hope to see the land and water and mineral resources of the Northwest opened to hundreds of thousands of more citizens who want to come out here. The problem is not to sell Bonneville's half-million kilowatts; it is to market the Columbia River's 12,000,000 kilowatts. Bonneville is only 5 percent of the total job.

I have seen a lot of stories in the paper that Bonneville power has not been sold; that it will not be sold. Much of this publicity emanates from a group of very able propagandists who are paid not to build Oregon or the Northwest but to disparage such projects as Federal development of the Columbia River. I am not afraid that Bonneville power will not be sold.

Like Boulder Dam, like Norris, like Wilson Dam, Bonneville power will be sold. If we have any faith in the future of the Northwest; if we believe it can support hundreds of thousands of additional families; if we believe it has resources that await intelligent development, we need not be alarmed about marketing our power. Surveys indicate that at normal growth we can use all of Bonneville and Grand Coulee in the next 15 years. And every indication points to a growth that is well above normal.

My able predecessor, Mr. Banks, has said that all the available power at Bonneville will be disposed of in 6 months, making due reservation as provided by law. Only 86,000 kilowatts will be available at Bonneville for the next year. Within a few months the first Bonneville transmission line will be completed—reaching here to Portland and southward to Salem and Eugene. Other lines will extend to Grand Coulee, to The Dalles, to Kelso, to Raymond, to Ellensburg, and to adjacent points. And to speed the use of this power, the Federal Power Commission has approved a uniform rate along the entire system. This rate has been hailed as the lowest wholesale schedule in America.

Even now—before a single Bonneville transmission line is completed—large blocks of power are going out over existing lines. On a temporary contract the Northwestern Electric Co. has taken as high as 30,000 kilowatts in a single day. The local utilities have been seeking this power eagerly, literally beating a path to the doorstep of the Bonneville Administration Building.

No; the problem is not selling Bonneville power. It is using it—using it for a profit, for comfort, for the benefit of the entire citizenry of the Northwest. As a Federal project, that is Bonneville's purpose. Under the Federal law, that is my duty.

Here in Portland, I am told, there is a lethargy and a division among many of you. I am told you are still fighting the battles of the Civil War, jousting over issues presumably settled. Over the issue of uniform versus zone rates, widespread transmission versus marketing all energy at the dam site, over public versus private distribution of power. I think most of those questions are moot points; something like the windmills at which Don Quixote tilted so vigorously.

Frankly, I can see no basis for the dispute over industrial versus home use of power. Perhaps before our power lines were designed there was occasion for some difference of opinion. But now the lines are under construction; the policy has been translated into transmission circuits that are rising throughout Oregon and Washington that will serve practically all of the major centers of population.

There is power enough in the Columbia River for both purposes, if we use it wisely. We can make this low-cost energy equally available to home and to industry.

The primary need, however, is new uses in the home, on the farm, in the store, and in the factory, in the school, and down on our streets and highways; uses that will be felt in the economic life of the community. In the T. V. A. area new industries have taken advantage not merely of cheap power but natural resources of the region. I need not point out that such utilization spreads its benefits widest in the community.

Any power program for the Columbia Basin must be based upon the realization of the problems of the region, problems we can't afford to ignore. Through efforts of State and Federal agencies most of us are becoming increasingly aware that we have problems in our own back yard. They are real and vital questions that reach down into the lives of every one of us.

First among them is the problem of our primary industry, lumber. Depletion of timber, increasing operating costs, loss of markets, and a variety of other causes have cut down employment in this basic industry. The effect has been felt throughout the community by the merchants, property owners, and those in the various service industries. If we can use our hydroelectric power to help meet the problems of declining lumber pay rolls, I believe we shall carry out a mandate of Congress to market the power in the interest of the general public. I hope that at Bonneville we can devote much of our attention to this problem. I hope we can work closely with the United States Forest Products Laboratory, to encourage new and economic uses of our timber resources. I hope we can assist in local studies in the various communities. In the near future I hope we shall have more specific proposals to advance. Certainly the matter demands our immediate attention.

The second problem is the great increase of population throughout the Northwest. Coming west with my family 2 weeks ago, we saw car after car of families heading this way. They want another chance—on the farm or in the shops. It is all very well to talk about the vast frontier in the Northwest, but most of us realize that there is comparatively little farm land available for new cultivation. Although we have 13 percent of the Nation's land area, less than one-eighth of our region can be used to grow crops.

At Grand Coulee power will help to pay for irrigation of a million and a quarter acres. With Bonneville power, I hope that we can encourage reclamation and supplemental irrigation by providing a low rate for water pumping. Even in the comparatively wet Willamette Valley summer irrigation can increase crop yields and raise living standards. I do not believe we want to see farmers continue on submarginal land. Some additional land can be made available by clearing and draining. But we must provide steady employment, at fair wage levels, to support these thousands of new families as well as the thousands of our own men who seek work in the Northwest and cannot get it.

Our third major problem is the unbalance of trade. For years the Northwest has been a colonial empire, shipping out its raw materials and buying its manufactured goods. The resulting situation has left us at the mercy of world markets. One of the most fruitful uses of power would be the development of local decentralized industries. Our extended transmission system and uniform rates are a step in that direction. By bringing low-cost power to our communities we can promote the fullest use of the raw materials at hand. Location of industries is an economic question. If the iron ores of Columbia County can be processed profitably with electric power, a line should be built there. If limestone from eastern Oregon can be made the basis for a new industry, the Bonneville administration should help in the development. The Tennessee Valley Authority, for example, has devised new methods for processing phosphate ores. The phosphate beds of the Northwest area are far greater than those of any other region, and there is a desperate need for a vastly expanded fertilizer industry to preserve the soil of the Nation.

Perhaps we can assist other agencies in the establishment of a pilot plant to work out the technique for processing phosphate fertilizer. The same is true of manganese, magnesium, chromium, and other ores which exist in abundance in this area. Recently the Federal Government has given increased attention to the problem of developing these metals, which are so essential to our national economy and national security.

There is a great deal that can be done to assist in an orderly industrial development which will tend to insure the permanent prosperity of the region. It may be that most of our work will be limited to the direct applications of hydroelectric power, but undoubtedly we can assist in studies and surveys of the nature I have outlined.

We have talked a great deal about new industries, but much remains to be done if an integrated program is to correct the unbalance of trade and to furnish steady employment for citizens and a reliable market for farmers and merchants.

Even considering all the forest-products industries in the Northwest, we find that there is a regional deficiency of nearly 25 percent in the value of our manufactures. Expressed in terms of jobs for men who want them, the Northwest has a deficiency of more than 22 percent. Leather and rubber products produced here are practically negligible in quantity. On a per capita basis we produce less than 8 percent of the chemicals that the average State does. With hydroelectric power becoming an increasingly important factor in modern chemistry, there is no reason why we cannot develop this field intensively in the Northwest.

Similarly, the introduction of basic metal industries would induce various processing industries to locate nearby. I already have been in contact with certain industries which are deeply interested in the advantages of Columbia River hydroelectric power and deep-water navigation. A multitude of manufactured articles can profitably be procured from the natural resources of this region.

There is a growing local market for the products of such industries. There is no reason why we must continue to import practically all types of manufactured goods into this area when we have raw materials to make them, the power to process, and ready hands looking for the jobs.

In placing primary emphasis on power, I do not wish to minimize the importance of the transportation question to those who live and work in the Northwest. A uniform power rate throughout the Northwest will encourage exploitation of the basic resources of every community. But I recognize the fact that power alone is not enough. I wish it were. Of equal importance is the problem of bringing your goods to market, and there are no uniform rates when it comes to shipping.

This freight-rate problem is not a new one to me. I have faced it before; I am willing to face it again. As Bonneville administrator, my concern is not with power alone. We cannot use our power effectively until we solve the allied problem of freight rates. Gentlemen, I stand ready to help you on this problem. I want to work with you and for you. All I ask is that you share the responsibility with me. This invitation is not a general pleasantry, issued on the spur of the moment. It is directed to those sober-minded citizens who want to do something about one of the most serious problems that faces them.

I have said that I am aware of the division and disputes that have existed in a few localities. I regret that I come here to find part of the citizenry divided into two armed camps, neither trusting nor working with the other. Such a situation cannot continue if Bonneville is to mean anything to either group.

As to where I stand, I hope I shall make my position clear. My cards are on the table. You are entitled to a straightforward statement of policy. You are entitled to know what you may expect from me so that you can guide yourselves accordingly.

First of all, let me say, I am not here to prolong any feuds; nor am I here to dictate to any locality. Within the bounds of the Bonneville Act, I shall to the best of my ability assist every group—be it large or small, public or private—to distribute Bonneville power at retail prices that will reflect the lowest wholesale schedule in America.

I am not going to jump in and take business just because it is available. I want to know whether a given contract will promote the growth and stability of Bonneville and the Northwest. I consider it my primary responsibility to see that the terms of these contracts assure the benefits of Bonneville power to all classes of consumers—home, farm, and factory. And by "benefits" I do not mean merely generation savings. A basic readjustment of retail rates is essential if Bonneville power is to have any economic significance at all.

As to the newly formed public groups, they will be given every assistance in getting started. Our engineers, our rate experts, and our accountants will do everything possible to start them off right. Within a very short time I hope to be able to announce standard resale rates for public systems marketing Bonneville power. These rates should represent not merely an appreciable savings to the consumer but an opportunity to use very much more of the Northwest's best buy—hydroelectric power. I also predict that these resale rates, energentically promoted, will stimulate farm and commercial use and provide a real impetus to industrial development. I cannot let this opportunity pass without expressing my admiration and respect for the excellent record made by such public systems as Tacoma and Eugene. Their commercial and residential rates are one-half to one-third of most of the Oregon and Washington systems, and every utility man—be he public or private—will ungrudgingly concede they have done a splendid job.

As to the private utility companies, I have no ax sharpened for any of them. The patrons they serve and the investors they represent are their own judge and jury. By their treatment of their consumers, their stockholders, and their employees they shall determine their own future. If, measured by a fair yardstick of all legitimate costs, they can meet the rates of the public systems, they will survive and continue to serve. If not, they will be their own executioner.

As to resale rates of private companies, that matter is intimately linked with the State regulatory commission. I have been on the regulation end long enough to know all of the delays and difficulties inherent in the system. However, I think we are justified in expecting an early and substantial reduction in rates from companies purchasing Bonneville power.

Whoever distributes Bonneville power, all will agree that the public is entitled to get more for its money. Right now transmission lines, distribution systems, transformers—in fact, practically the entire investment of our utilities—are idle nearly half the time. At little increase in cost these facilities can provide the consumer with several times the current he now uses. It is not too much to ask that this anomaly be corrected.

As to the issue of public versus private distribution of power, that question is in your hands rather than mine. Each community has the right—and the obligation—to choose the method which will insure the lowest electric rates and the best possible service. With the increasing importance of power in community growth—and particularly in industry—no city can afford to be handicapped by electric power rates that are very much higher than its neighbor.

I appreciate the fact that nothing I can say will deter the people of the Northwest from settling this issue in their own way. I trust that the decision of the people will be based on intelligent, factual analysis of the problem rather than on partisanship or propaganda.

In the determination of an issue so vital to the future of our Northwest country, I am hopeful that the leaders of community thought—groups such as the City Club—will take the lead in seeing that the question is settled on its merits. If my staff or myself can assist in the solution of the problem by furnishing engineering, accounting, or legal information, we shall be glad to serve. I hope you will call upon us.

Whatever your decision may be upon this question, I trust that the interests of all concerned—consumer, employee, investor, will be respected. If there is to be a transition from private to public—or public to private—operation in distribution of power, I am confident that a fair price, a price based on legitimate investment, will be paid. I am confident that the ultimate management will retain the technical and skilled employees so essential to reliable and efficient service.

I hope I have conveyed to you my conviction that it is the end, not the means, that is important. An inefficient public system is no better than an inefficient private one. High rates are no more desirable because they come from a public plant instead of a private one.

As far as I am concerned, I shall do everything I can to work with you toward the goal I have outlined. I promise you a strong personnel at Bonneville, the best I possibly can get. And I assure you they will work vigorously, and vigilantly, in the public interest.

I have spoken today in general terms. To do otherwise would be premature and ill-considered. When I have been here longer, I shall be able to speak more specifically. When I have met you individually, and come in closer contact with your problems, I shall be better prepared to discuss them. I hope you will ask me to be with you again so that I may review our progress, consider any of the issues that may arise, and dispose of any fancied differences that may come between us. We do not want to isolate ourselves from the community or its leaders. We want them to feel that they are a part—and a vital part—of the Bonneville project, free to work with us toward a common goal.

I do not wish to let this opportunity pass without paying tribute to the men who have preceded me as administrators of the Bonneville project. The reputation of J. R. Ross extended far beyond the Northwest. His vision and imagination commanded the attention of engineers throughout the Nation. His generosity, his simplicity, and his sincerity, were apparent to all who knew him. It is a privilege to take up the work which he started. I hope the job we do will be worthy of his memory.

I also want to express my thanks and appreciation for the splendid cooperation of Mr. Frank A. Banks. As acting administrator of the Bonneville project he filled a breach that was difficult and trying. He had not only to supervise a major power program here, but go on with construction of the largest project in the world—Grand Coulee Dam. I am indebted to him for making my task here easier and I look forward to working more closely with him in coordinating our program for the greater development of the Columbia.

Franklin D. Roosevelt saw in the development of the Columbia River—I quote his own words—"water power of incalculable value for cheap manufacturing and economy and comfort on the farm and in the household." When I was offered the job of Bonneville administrator a short time ago, President Roosevelt's words came to my mind. I saw the opportunity to extend the advantages of the Columbia River's tremendous power resources to the region. But I saw more than that. I saw a chance to set a new standard for power utilizations—a goal for the entire Nation.

And, finally, I saw a chance to help in the big job of making America's greatest river serve all her people. It is a high privilege which I invite you to share.

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES OF OCTOBER 5, 1939

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the New York Times of Thursday, October 5, 1939, containing comment on the radio address made by Bishop Bernard J. Sheil, of Chicago, which address I caused to be placed in the RECORD yesterday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of October 5, 1939]

VATICAN PAPER STRESSES EMBARGO REPEAL STAND

ROME, October 4.—The Osservatore Romano published today extracts from the speech made by Bishop Bernard J. Sheil, of Chicago, commemorating Cardinal Mundelein's death, and quoted in full the passage in which Bishop Sheil cited the Osservatore's editorial praising President Roosevelt's message to Congress on the neutrality bill.

The mere fact that the Vatican newspaper printed this passage indicated, according to Vatican circles, the favor in which the Holy See views Mr. Roosevelt's neutrality policy. In today's issue the Osservatore also printed a long dispatch from Washington in which Mr. Roosevelt's neutrality thesis is fully explained and in such a manner as to leave no doubt of the keen interest and sympathy it has aroused at the Vatican.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK, OF MASSACHUSETTS, SEPTEMBER 13, 1939

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over station WBZ, Boston, Mass., and station WBZA, Springfield, Mass., September 13, 1939:

The unfortunate catastrophe that is being carried on in Europe and the undeclared war in China are naturally uppermost in our minds today. Can the United States stay out of war? is the question that is being asked on all sides. In my opinion, our country can and will stay out of the war. I can see the necessity for feelings of caution, but I cannot see the necessity for feelings of alarm. There are certain reasons for such an opinion. We must remember that the American people are more seasoned today than we were 25 years ago. By "seasoned" I particularly mean that we are more immune now from the influences of propaganda than we were then. We are not believing everything we hear today.

We must also remember that our elements of national defense, our Navy, our air forces, and our Army, are formidable today, a different situation than that which existed at the beginning of the World War. These elements are being further increased and strengthened, and additional appropriations will undoubtedly be made, not for conquest but for protection and for peace of our country. Under such circumstances belligerent nations will be more inclined today to respect our neutral position and our rights as a neutral under international law than was done between 1914 and 1917. It would be the constant violations of our rights under international law by some of the nations engaged in war that could not be tolerated any longer with respect for ourselves that would bring about a change of our present status of a neutral nation. I can conceive of no nation now engaged in war that would want to violate our rights, with our present condition of preparedness, and to take any chance of our power and might being thrown into the war against them. To me the fact that we are prepared, thanks to the leadership of President Roosevelt, in the building up of our Navy, Army, and our air forces, is the best assurance that we have of peace, of not being drawn into this unfortunate and destructive conflict.

We must also remember that while there is no question as to where the sympathies of Americans lie, we are as united as we can be in our determination to stay out of this conflict. I can see no justifiable reason at this time for any feelings of alarm on the part of our mothers and fathers, and of our people, that the United States will be drawn into this conflict.

While we are aghast at the terrible slaughter of human beings in other lands, slaughter that has only started, as a nation at peace we must give consideration to the domestic problems that confront us.

We all remember the trying days of 1929 to 1933, when the destructive deflationary influences of the depression brought about foreclosure of homes and farms, bankruptcy of business, closing of thousands of banks with the loss of life's savings to hundreds of thousands of our people, 16,000,000 unemployed, with very little effort being made from the angle of the Federal Government to meet this serious situation.

Since then, under the humane leadership of President Roosevelt, we have seen courageous and constructive efforts made to solve our problems. Naturally, there have been honest misunderstanding and differences of opinion. That is to be expected. That is as it should be in a democracy. The passage of progressive legislation always meet with the honest but misguided opposition. That has been the history of the past as well as the present. It will be the history of the future. I can well remember some years ago when an effort was made in Massachusetts to pass a Workmen's Compensation Act and a minimum-wage law for women and children, that such humane legislation was opposed on the ground government had no right to legislate on such matters. And yet who would dare urge their repeal today?

We have been engaged in a war; a war against the destructive influences of a depression, and we have had to spend money, not to destroy but to save human lives. We have met our problems in the democratic way through the ballot box, and not through bullets and revolution. If we keep these facts in mind, we will obtain a better understanding of our problems of today and of our solution of them.

It is my main purpose today to discuss briefly a domestic question that I consider of great importance to all of us, the question of taxation and reemployment.

While our unemployment conditions of 1933 have been sharply reduced, nevertheless, unemployment is the main question that still confronts us. Under private business, with its profit system, which we believe in, the system of individual enterprise, we must ultimately look to business for the solution of this problem. We must also look to government to cooperate through the regulation of abuses that are harmful to our people and to our Government. That is as it should be in a democracy. Each have their responsibility. Each must work in his proper field, and in mutual, constructive, and tolerant cooperation with each other in attaining this necessary end.

In the world crisis that has developed, national unity and confidence are essential. There is every indication of the existence of this state of mind by both political parties, and by government and business.

During the last session of Congress important tax-relief and tax-revision legislation was passed, helpful to business and to our people, and which has already resulted in a better understanding existing between Government and business. As a result of the restoration of business confidence, expansion of business has occurred, and further employment has taken place. In the last session, Congress reduced the social security pay-roll taxes on employer and employee during the next 3 years over $1,500,000,000. Congress also passed a tax-revision bill the beneficial results of which have restored confidence in the ranks of business.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am a member, is now giving further study to tax legislation, and particularly to legislation that will act as an inducement for business expansion and reemployment through this means. There is much that can be done in that direction.

Without confidence few persons will make capital investments, or take a chance with their money in a venturesome business enterprise. It is confidence and an inducement for legitimate capital investment in productive enterprise that will put idle money and unemployed to work. When we get our idle money to work, we will then get our idle men and women to work. I have yet to meet a man or woman capable of working who does not prefer work to relief.

One of the deterrents, probably the greatest, to business expansion, is the high surtax brackets of the Federal Government. At present, our normal rate is 4 percent, but our surtax rates run up as high as 75 percent, making 70 percent in all, in some cases, and this does not include the State income taxes imposed by a State.

You can see from this statement that a deterrent exists to business expansion by new or venturesome capital. Taxes should be imposed upon the theory of capacity to pay, not upon the theory of deterring legitimate business expansion. I might say that this is not a condition alone of recent years. Both political parties are to blame for surtaxes that deter; both parties should join together in their reduction to a proper level. In normal times their effect upon business and employment is not so harmful as it is in days of business adversity, when we are slowly and painfully trying to return to business normalcy and recovery.

The best interests of the man and woman who is looking for a job calls for a sharp reduction of the present surtax rates. This and any other deterrents to business activity should be remedied as soon as possible. These rates should be reduced in the next Congress to a level that will induce idle money to work in productive enterprise, and not in tax-exempt securities, where they are doing no good toward meeting our problem of unemployment.

Such action will not only help meet our unemployment problem but as business expands, relief costs will be reduced, and at the same time, as experience of the past has shown, governmental revenues will be increased. Idle money is now invested in large amounts of tax-exempt securities. The high, and in some cases confiscatory, surtax rates are a contributing factor to this condition. Why not view the situation from a practical and realistic angle, one that is decidedly for our best interests?

I favor a sharp reduction of the unreasonably high surtax rates:

(1) Such action will help the unemployed, through

(2) Further restoring confidence in business and inducing the investment of new and venturesome capital, so necessary to business expansion.

(3) Such action will increase revenue for Government—Federal, State, and local—and at the same time reduce relief expenditures.

In 1913, when the Federal income-tax law was passed, the highest surtax rate was 6 percent. In 1916 it was increased to 13 percent; in 1917, during the World War, it was increased at its highest point to 63 percent, wartime taxes, which are different than peacetime taxes; in 1918 it was increased to 65 percent; in 1921 reduced to 50 percent; in 1924 reduced to 40 percent; in 1926 reduced to 20 percent; in 1932 increased to 55 percent; in 1934 increased to 59 percent; and in 1935 increased to 75 percent, which, with the normal rate of 4 percent, made 79 percent.

The average businessman wants, like you and I, to do what is right. Unscrupulous businessmen exist, but we must not judge all by the actions of a few. It is to our interests to see business expand. It is to our best interests to assist such expansion. Business means employment; expansion means new opportunities of employment. The last Congress passed legislation that will go a long way toward business confidence and business expansion. The next Congress should continue this constructive work of the last session.

While England Slept—Winston Churchill

A REVIEW BY HON. MARTIN F. SMITH, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted by my colleagues, I desire to review as fully as circumstances will permit one of the most startling and enlightening books which it has been my privilege to read in many years. I refer to the book entitled, "While England Slept," by the Right Honorable Winston S. Churchill, who is again serving his country as First Lord of the Admiralty, the same post which he filled with such distinction and success during the last World War. After having read and reread this remarkable book, and pondered over its contents, I have become convinced that it sets forth experiences of England and lessons to be derived therefrom which we in the United States would do well to heed and consider in due season. We are told by philosophers and sages that "Experience is a dear teacher." This is a truism which England is learning today and which may continue to be brought home to her with increasing force with the passing of the coming months and years. Wise thinkers have also pointed out how desirable and less costly it is to profit from the experiences of others, when we are in a position to do so. Therefore, I make bold to declare, in view of the tremendous and swiftly moving events which are transpiring in Europe today and the amazing realinement of world powers which is taking place, and the possible future threat and menace to the safety and security of our own country, that every Member of this House and the Senate, and every official of our Government, and as many of our citizens as can do so, obtain copies of this work and give it their serious study and consideration. We should immediately increase and strengthen our national defenses.

Winston Churchill has been properly called the Cato of England. Cato, as we recall, was the Roman whose oft-repeated phrase "Delanda Est Carthago" still lives in history. These burning words "Carthage must be destroyed," he kept shouting into the ears of his countrymen, but they gave no heed, and later learned how strong and formidable Carthage had become. Churchill's book consists principally of speeches which he delivered in the House of Commons during the period from 1933 to 1938.

Commencing in 1933, when Hitler became Chancellor, he calls attention to the fact that Germany is rearming, and down through the following years, in each year, time after time, he reiterates that Germany is growing stronger, stronger than England, and gradually gaining supremacy in the air, and that his beloved England is sleeping. In speech after speech he urges England to also prepare and strengthen her national defenses, especially her air defenses. But scant heed is paid to his warnings until the dark day arrives when England discovers to her consternation, upon finally becoming aroused from her long slumber, that Germany has built the most powerful war machine in the history of mankind and intends to use it to enforce her will upon England and France and the rest of the world.

In 1933 he said:

We may within a measurable period of time, in the lifetime of those who are here, if we are not in a proper state of security, be confronted on some occasion with a visit from an ambassador and may have to give an answer in a very few hours; and if that answer is not satisfactory, within the next few hours the crash of bombs exploding in London and cataracts of masonry and fire and smoke will apprise us of any inadequacy which has been permitted in our aerial defenses. We are vulnerable as we have never been before. I have often heard criticisms of the liberal government before the war. All I can say is that a far graver complaint rests upon those who now hold power if by any chance, against our wishes and against our hopes, trouble should come.

Not one of the lessons of the past has been learned, not one of them has been applied, and the situation is incomparably more dangerous. Then we had the navy and no air menace worth considering. Then the navy was the "sure shield" of Britain. As long as it was ready in time and at its stations we could say to any foreign government, "Well, what are you going to do about it? We will not declare ourselves. We will take our own time, we will work out our own course. We have no desire to hurt anyone, but we shall not be pressed or forced into any hasty action unless we think fit and well." We cannot say that now. This cursed, hellish invention and development of war from the air has revolutionized our position. We are not the same kind of country we used to be when we were an island, only 25 years ago. That is borne in upon me more than anything else. It is not merely a question of what we like and what we do not like, of ambitions and desires or rights and interests, but it is a question of safety and independence. That is involved now as never before.

It seems to me that there are three definite decisions which we should now take at once, and without any delay. The first affects the Army. We ought to begin the reorganization of our civil factories so that they can be turned over rapidly to war purposes. All over Europe that is being done, and to an amazing extent. This process is incomparably more efficient than anything which existed in the days of Prussian imperialism before the war. Every factory in those countries is prepared to turn over to the production of some material for the deplorable and melancholy business of slaughter. What have we done? There is not an hour to lose. Those things cannot be done in a moment. The process should be started and the very maximum of money that can be usefully spent will be spent from today on if we act with wisdom.

Then there is the question of the Navy. For the Navy, at any rate, we should regain freedom of design. We should get rid of this London Treaty which has crippled us in building the kind of ships we want, and has stopped the United States from building a great battleship which she probably needed and to which we should have not had the slightest reason to object. It has forced us to spend some of our hard-earned money—the little there is for these purposes—unwisely. It has forced us to take great ships which would have been of enormous utility in convoying vessels bearing food to these islands and to sink them in the ocean, when they had 10 to 15 years of useful life in them. We must regain our freedom at the earliest possible moment, and we shall be helped in doing so by the fact that another of the parties to that treaty (Japan) is resolved to regain her freedom, too.

Then there is the air. I cannot conceive how, in the present state of Europe we can delay in establishing the principle of having an air force at least as strong as that of any power that can get at us. I think that is a perfectly reasonable thing to do. It would only begin to put us back to the position in which we were brought up. We have lived under the shield of the Navy. To have an air force as strong as the air force of France or Germany, whichever is the stronger, ought to be the decision which Parliament should take, and which the national government should proclaim.

The responsibility of His Majesty's Government is grave indeed, and there is this which makes it all the graver: It is a responsibility which they have no difficulty in discharging if they choose. We are told they have to wait for public opinion, that they must bring that along and must be able to assure the good people here that everything is being done with the most pacific intentions—they must make a case. But nothing like that can stand between them and their responsibility to the Crown and Parliament for the safety and security of the country. The Government commands overwhelming majorities in both branches of the legislature. Nothing that they ask will be denied to them. They have only to make their proposals, and they will be supported in them. Let them not suppose that if they make proposals, with confidence and conviction, for the safety of the country, their countrymen will not support them. Why take so poor a view of the patriotic support which this Nation gives to those who it feels are doing their duty by it? I cannot feel that at the present time the Government is doing its duty in these matters of defense, and particularly in respect of the air. It seems to me that while we are becoming ever more entangled in the European situation, and while we are constantly endeavoring to weaken, relatively, our friends upon the continent of Europe, we nevertheless are left exposed to a mortal thrust, and are deprived of that old sense of security and independence upon which the civilization of our island has been built.

In the spring of 1934 Mr. Churchill warned his countrymen of the growing German air menace. He said:

To urge the preparation of defense is not to assert the imminence of war. On the contrary, if war were imminent, preparations for defense would be too late. I do not believe that war is imminent or that war is inevitable, but it seems very difficult to resist the conclusion that, if we do not begin forthwith to put ourselves in a position of security, it will soon be beyond our power to do so. What is the great new fact which has broken in upon us during the last 18 months? Germany is rearming. That is the great new fact which rivets the attention of every country in Europe—indeed, in the world—and which throws almost all other issues into the background. Germany is rearming—that mighty power which only a few years ago, within our own experience, fought almost the whole world and almost conquered. That mighty power is now equipping itself once again, 70,000,000 people, with the technical apparatus of modern war, and at the same time is instilling into the hearts of its youth and manhood the most extreme patriotic, nationalistic, and militaristic conceptions. According to what we hear, according to what we are told and what comes in from every quarter, though little is said about it in public, Germany has already a powerful, well-equipped army, with an excellent artillery, and an immense reserve of armed, trained men. The German munition factories are working practically under war conditions, and war material is flowing out from them and has been for the last 12 months in an ever-broadening flow. Much of this is undoubtedly in violation of the treaties which were signed. Germany is rearming on land; she is rearming also to some extent at sea; but what concerns us most of all is the rearmament of Germany in the air.

Let us, first of all, look at the dimensions of the danger as it affects this country at the present time. However calmly surveyed, the danger of an attack from the air must appear most formidable. I do not accept the sweeping claim of the extreme votaries of the air. I think that a great many statements which are made are calculated to frustrate the purpose of reasonable precautions by presenting the problem as if it were one which was insoluble. But, without accepting these claims, no one can doubt that a week or 10 days' intensive bombing attack upon London would be a very serious matter indeed.

The most dangerous form of air attack is the attack by incendiary bombs. Such an attack was planned by the Germans for the summer of 1918, I think for the time of the harvest moon. The argument in favor of such an attack was that if in any great city there are, we will say, 50 fire brigades, and you start simultaneously 100 fires and the wind is high, an almost incalculable conflagration may result. The reason why the Germans did not carry out that attack in 1918 must be stated. It was not at all that our air defense had become so excellent that we were protected against it. It was because the advance of the Allied armies, with the British Army in the van, already confronted the Imperial Government of Germany with the prospect of impending defeat, and they did not wish to incur the fury of retribution which would follow from such a dreadful act of power and terror as would have been involved in such a raid. Since those days the incendiary thermite bomb has become far more powerful than any that was used in the late war. It will, in fact, I am assured by persons who are acquainted with the science, go through a series of floors in any building, igniting each one practically simultaneously.

Not less formidable than these material effects are the reactions which will be produced upon the mind of the civil population. We must expect that under the pressure of continuous air attack upon London at least 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 people would be driven out into the open country around the metropolis. This vast mass of human beings, numerically far larger than any armies which have been fed and moved in war, without shelter and without food, without sanitation, and without special provision for the maintenance of order, would confront the government of the day with an administrative problem of the first magnitude, and would certainly absorb the energies of our small army and of our territorial force. Problems of this kind have never been faced before.

Then there are the docks of London and the estuary of the Thames. Everyone knows the dependence of this immense community, the most prosperous in the whole world, upon the eastern approaches by water. We studied it very carefully in the war, and I have not the slightest doubt that it has weighed very much on the minds of His Majesty's Government. It ought not to be supposed that the danger of an air attack, assuming that such a thing occurred, would necessarily be confined to London or the area around it. Birmingham and Sheffield and the great manufacturing towns might all be made the subject of special study, and every part of the country is equally interested in whatever measures of security can be taken to provide against such a peril. Not less dangerous than the attack upon the cities and the great working-class areas and upon the manufacturing centers would be that directed upon the dock-yards and the oil-fuel storage, which unless proper precautions are taken, as I trust they have been or are being taken, might actually paralyze the fleet, with consequences which no one can fail to perceive.

The danger which might confront us would expose us not only to hideous suffering, but even to mortal peril, by which I mean peril of actual conquest and subjugation. It is just as well to confront those facts while time remains to take proper measures to cope with them. I may say that all these possibilities are perfectly well known abroad, and no doubt every one of them has been made the subject of technical study.

I come to the more difficult and much more debatable question of what remedy can be applied. What measures can we take to provide against these very great perils, or at any rate to mitigate and minimize their effects? I do not think, to give a personal opinion, that it is much use planning to move our arsenals and factories over to the west side of the island. When one considers the enormous range of modern aeroplanes and the speeds at which they travel, 230 and 240 miles an hour, it is evident that every part of this small island is almost equally within range of attack. If vast sums of money were spent in displacing our arsenals from their present position, it might well be found that before this cumbrous process was completed improvements in airplanes would have more than discounted any advantage which might have been gained. The flying peril is not a peril from which one can fly. It is necessary to face it where we stand. We cannot possibly retreat. We cannot move London. We cannot move the vast population which is dependent on the estuary of the Thames. We cannot move the naval bases which are established along our southern coasts with the great hereditary naval populations living around them. No doubt where new factories were being created the factor of distance would be an important consideration, but in the main I am afraid we shall have to face this peril, whatever it may be, where we stand.

It would be a great mistake to neglect the scientific side of defense against aircraft attack—of purely defensive action against aircraft attack. Certainly nothing is more necessary, not only to this country but to all peace-loving and peace-interested powers in the world and to world civilization than that the good old earth should acquire some means or methods of destroying sky marauders. It is a matter which is of interest to us all that we should be able to meet this present menace which no generation before our own has faced, which shakes the very fabric and structure of all our civilized arrangements, and by spreading fear and danger far and wide makes it more and more difficult to preserve security and tranquillity in the minds of the different great states. If anything can be discovered that will put the earth on better terms against this novel form of attack—attack by spreading terror throughout civil populations—anything that can give us relief or aid in this matter will be a blessing to all.

The fact remains that when all is said and done as regards defensive methods, pending some new discovery, the only direct measure of defense upon a great scale is the certainty of being able to inflict simultaneously upon the enemy as great damage as he can inflict upon ourselves. Do not let us undervalue the efficacy of this procedure. It may well prove in practice—I admit you cannot prove it in theory—capable of giving complete immunity. If two powers show themselves equally capable of inflicting damage upon each other by some particular process of war, so that neither gains an advantage from its adoption and both suffer the most hideous reciprocal injuries, it is not only possible but it seems probable that neither will employ that means. What would they gain by it? Certainly a continental country like Germany, with large foreign armies on its frontiers, would be most unwise to run the risk of exposing itself to intensive bombing attacks from this island upon its military centers, its munition establishments, and its lines of communication, at a time when it was engaged or liable to be engaged by the armies of another first-class power.

We all speak under the uncertainty of the future which has so often baffled human foresight, but I believe that if we maintain at all times in the future an air power sufficient to enable us to inflict as much damage upon the most likely potential aggressor as he can inflict upon us, we may shield our people effectually in our own time from all those horrors which I have ventured to describe. If that be so, what are 50,000,000 pounds or 100,000,000 pounds raised by tax or by loan, compared with an immunity like that? Never has so fertile and so blessed an insurance been procurable so cheaply.

Observe the reverse of the picture. Assume that one country has a powerful air force and that the other has none, or that the other country has been so decisively beaten in the air that it has hardly any air force left. Then not only war machines but almost any flying machine that can be fitted to carry bombs will be employed to go over and to torture every part of the state and the community in that other country until it surrenders all that is asked from it. Absolute subjugation could in the end be enforced by such air attack, once a country had lost all power to fight in the air. Once complete ascendancy in the air had been secured, the victor power might almost at leisure pick out any aircraft factory and make an intensive attack upon it, and thus there could be no recovery. It is almost the only form of war that we have seen in the world in which complete predominance gives no opportunity of recovery. That is the odious new factor which has been forced upon our life in this twentieth century of Christian civilization.

For all these reasons we ought to decide now to maintain, at all costs, in the next 10 years, an air force substantially stronger than that of Germany, and that it should be considered a high crime against the State, whatever government is in power, if that force is allowed even for a month to fall substantially below the potential force which may be possessed by that country abroad.

I firmly believe that we may have it in our power to avert from this generation the supreme catastrophe of another war. The idea that we can intervene usefully in sustaining the peace of Europe while we ourselves are the most vulnerable of all—are the beggars, in fact—is one which cannot be held firmly by any man who looks at this in the faithful discharge of his duty.

I therefore assert, first, that Germany already, at this moment, has a military air force—that is to say, military squadrons with the necessary ground services, with the necessary reserves of trained personnel and material—which only await an order to assemble in full open combination, and that this illegal air force is rapidly approaching equality with our own. Secondly, by this time next year, if Germany executes her existing program without acceleration, and if we execute our existing program on the same basis which now lies before us without slowing down, and carry out the increases announced to Parliament in August last, the German military air force will this time next year be in fact at least as strong as our own and it may be even stronger. Thirdly, on the same basis—that is to say, both sides continuing with their existing programs as at present arranged—by the end of 1936—that is, 1 year further on and 2 years from now—the German military air force will be nearly 50 percent stronger, and in 1937 nearly double. All this is on the assumption, as I say, that there is no acceleration on the part of Germany and no slowing down on our part.

I come to civil aircraft which are capable of being used for military operations, the dual-purpose machines, as they are called in Germany. Here the story is very much worse for us. Germany has already between 200 and 300 machines of long range with great speed, 220 to 230 miles an hour, which are now ostensibly or actually employed in carrying mail bags and to some extent in carrying passengers; these machines can be converted into long-distance bombers of the highest efficiency in a few hours. All that is necessary is to remove some parts of the passenger accommodation and fit bomb racks in their place. These bomb racks, I told the House 5 months ago, are already made and kept in close proximity to the machines. That is the position at the present time. Germany has already between 200 and 300 of these machines. This time next year the number will have risen to at least 400 of these machines, which in the case of war will be a direct addition to the German military force.

Against that we, as I understand, can set nothing that is in the slightest degree comparable for military purposes. Our civil aviation is valueless for war purposes. Indeed, it has been the custom of ministers and others to boast of this fact as proof of our pacific intentions—if, indeed, proof were needed. Everyone knows that we have built for comfort and for safety and without the slightest contemplation of convertibility. Therefore, I assert—and I invite the Government to contradict the statement if they can—that by this time next year, taking both the military and the convertible civil aircraft into consideration, Germany will have a substantially stronger air force than Great Britain. Frankly, I do not think that the country has prepared itself to realize this fact. The conditions in 1936 and 1937, if the German convertible machines are added to the military machines, will be that the figures of the German air force will be far more adverse to this country than the purely military figures, which are bad enough, that I gave a few moments ago.

I come to ordinary civil aviation. It is difficult to compute the value of this for war, but it represents reserve pilots, mechanics, landing grounds, factories, airdromes, and a general familiarity with the flying art, which is, indirectly, of great importance. I think you may say that civil aviation bears the same relation to the fighting force as the mercantile marine has for so many generations borne to the Royal Navy. It is quite certain that the German pool of civil aviation, from which a military air force can be expanded and developed, is already far larger and far more closely related to military purposes than ours. The principle underlying German civil aviation and all the regulations and subventions point to their commercial machines being made efficient for rapid transformation into military or training machines.

Nor is Germany neglecting defensive preparations. Air-alarm arrangements, gas drills, and so forth, are taking place all over Germany as well as in many other parts of the continent of Europe. The House must not miss the bearing of this upon retaliation, upon the protection one can get from the power of retaliation, because if of two populations, both exposed to attacks of this kind, one has all kinds of protection which enable it to avoid loss of life, it is perfectly obvious how great will be the injury to the one unprepared. I know that the Government has been considering this matter, and I understand the reason why nothing has been done is the fear of frightening the population. It is much better to be frightened beforehand than when the danger actually comes to pass. It is much better to be frightened now than to be killed hereafter.

I am assured that many of the German airdromes are proof against air attack. They build concrete embankments around the shelters where the airplanes are stored, so that the place is quite safe; whereas you have only to look at the airdromes of our air force to see that they are vulnerable to any attack, and might be put out of action altogether. Anyone, however pacific he may be, must surely admit that there is no proper protection of our airdromes, I think that this is a primary and urgent duty of the government. I heard the debate the other day upon the devastated areas of our country. Many suggestions were made for remedying the situation. Suppose there is a great deal of work to do in earthing up these airdromes which will have to be constructed; why not give it to those unemployed people? Recruit twenty or thirty thousand men from those areas on good wages, and let them go about the country and do this necessary work, instead of being employed on relief work and so forth. Let them act, not as unemployed, but as a labor reserve, and let them go forward and revivify their own homes by sending back the wages which they earn by doing the most necessary and urgent of public tasks.

So far I have dealt with what, I believe, is the known, but beyond the known there is also the unknown. We hear from all sides of an air development in Germany far in excess of anything which I have stated today. As to that, all I would say is: Beware, Germany is a country fertile in military enterprises. The great Napoleon, in the years after Jena, was completely taken by surprise by the strength of the German Army which fought the war of liberation. Although he had officers all over the place, the German Army which fought in the campaign of Leipzig was three or four times as strong as he expected. Similarly, when the great war broke out the French general staff had no idea of the reserve divisions which would be brought immediately into the field. They expected to be confronted by 25 army corps; actually more than 40 came against them.

It is never advisable to underrate the military qualities of this remarkable and gifted people, nor to underrate the dangers that may be brought against us. I only say it does not follow that, in the figures I have given today, I am not erring grievously on the side of understatement. It sounds absurd to talk about 10,000 air planes but, after all, the resources of mass production are very great, and I remember when the war came to an end the organization over which I presided at the Ministry of Munitions was actually making airplanes at the rate of 24,000 a year, and planning a very much larger program for 1919. Of course, such numbers of airplanes could never be placed in the air at any one moment, nor a tenth of them, but the figures give an idea of the scale to which manufacture might easily rise if long preparations have been made beforehand, and a great program of production is launched.

In the beginning of 1935, Mr. Churchill referred to the increasing tension of the European situation caused by the rearmament of Germany, and said:

We are entering a period of serious anxieties. It is a period also of increasing tension. I will give the house two causes which, it seems to me, cannot possibly be overlooked. The first is this: German unemployment has been very largely cured by German preparations for war. Several millions of people, who when Herr Hitler was elected looked to him to provide them with work, have had work found for them, and that work has consisted in the preparation of armaments or the construction of military roads, or the removal of military factories to remote parts of Germany, and generally in all these processes. The great wheels of German industry have been set working, and they are turning out in endless succession every kind of weapon of war. To reverse or stop that would undoubtedly produce a convulsion in the internal domestic life of Germany and one most likely to cause embarrassment and reproach to the regime.

But there is another reason, and this second reason I will describe as the suddenness of a possibly decisive attack. The motorization and mechanization of large armies enable plans to be made by which hundreds, even thousands, of motor vehicles may be started in the night from different parts a hundred miles behind a frontier, and in the dawn may be found in possession of important parts of a defensive line.

Lastly, above all, there is the air, which introduces the most hideous factor of all, because airplanes can be dispatched on a mission of destruction or of provocation at almost any moment, and no mobilization need be made beforehand and no warning need be given. Therefore I say that on all these grounds we are bound to realize that we are entering upon a dark and dangerous valley through which we have to march for quite a long time unless some blessed relief comes to us through some agreement—for which there is hardly an exertion that we should not make.

We are entering upon a period of danger and of difficulty. And how do we stand in this long period of danger? There is no doubt that the Germans are superior to us in the air at the present time, and it is my belief that by the end of this year, unless their rate of construction and development is arrested by some agreement, they will be possibly three, and even four, times our strength. There is nothing to prevent such a result being reached if the Germans simply continue to maintain this great machine which they have set in motion and keep it revolving. They have created whatever it may be—1,000, 1,500—brand new aeroplanes in a comparatively short space of time; and the plant that brought that about can produce double and treble that number with great ease during the present year. I can only hope that they will not think it necessary to use it to that extent.

The Royal Air Force is to be raised to 1,500 first-line strength. By first-line strength I mean, and I imagine the Government means, aeroplanes formed in squadron with 50 percent reserve for pilots, with all the organization and everything that is necessary. To produce a program of that kind is the most formidable advance in British defense which has ever been made, and the committee should not be at all inclined to underrate the magnitude of the effort which the Government has now proposed to us. But I cannot help saying what a pity it is that we did not make this proposal 2 years ago, or even 1 year ago, because then we should have been in a position during this critical period to make an output similar to that which is being made in other countries.

Later in the spring of 1935 Mr. Churchill warned against the sense of false security and what he termed "serious deficiencies in all the defense services."

Speeches are made in the country by leading ministers saying that we have decided that we must have air equality, that we cannot accept anything less. We have not got it. We are already decidedly inferior to Germany, and, it must be said, of course to France. All that lies before us for many months is that this inferiority becomes more and more pronounced. In the autumn of this year, in November, when we are supposed to be 50 percent stronger, I hazard the melancholy prediction that we shall not be a third, possibly not a quarter, of the German air strength.

The German Army, already developed to 21 or 22 divisions, is working up to 36 as fast as it can—a division a month or something like that coming into full mobilizable capacity, tanks and the whole business. There is the Navy, and submarines have been made. Some are actually, I believe, practicing, training their crews in that difficult art. Let me tell the House that submarines can be manufactured very quickly. I remember in November 1914 arranging for Mr. Schwab, of Bethlehem, to make 20 submarines in what was then considered the incredibly short period of 6 months. Although these vessels had to be shifted from the United States to a Canadian dockyard for reasons of neutrality, it was possible to put sections on the railway trucks and to deliver them in time. How do you know what progress has been made in constructing such sections? The arms production has the first claim on the entire industry of Germany. The materials required for the production of armaments are the first charge on the German exchange. The whole of their industry is woven into an immediate readiness for war. You have a state of preparedness in German industry which was not attained by our industry until after the late war had gone on probably for 2 years

Besides this, there is tremendous propaganda, beginning with the schools and going right through every grade of youth to manhood, enforced by the most vigorous and harsh sanctions at every stage. All this is taking place. It is a very nice, comfortable world that we look out on here in this country. It has found an apt reflection in this debate today, but it has no relation whatever to what is going forward, and going forward steadily. Mark you, in time of peace, in peace politics, in ordinary matters of domestic affairs and class struggles, things blow over; but in these great matters of defense, and still more in the field of actual hostilities, the clouds do not roll by. If the necessary measures are not taken, they turn into thunderbolts and fall on your heads. The whole of this great process of psychological, moral, material, and technical mobilization of German war power is proceeding ceaselessly and with ever-increasing momentum.

It is easy, then, for Herr Hitler and the German Government to pursue a policy which I have heard described as "power diplomacy." What a transformation has taken place in the last 2 or 3 years. Two or three years ago it was considered sentimental, intellectual, liberally minded, to speak words of encouragement and compassion, and even to speak patronizingly of the German people, and to seek opportunities of making gestures to raise them up to more and greater equality with other countries. Now we see them with their grievances unredressed, with all their ambitions unsatisfied, continuing from strength to strength, and the whole world waits from week to week to hear what are the words which will fall from the heads of the German Nation. It is a woeful transformation which has taken place.

It would be folly for us to act as if we were swimming in a halcyon sea, as if nothing but balmy breezes and calm weather were to be expected and everything were working in the most agreeable fashion. By all means, follow your lines of hope and your paths of peace; but do not close your eyes to the fact that we are entering a corridor of deepening and darkening danger, and that we shall have to move along it for many months and possibly for years to come. While we are in this position, not only have we our own safety to consider but we have to consider also whether the parliamentary governments of western Europe, of which there are not many that function in the real sense of the word, are going to be able to afford to their subjects the same measure of physical security, to say nothing of national satisfaction, as is being afforded to the people of Germany by the dictatorship which has been established there. It is not only the supreme question of self-preservation that is involved in the realization of these dangers but also the human and the world cause of the preservation of free governments and of Western civilization against the ever-advancing forces of authority and despotism.

In midsummer of 1935 Mr. Churchill issued the following solemn warning and prophecy, which has since been fulfilled:

It has for some time been evident that Germany intends to embark upon a gigantic process of rearming by land, sea, and air, which will make her the most formidable military power in the whole world.

In December 1935, Mr. Churchill called attention to Germany's huge and enormous expenditures for preparation for war:

The scale on which foreign rearmament is proceeding is prodigious. Sometime ago I made a statement that Germany had spent, directly or indirectly, on armaments in the year 1935 upward of 800,000,000 pounds sterling. These figures startled people—at least they startled those people who are capable of taking in anything. I made that statement on good authority, and I have had the assistance of a financial authority who has worked out for me a long argument, much too long to quote in debate, showing how money has been secretly found for these purposes in the German finances. Broadly speaking, since the arrival of Herr Hitler in power 3 years ago the Germans have spent about 1,500,000,000 pounds sterling upon warlike preparations, directly or indirectly. The money has been raised by internal borrowing, and the revenues of Germany are already mortgaged 2 or 3 or possibly 4 years ahead. These figures are stupendous. Nothing like them has ever been seen in time of peace. Supposing they are exaggerated and that the figure which they spent in 1935 is only 600,000,000 pounds, we should still be confronted with facts which are unprecedented, unparalleled, and immeasurable in their consequences. It must also be remembered that in all probability money goes further in Germany than here. In face of these figures it surely seems unreasonable to blame His Majesty's Government for the modest sum for which they are asking in the estimates of the year and for the additional expenditure that will be required under the White Paper.

The fact that Germany is spending at this enormous rate upon armaments warns us not only of the magnitude of the danger, but possibly of its imminence. Expenditure on armaments means wages. The weekly livelihood for a very large proportion of the German people has now become dependent upon military preparations. Several millions of people in Germany who were unemployed have found employment in munitions manufacture or in the armed forces. On the other hand, the whole is supported by borrowed money on a large scale, and the financial situation has become such that this cannot go on indefinitely.

It cannot go on, but how can it stop? A terrible dilemma lies ahead of the most peacefully minded government in Germany. If they go on, there is bankruptcy; if they stop, there is tremendous unemployment. There is no chance of Germany finding additional substitute employment by trading with tropical colonies or by the peaceful conquest of our markets or those of other nations, which would in the immediate future in the slightest degree compensate for the curtailment of the vast munitions program on which the whole of Germany is now engaged. The German Government will have to choose at no distant date between an internal and an external catastrophe. Can we doubt what course the man at the head of Germany would be likely to choose?

It is easy to say this cannot go on, but what will happen when it stops? It is that which invests the situation with the most alarming urgency, with a kind of doomlike inevitableness which causes the most melancholy and alarming reflections. Germany, we are told, is not yet ready for war. Some say she is only half ready. Yet we see already that she is the only nation in Europe unafraid of war. If what we have seen in the last few days is the mood of a partially armed Germany, imagine what the tone will be when these colossal preparations are approaching their zenith, and when at the same time the limits of internal borrowing are already in sight.

Wars do not always wait until all the combatants are ready. Sometimes they come before any are ready, sometimes when one nation thinks itself less unready than another, or when one nation thinks it is likely to become, not stronger, but weaker as time passes. I fear, indeed, that there may be a culminating point in the history of Europe—the armaments history of Europe. I cannot tell when it will be reached. It will certainly be reached in the lifetime of the present Parliament. Let us never accept the theory of inevitable war; neither let us blind our eyes to the remorseless march of events.

There are two ways of preparing for the supply side of national defense. First, there is the accumulation of reserves of munitions of all kinds, which under modern conditions must be enormous, and the storing of them at great expense in magazines. That method was the only one which was known and practiced up to the Great War. There is a second method, the modern method, which is quite different. The whole industry of a country is prepared in time of peace for an alternative form of manufacture. Even the smallest workshops play their part in making components. Assembly centers are provided where the components can be fitted together. Thus the whole industry of the country is ready to turn over from peace to war conditions on the pressing of a button.

If we had only begun to act 3 years ago when the danger first made itself apparent, we should possess a reserve power today which could spring at any moment into full preparatory activity. Very little disturbance 3 years ago would have produced enormous reserves at the present time. I am well aware that something has been done. What is immediately needed is to bring it out into the open, to support it with ample money and staff, and to press it forward with the utmost vigor. Let me make myself clear. This does not mean any immediate increase in the deliveries. It does not mean immediately more ships, more munitions, more aeroplanes, but it does mean that you have an industry which, if the need ever arises, will not fail you, and will not interpose between you and your safety 2 horrible years of hiatus such as some of us in positions of responsibility went through in the Great War.

Here is the great disadvantage at which we stand compared with the German air industry. I am not mentioning this for the first time. I told the House 18 months ago of the extraordinary development of this method which was proceeding in Germany. There is not the slightest reason why it should not be set on foot here. It might have corrected to some extent the boom in aircraft shares. It would, anyhow, have given a reserve, if trouble comes, without which, although you may have a force at the beginning of the war, you will not have the power to keep that force in continuous activity, and it will come to an end after a few months. There is no doubt that this method of the widely distributed manufacture of components ought to be as much a part of the life of an industrial country in this present unhappy modern age as the practice of archery on the village green was in medieval England. It is the simplest and most primary method by which the freedom of a country can be assured, and it is the very heart of modern national defense.

The air power of any country cannot be measured by the number of airplanes nor by any of the particular definitions which are given. It must be measured by the number of airplanes which can be placed in the air simultaneously and maintained in action month after month. It is dependent not only on the number of organized squadrons but upon the expansive power of the industrial plant. A mere comparison of the number of machines possessed by the different countries, or the number of pilots trained, or even the number of squadrons formed, is no true guide. The organization of the airplane industry is not merely the production or the accumulation of so many thousands of airplanes by a given date. It must also insure the continuous flow of supplies from the date of the outbreak; and the supreme advantage which Germany has seized at the present time resides in this fact. They do not need to have any considerable reserve. They can feed the fighting squadrons direct from the factories and testing grounds, just as, in the last year of the war, when Mr. Lloyd George's great national shell factories and gun plants came into operation, we were able to feed the field armies direct from the factories without the need to accumulate supplies short of the actual fighting zone.

In these circumstances it is, I am sorry to say, not likely that we shall be able to overtake Germany and achieve air parity, as was promised, unless and until Germany herself decides to slow down or arrest her air expansion. Clearly a saturation point will be reached when those who are guiding Germany decide that they have given to air development all that portion of their resources which they can spare, having regard to all other needs. If, when that point is reached, we continue to develop our force, ultimately we shall achieve air parity, but that day will be fixed by decisions which will be taken in Germany and not by decisions which will be taken here, whatever we do.

Let us see what we are doing. It is a general impression that we are overhauling Germany now; that we started late, it is true, but are making up for lost time, and that every month our relative position will improve. That is a delusion. It is contrary to the truth this year, and probably for many months next year. I am not saying anything which is not known in every country in the world. These matters are thoroughly understood. Germany will be outstripping us more and more even if our new programs are accepted, and we shall be worse off at the end of this year than we are now in spite of all our exertions. The explanation of this unpleasant fact lies in the past.

Will there be time to put our defenses in order? We live in contact with the unknown, but we are not defenseless now. Will there be time to make these necessary efforts, or will the awful words "too late" be recorded? I will never despair that we can make ourselves secure. The Royal Navy, especially after the toning up which it has received, is unsurpassed in the world, and is still the main bulwark of our security; and even at this eleventh hour, if the right measures are taken and if the right spirit prevails in the British Nation and the British Empire, we may surround ourselves with other bulwarks equally sure which will protect us against whatever storms may blow.

I will continue and conclude this review in a separate and subsequent document.

While England Slept—Winston Churchill

A REVIEW BY HON. MARTIN F. SMITH, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have already placed in the RECORD the first part of my review of the timely and thought-provoking volume entitled "While England Slept," by the Right Honorable Winston S. Churchill, and herewith include the continuation and remainder thereof. I commend it to the thoughtful study and consideration of my colleagues in both the House and Senate and the American people for the lessons we in the United States may learn from the experiences of England. In the world of today we need to substantially increase and strengthen our national defenses.

In 1936, after Hitler had reoccupied the Rhineland and denounced the treaties of Versailles and Locarno, Mr. Churchill said:

When we think of the great power and influence which this country exercises we cannot look back with much pleasure on our foreign policy in the last 5 years. They certainly have been disastrous years. God forbid that I should lay on the Government of my own country the charge of responsibility for the evils which have come upon the world in that period. I would not do such a thing, but certainly in that period we have seen the most depressing and alarming change in the outlook of mankind which has ever taken place in so short a period. Five years ago all felt safe; 5 years ago all were looking forward to peace, to a period in which mankind would rejoice in the treasures which science can spread to all classes if conditions of peace and justice prevail. Five years ago to talk of war would have been regarded not only as a folly and a crime but almost as a sign of lunacy. Look at the difference in our position now. We find ourselves compelled once again to face the hateful problems and ordeals which those of us who worked and toiled in the last struggle hoped were gone forever.

The violation of the Rhineland is serious from the point of view of the menace to which it exposes Holland, Belgium, and France. It is also serious because when the Rhineland is fortified—and I listened with apprehension to what the Secretary of State said about the Germans declining even to refrain from entrenching themselves during the period of negotiations; I listened with sorrow to that—when there is there a line of fortifications, as I suppose there will be in a very short time, it will produce reactions on the European situation. It will be a barrier across Germany's front door which will leave her free to sally out eastward and southward by the other doors.

What is the real problem, the real peril? It is not reoccupation of the Rhineland, but this enormous process of the rearmament of Germany. There is the peril. I confess that I have been occupied with this idea of the great wheels revolving and the great hammers descending day and night in Germany, making the whole industry of that country an arsenal, welding the whole of its population into one disciplined war machine. There is the problem that lies before you. There is what is bringing war nearer. This Rhineland episode is but a step, a stage, an incident in this process. There is fear in every country, all around. Even here, in this island, with some protection from distance, there is fear, deep fear. What is the fear, and what is the question which arises from that fear? It is, How are we going to stop this war which seems to be moving toward us in so many ways?

In 1936, after the general staffs of Britain, France, and Belgium had conferred on cooperation in the event of unprovoked aggression by Germany, Mr. Churchill again stressed the magnitude of Germany's expenditures for rearmament:

From the end of March 1933 to the end of June 1935 the official publications of the German Government show an increase in the public debt to a minimum figure of over 7 milliards of reichsmarks, to which must be added the yield from increased taxation in that period, which has been used for Government expenditures, and which amount to 5 milliards. Therefore the minimum expenditure for 2½ years above the preceding budget expenditure is 12 milliards, or £1,000,000,000 at the official rate of exchange. That is all that is acknowledged, but there are two other lines of approach which suggest that that figure is far below the actual fact. A veto prevails in Germany on all expansion of private plant for purely economic purposes. The capital expenditure of Germany, other than for residential buildings, may therefore be regarded as almost exclusively devoted to warlike preparations, in which, of course, I include the preparation of those great military roads where four columns of troops can march abreast, which may play a greater part in a future war than the fortifications that are being built.

Again, taking the figures from German official sources, the expenditure on capital account, deducting the expenditure on residential buildings, has been as follows: In 1933, nearly 5,000,000,000 marks; in 1934, nearly 8,000,000,000; and in 1935, nearly 11,000,000,000—a total of 24,000,000,000, or, roughly, £2,000,000,000. I am taking the rate of exchange at 12 marks to the pound, and I am making no allowance for the fact that armament production is much cheaper in Germany than it is here. (An honorable member: "Why?") Wages are much lower. Look at these figures—5, 8, and 11 for the 3 years. They give you exactly the kind of progression which a properly developing munitions industry would make.

There is a second line of approach to these figures. There is a marked increase in the German national income. Again I take this from official German figures. The increase in the national income has not gone into consumption. Wages have remained unchanged and the cost of living, if anything, has risen. Therefore, the increase in the national income has gone into constructional work, the bulk of which is represented, directly or indirectly, by armaments. Look at the increase in the figures of the German national income—in 1933, 1,200,000,000 reichsmarks; in 1934, 7,000,000,000; and in 1935, 11,400,000,000—practically the same progression as I showed in the previous calculation. That is exactly what you would expect from an industry getting on its feet, opening out, and finally coming into full blast. These figures make a total, since Herr Hitler came into power, of nearly 20,000,000,000 reichsmarks. The year 1935 shows on this calculation, as well as on the previous one, the same figure of over 11,000,000,000 marks, which is considerably over the £800,000,000 which I have for some months past been bruiting about the country.

There are other means by which this progress can be checked. There is the number of persons employed in the armament and cognate industries and in military forces. There has also been an elaborate investigation into the number of stamps which have been affixed to the 3 months' bills which are used for effecting this extraordinary process of internal inflation, but that is too complicated to trouble the committee now. They will see from what I have said that there is very considerable justification for the startling statement that I have advanced, and to which I most strictly adhere, that £800,000,000 was spent on warlike preparations in 1935 alone. Does the Government contradict these figures? Unless they are to contradict them specifically and can show reasons why they are wrong, I think my statement might be allowed to stand, and might be taken into the general currency of thought on this topic.

The Chancelor of the Exchequer used an argument about how expenditure would rise to a peak, then fall a little, and then remain level, but at a much greater height than at the present time. That is not the future as I foresee it. I cannot believe that, after armaments in all countries have reached a towering height, they will settle down and continue at a hideous level far above the present level, which is already crushing, and that that will be for many years a normal feature of the world's routine. Whatever happens, I do not believe that will. Europe is approaching a climax. I believe that climax will be reached in the lifetime of the present Parliament. Either there will be a melting of hearts and a joining of hands between great nations which will set out upon realizing the glorious age of prosperity and freedom which is now within the grasp of millions of toiling people, or there will be an explosion and a catastrophe, the course of which no imagination can measure, and beyond which no human eye see. I believe also that a strongly armed Britain, resolutely and valiantly led, seeking peace but ready to run risks for peace, may conceivably turn the scale between the blessing and the cursing of mankind.

In another speech the same year Mr. Churchill renewed vigorously his proposal previously made for the formation of a ministry of munitions or supply. He said:

I now turn to the main issue: What is our own position in the matter of defense? We do not hesitate to give the law to nations and to arraign delinquent peoples at our bar. How stands our own defense? Before and during the general election the Prime Minister freely exposed its deficiencies. Oddly enough, he dwelt particularly on the deficiencies in the Navy, which appears to be the only service which this year and probably next year is not unequal to its immediate responsibilities. But, then, toward the end of the election, he was at pains to say: "I give you my word there will be no great armaments." Frankly, I do not understand that statement in the circumstances in which we are or in the context of our thought and discussions. Is not doubling or trebling the air force a great armament? Is not trying to have an air force—trying vainly, I admit—equal to that of Germany or France a great armament? What is the point of saying we are not to have great armaments? There is only one explanation, and that is that these great armaments will exist only on paper, and that it is not in our power for a very long time to obtain the deliveries which would turn them into realities. There followed the "white paper," setting forth in extremely vague terms the plan for a very large rearmament. As a paper plan, I have nothing to say against it. That was 3 months ago.

Let me draw attention to the rapid passage of time. Three months passed in a flash. All the time all over the world events are moving. Three months and—Hullo, another defense debate. Three months ago I ventured to say that it was no use asking the Government for a larger program, because, except, perhaps, in the building of destroyers for the Navy, where work could be placed out in smaller yards, they would not be able to execute the programs which they had already declared and on which they were engaged. The limited sums of money which the departments are able to spend are an unfailing telltale of the truth that they are not able to carry out this process of rearmament which they desire and which they have the utmost need to execute. I defy anyone to rise from the treasury bench and say that the programs to which they have set their hands are going to be carried out punctually to the dates which have been assigned to them.

Three months have passed since I urged upon the Government the formation of ministry of munitions or supply. We are now told that that may be necessary in the future, but it is a dividing line; so said my right honorable friend, between the Government and me—or it is one of the dividing lines—that I advocate the creation of a ministry of munitions, and that they do not think it is time to undertake it. It ought to have been created a year ago. No doubt it will be created 6 months or a year hence. What has been gained by the past delay? What will be gained by the further delay? Have things got any better since this time last year? Has the Government any assurance that they will get better by this time next year? Everything has become worse as every month has passed. Show me a single quarter in the world where there is the slightest improvement. Show me a single great new fact which should give us reassurance.

The rearmament of Germany is proceeding upon a colossal scale and at desperate breakneck speed. All Europe is arming and preparing the whole of industry for war. At the other end of the world Japan is fiercely arming and is in a state of the highest martial exaltation. All the old, evil factors which were apparent a year ago, all the old perils, are now presented in an aggravated form. The only new factor, the only great new prime factor, is the grave antagonism which has grown up between us and Italy. Can anyone deny that everything is worse, from the point of peace and safety, than it was this time last year? Three months ago there were many complaints in the defense debate about the vagueness of the "white paper." Why did the committee suppose that it was vague? I imagine it was vague because the Government had not the slightest idea of how and when it could be executed. But in this matter time is the supreme condition. You may draw up a program to be executed in 3 years. You may feel sure and tell Parliament that it will make us reasonably safe. So it might, if it could be executed in that time and if nothing else happened abroad before that time. But will anyone on the treasury bench say that punctuality can be achieved? Already we hear that the 3 years may be 4 or 5 years, etc. What does that mean? Of course it means that the program is already hopelessly in arrears; that deliveries are not coming to hand; that what the Government themselves think necessary for the safety of the country to be accomplished in no more than 3 years can only be accomplished in 5. Therefore, we shall not be provided with the safety which we need, because everything turns on time, and because, to use Burke's famous phrase, "Every single set of circumstances involves every other set." Where will others be, then, if you are late? What, for instance, will be the strength of the Germany Army or the German air force in 1938 or 1939?

Already, in the last Parliament, we had confessions of failure and of miscalculations about the air. My right honorable and learned friend has this afternoon revealed to us the terrible hiatus which must intervene before machine tools and gages can be supplied. Suppose, 3 years ago, when the Government were first warned, they had said, "We will, at any rate, begin to put our industries into a state of preparation. No one could say that is provocative." Ordering battleships, etc., might have disturbed your disarmament policy, but to make the simple provision of getting these indirect, but very vital, implements could not have been called provocative. "We will make the lay-outs of the factories. We will see about the precision tools. We will have everything ready, so that, if our well-meant example of disarming should not be followed by other countries, and if we pursue it to the last moment and then find ourselves in a difficult position, we shall, at any rate, have got ready underneath the means of repairing the risk that we have run. We can begin at once to rearm." If only 2 years ago the measures which have now been taken had been put into operation, we should be getting very considerable supplies. You would have your future in your own hands. You would be the masters of the events and not, perhaps, the victim. Even a year ago, when there was no dispute about the danger, when it was common ground among all parties, and when the Prime Minister admitted that mistakes had been made—even then there was just time to do a lot. Then "why stand we in jeopardy every hour"? Why, still, now at the eleventh hour, are we unable to decide on measures equal to the emergency? Is there no grip, no driving force, no mental energy, no power of decision or design? We are told that we must not interfere with the normal course of trade, that we must not alarm the easygoing voter and the public. How thin and paltry these arguments will sound if we are caught a year or two hence, fat, opulent, free spoken, and defenseless! I do not ask that war conditions should be established in order to execute these programs. All I ask is that these programs to which the Government have attached their confidence shall be punctually executed, whatever may be the disturbance of our daily life.

Later in the year he again referred to Germany's huge expenditures far exceeding England's, and said:

Last autumn I made a statement about Germany spending at the rate of the equivalent of £800,000,000 directly and indirectly upon warlike purposes, including strategic roads. I have often repeated the statement and it has often been challenged. I gave a very full account of the methods of calculation that I had employed. Now the Chancelor of the Exchequer at question time has given an answer, with the full knowledge of the Government, which in no way contradicts what I said, and anyone who reads the answer carefully will see that it is a complete acceptance of what I have said. I think, therefore, the committee may take it that £800,000,000 was the equivalent of German expenditure in 1935, and, as that rate is continuing, perhaps it may be £900,000,000 in the current year.

Now, there are the figures by which we can judge the scale of our own efforts. In January there was some talk of spending £300,000,000 apart from normal upkeep. Of course, it was absurd to suggest that any such sum could be spent this year. The Government were quite right not to tie themselves to spending any particular figure. I remember that I warned the House that I doubted if they could spend more than £50,000,000 additional to the regular estimates. Now, supplementary estimates have been presented of £30,000,000, but that does not do justice to the Government's effort. There is a good deal of abnormal expenditure in the ordinary services this year, and it is fairer to compare with 1934, and therefore I take it that there is an increase of £75,000,000 toward making up deficiencies and toward expansion, above the 1934 expenditure.

We must compare these estimates with the German expenditure. I make full allowance for the fact that we do not need to keep a great continental army in this country. That makes the comparison between the two countries not at all exact. Nevertheless, it is of value to compare them for the purpose of seeing the scale on which the events are proceeding. If you want to compare them, you should first deduct from the £800,000,000 at least £300,000,000 for the upkeep in 1936 of the German forces. That leaves £500,000,000 for extraordinary expenditure and expansion for something very serious which may happen quite soon. This £500,000,000 compares with our £75,000,000. That gives us the scale.

My anxieties are not at all diminished by anything I have heard today. On the contrary, I feel that they are deepened and aggravated. Everyone is going away on holiday, and when we come back we shall all be looking forward to the coronation, but do not forget that all the time those remorseless hammers of which General Goering spoke are descending night and day in Germany, and that the most warlike and, in many ways, the most efficient people in Europe are becoming welded into a tremendous fighting machine equipped with the fearful agencies of modern science. That is a spectacle which I will not say is one that has never before existed, because it would be meaningless; it would fall utterly short of the facts. All I will say is that it is a machine upon which £800,000,000 or £900,000,000 are being spent for the second year in succession.

In December 1936 Mr. Churchill again called attention to lack of preparation in these words:

The Army lacks almost every weapon which is required for the latest form of modern war. Where are the antitank guns, where are the short-distance wireless sets, where are the field antiaircraft guns against low-flying armored airplanes? We want to know how it is that this country, with its enormous motoring and motorbicycling public, is not able to have strong mechanized divisions, both Regular and Territorial. Surely, when so much of the interest of our youth is moving in those mechanical channels, and when the horse is receding with the days of chivalry into the past, it ought to be possible to create an army of the size we want fully up to strength and mechanized to the highest degree.

Look at the Tank Corps. The tank was a British invention. This idea, which has revolutionized the conditions of modern war, was a British idea forced on the War Office by outsiders. Let me say they would have just as hard work today to force a new idea on it. I speak from what I know. During the war we had almost a monopoly, let alone the leadership, in tank warfare, and for several years afterward we held the foremost place. To England all eyes were turned. All that has gone now. Nothing has been done to equip the Tank Corps with new machines. The medium tank which they possess, which in its day was the best in the world, is now long obsolete. Not only in number—for there we have never tried to compete with other countries—but in quality these British weapons are now surpassed by those of Germany, Russia, Italy, and the United States. All the shell plants and gun plants in the Army, apart from the very small peacetime services, are in an elementary stage. A very long period must intervene before any effectual flow of munitions can be expected which should induce us to impinge on the normal course of trade. If we go on like this, and I do not see what power can prevent us from going on like this, some day there may be a terrible reckoning, and those who take the responsibility so entirely upon themselves are either of a hardy disposition or they are incapable of foreseeing the possibilities which may arise.

Now I come to the greatest matter of all, the air.

Parliament was promised a total of 71 new squadrons, making a total of 124 squadrons in the home-defense force, by March 31, 1937. This was thought to be the minimum compatible with our safety. At the end of the last financial year our strength was 53 squadrons, including auxiliary squadrons. Therefore, in the 32 weeks which have passed since the financial year began we have added 28 squadrons—that is to say, less than 1 new squadron each week. In order to make the progress which Parliament was promised, in order to maintain the program which was put forward as the minimum, we shall have to add 43 squadrons in the remaining 20 weeks, or over 2 squadrons a week. The rate at which new squadrons will have to be formed from now till the end of March will have to be nearly three times as fast as hitherto.

What is the comparable German strength? I am not going to give an estimate and say that the Germans have not got more than a certain number, but I will take it upon myself to say they most certainly at this moment have not got less than a certain number. Most certainly they have not got less than 1,500 first-line airplanes, comprised in lot less than 130 or 140 squadrons, including auxiliary squadrons. It must also be remembered that Germany has not got in its squadrons any machine the design and construction of which is more than 3 years old. It must also be remembered that Germany has specialized in long-distance bombing airplanes and that her preponderance in that respect is far greater than any of these figures would suggest.

We were promised most solemnly by the Government that air parity with Germany would be maintained by the home-defense forces. At the present time, putting everything at the very best, we are, upon the figures given by the Minister for the Coordination of Defense, only about two-thirds as strong as the German air force, assuming that I am not very much understating their present strength.

In the spring of 1938, following the annexation of Austria by Germany, Mr. Churchill said:

The gravity of the event of the 11th of March cannot be exaggerated. Europe is confronted with a program of aggression, nicely calculated and timed, unfolding stage by stage, and there is only one choice open not only to us but to other countries who are unfortunately concerned—either to submit, like Austria, or else to take effective measures while time remains to ward off the danger and, if it cannot be warded off, to cope with it. Resistance will be hard, yet I am persuaded that it is to this conclusion of resistance to overweening encroachment that His Majesty's Government will come, and the House of Commons will certainly sustain them in playing a great part in the effort to preserve the peace of Europe, and, if it cannot be preserved, to preserve the freedom of the nations of Europe. If we were to delay, if we were to go on waiting upon events for a considerable period, how much should we throw away of resources which are now available for our security and for the maintenance of peace? How many friends would be alienated, how many potential allies should we see go, one by one, down the grisly gulf, how many times would bluff succeed, until behind bluff, ever-gathering forces had accumulated reality? Where shall we be 2 years hence, for instance, when the German Army will certainly be much larger than the French Army, and when all the small nations will have fled from Geneva to pay homage to the ever-waxing power of the Nazi system, and to make the best terms they can for themselves?

We cannot leave the Austrian question where it is.

The public mind has been concentrated upon the moral and sentimental aspects of the Nazi conquest of Austria—a small country brutally struck down, its government scattered to the winds, the oppression of the Nazi party doctrine imposed upon a Catholic population and upon the working classes of Austria and of Vienna, the hard ill-usage of persecution which indeed will ensue—which is probably in progress at the moment—of those who this time last week were exercising their undoubted political rights, discharging their duties faithfully to their own country. All this we see very clearly, but there are some things which I have not seen brought out in the public press and which do not seem to be present in the public mind, and they are practical considerations of the utmost significance.

Vienna is the center of all the communications of all the countries which formed the old Austro-Hungarian Empire and of all the countries lying to the southeast of Europe. A long stretch of the Danube is now in German hands. This mastery of Vienna gives to Nazi Germany military and economic control of the whole of the communications of southeastern Europe by road, by river, and by rail. What is the effect of it upon what is called the balance of power, such as it is, and upon what is called the Little Entente? I must say a word about this group of powers called the Little Entente. Taken singly, the three countries of the Little Entente may be called powers of the second rank, but they are very vigorous states, and united they are a great power. They have hitherto been, and are still, united by the closest military agreement. Together they make the complement of a great power and of the military machinery of a great power. Rumania has the oil; Yugoslavia has the minerals and raw materials. Both have large armies; both are mainly supplied with munitions from Czechoslovakia. To English ears the name of Czechoslovakia sounds outlandish. No doubt they are only a small democratic state; no doubt they have an army only two or three times as large as ours; no doubt they have a munitions supply only three times as great as that of Italy—but still they are a virile people; they have their treaty rights, they have a line of fortresses, and they have a strongly manifested will to live freely.

Czechoslovakia is at this moment isolated, both in the economic and in the military sense. Her trade outlet through Hamburg, which is based upon the peace treaty, can, of course, be closed at any moment. Now her communications by rail and river to the south, and after the south to the southeast, are liable to be severed at any moment. Her trade may be subjected to tolls of an absolutely strangling character. Here is a country which was once the greatest manufacturing area in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire. It is cut off now, or may be cut off at once unless, out of these discussions which must follow, arrangements are made securing the communications of Czechoslovakia. She may be cut off at once from the sources of her raw material in Yugoslavia and from the natural markets which she has established there. The economic life of this small state may be practically destroyed as a result of the act of violence which was perpetrated last Friday night. A wedge has been driven into the heart of what is called the Little Entente, this group of countries which have as much right to live in Europe unmolested as any of us have the right to live unmolested in our native land.

It would be too complicated to pursue the economic, military, and material reactions, apart from moral sentiments altogether, into the other countries. It would take too long, but the effects of what has happened now upon Rumania, upon Hungary, upon Bulgaria, upon Turkey, must be the subject of the closest possible study, not only by His Majesty's Government, but by all who aspire to take part in the public discussion of these matters. By what has happened it is not too much to say that Nazi Germany, in its present mood, if matters are left as they are, is in a position to dominate the whole of southeast Europe. Over an area inhabited perhaps by 200,000,000 of people, Nazidom and all that it involves is moving on to absolute control. Therefore, I venture to submit to the House that this Nazi conquest of Austria cannot remain where it is, and that a patient, determined, persevering discussion of it ought to take place and to be pushed forward, first of all, no doubt, through the chanceries and by the diplomatic channels, but also and ultimately it should be pushed forward in the natural place for such discussions at Geneva—under the League of Nations. We are not in a position to say tonight, "The past is the past." We cannot say, "The past is the past," without surrendering the future.

I affirm that the Government should express in the strongest terms our adherence to the Covenant of the League of Nations and our resolve to procure by international action the reign of law in Europe. I agree entirely with what has been said by the leaders of the two opposition parties upon that subject; and I was extremely glad to notice that at the beginning and in the very forefront of his speech the Prime Minister referred to the League of Nations and made that one of the bases of our right to intervene and to be consulted upon affairs in Central Europe. The matter has an importance in this country. There must be a moral basis for British rearmament and British foreign policy. We must have that basis if we are to unite and inspire our people and procure their wholehearted action, and if we are to stir the English-speaking people throughout the world.

Our affairs have come to such a pass that there is no escape without running risks. On every ground of prudence as well as of duty I urge His Majesty's Government to proclaim a renewed, revivified, unflinching adherence to the Covenant of the League of Nations. What is there ridiculous about collective security? The only thing that is ridiculous about it is that we have not got it. Let us see whether we cannot do something to procure a strong element of collective security for ourselves and for others. We have been urged to make common cause in self-defense with the French Republic. What is that but the beginning of collective security? I agree with that. Not so lightly will the two great liberal democracies of the west be challenged, and not so easily, if challenged, will they be subjugated. That is the beginning of collective security. But why stop there? Why be edged and pushed farther down the slope in a disorderly expostulating crowd of embarrassed states? Why not make a stand while there is still a good company of united, very powerful countries that share our dangers and aspirations? Why should we delay until we are confronted with a general landslide of those small countries passing over, because they have no other choice, to the overwhelming power of the Nazi regime?

If a number of states were assembled around Great Britain and France in a solemn treaty for mutual defense against aggression; if they had their forces marshalled in what you may call a grand alliance; if they had their staff arrangements concerted; if all this rested, as it can honorably rest, upon the Covenant of the League of Nations, in pursuance of all the purposes and ideals of the League of Nations; if that were sustained, as it would be, by the moral sense of the world; and if it were done in the year 1938—and, believe me, it may be the last chance there will be for doing it—then I say that you might even now arrest this approaching war. Then perhaps the curse which overhangs Europe would pass away. Then perhaps the ferocious passions which now grip a great people would turn inwards and not outwards in an internal rather than an external explosion, and mankind would be spared the deadly ordeal toward which we have been sagging and sliding month by month, I have ventured to indicate a positive conception, a practical and realistic conception, and one which I am convinced will unite all the forces of this country without whose help your armies cannot be filled or your munitions made. Before we cast away this hope, this cause, and this plan, which I do not at all disguise has an element of risk, let those who wish to reject it ponder well and earnestly upon what will happen to us if, when all else has been thrown to the wolves, we are left to face our fate alone.

In the last speech contained in the book, which he also delivered in the spring of 1938, Mr. Churchill uttered his last solemn warning:

A country like ours, possessed of immense territory and wealth, whose defenses have been neglected, cannot avoid war by dilating upon its horrors, or even by a continuous display of pacific qualities, or by ignoring the fate of the victims of aggression elsewhere. War will be avoided, in present circumstances, only by the accumulation of deterrents against the aggressor. If our defenses are weak, we must seek allies, and, of course, if we seek allies, alliances involve commitments. But the increase of commitments may be justified if it is followed by a still greater increase of deterrents against aggression.

I was very glad to hear the Prime Minister reaffirm in such direct terms our arrangements for mutual defense with the French Republic. Evidently they amount to a defensive alliance. Why not say so? Why not make it effective by a military convention of the most detailed character? Are we once again to have all the disadvantages of an alliance without its advantages, and to have commitments without full security? Great Britain and France have to stand together for mutual protection. Why should not the conditions be worked out precisely and the broad facts made public? Everyone knows, for instance, that our air force is tripled in deterrent effectiveness if it operates from the French bases, and, as I pointed out in the House 3 weeks ago, the fact that an attack upon this country would bring the attacker into conflict with the French Army is another great security to us here. We are obliged in return to go to the aid of France, and hitherto we have always been better than our word.

Here, then, is the great security for the two countries. Do not conceal it. Proclaim it, implement it, work it out in thorough detail. Treat the defensive problems of the two countries as if they were one. Then you will have a real deterrent against unprovoked aggression, and if the deterrent fails to deter, you will have a highly organized method of coping with the aggressor. The present rulers of Germany will hesitate long before they attack the British Empire and the French Republic if those are woven together for defense purposes into one very powerful unit. Having gone so far, there is no safe halting place short of an open defensive alliance with France, not with loose obligations, but with defined obligations on both sides and complete interstaff arrangements. Even an isolationist would, I think, go so far as to say, "If we have to mix ourselves up with the Continent, let us, at any rate, get the maximum of safety from our commitments."

I must say that I myself have not felt during this crisis that there is an immediate danger of a major land war breaking out over Czechoslovakia. I know it is very rash to make such a statement, but when there is so much natural, but misdirected alarm in the country, now on one point and now on another, one must run some risks in stating one's honest opinions. At any rate, that is the assumption on which I base my argument this afternoon, and I will give my reasons to the House. The first reason is that, in the opinion of many good judges, Germany is not ready this year for such an ordeal as a major land war. The second reason carries more conviction to me, because obviously the first is based upon facts which one cannot measure and secrets which one cannot probe. It is that I cannot see that it would be to the interest of the rulers of Germany to provoke such a war.

Are they not getting all they want without? Are they not achieving a long succession of most important objectives without firing a single shot? Is there any limit to the economic and political pressure which, without actually using military force, Germany will be able to bring to bear upon this unhappy state? She can be convulsed politically, she can be strangled economically, she is practically surrounded by superior forces, and unless something is done to mitigate the pressure of circumstances, she will be forced to make continuous surrenders, far beyond the bounds of what any impartial tribunal would consider just or right, until finally her sovereignty, her independence, her integrity, have been destroyed. Why, then, should the rulers of Germany strike a military blow? Why should they incur the risk of a major war?

Moreover, I think it is to be considered that there are other, even more tempting lines of advance open to Germany's ambitions. A serious disturbance among the Hungarian population in the Rumanian province of Transylvania might offer a pretext for the entry of German troops, at a Hungarian invitation or without it. Then all the possibilities of the oil and food of Rumania would be open. Here, again, force may be voiced and virtual annexation may be veiled in the guise of a compulsory alliance. In the meantime the control of Vienna enables the economic fortunes of all the states of the Danubian Basin to be manipulated, exploited, and controlled so as to favor German designs, and for the benefit of German finance, trade, and arms. Why, then, should Germany go to the one place where she would encounter the veto of France, and of Russia, which has also made definite assurances? I do not think the government would have run very much risk if they had added the full force of Great Britain to the French declaration about Czechoslovakia. They would not greatly have increased their commitments and they would have made assurance doubly sure.

But the story of this year is not ended at Czechoslovakia. It is not ended this month. The might behind the German dictator increases daily. His appetite may grow with eating. The forces of law and freedom have for a long time known nothing but rebuffs, failures, and humiliations. Their influence would be immensely increased by any signs of concerted action and initiative and combination. The fact that Britain and France combined together at such a moment in such a cause would give them the strength and authority that they need in order to convince wavering states that they might find a good company of determined people to whom they might join themselves upon the basis of the covenant and in accordance with its principles. On the morrow of such a proof of unity as could be given between Great Britain and France we might be able to make such an arrangement, or begin to make it, for the effective fulfillment of the covenant. We might have a group of powers, as it were mandatories of the league, who would be the guardians of civilization, and once this was set up strong and real it would liberate us, at least over a long period, from the torments of uncertainty and anxiety which we now have to endure. Joint action on this occasion would make easier and safer the problem of dealing with the next occasion. If successful, it would certainly pave the way to more effective joint action in the enforcement of the nonintervention policy in Spain. Nations that have joined together to meet one particular emergency may well find, when they look around, that they have assembled forces sufficient to deal with other emergencies not yet before us, and thus we may gather an ever-growing company, ranged under standards of law and justice, submitting themselves to principles that they are ready to enforce; and thus, by military and moral means combined, we may once more regain the ascendant and the initiative for the free peoples of the world and throughout the Empire.

Do not let anyone suppose that this is a mere question of hardening one's heart and keeping a stiff upper lip, and standing by to see Czechoslovakia poleaxed or tortured as Austria has been. Something more than that particular kind of fortitude will be needed from us. It is not only Czechoslovakia that will suffer. Look at the states of the Danube Basin. First and foremost there is Yugoslavia. That is a most powerful and virile state, three-quarters of whose martial people are undoubtedly in the fullest sympathy with the democracy of France and Great Britain, and are animated by an ardent hatred of Nazi or Fascist rule. They have a rooted desire to maintain themselves in their independence. Is nothing being done to ascertain what Yugoslavia would do, assuming that Great Britain and France were prepared to interest themselves in the problems of the Danube Basin? Yugoslavia might well be gained, and I am told that the effect of that on Bulgaria would probably be to draw her into the same orbit. Then there is Rumania, so directly menaced by the potential German movement to the east. These three countries, if left alone, and convinced that there is no will power operating against the dictators, will fall one by one into the Nazi grip and system. What then will be the position of Greece and Turkey?

I ask these questions, hoping that they may be carefully considered. Is it not possible that decided action by France and Great Britain would rally the whole of these five states as well as Czechoslovakia, all of whom have powerful armies, who together aggregate 75,000,000 people, who have several millions of fighting men already trained, who have immense resources, who all wish to dwell in peace within their habitations, who individually may be broken by defeat and despoiled, but who, united, constitute an immense resisting power? Can nothing be done to keep them secure and free and to unite them in their own interests, in French and British interests and, above all, in the interests of peace? Are we really going to let the whole of these tremendous possibilities fall away without a concerted effort of any kind? If we do, let us not suppose for a moment that we shall ourselves have escaped our perils. On the contrary, we shall have multiplied our perils, for a very obvious reason. At present Germany might contemplate a short war, but once she has laid hands on these countries and extended her power to the Black Sea the Nazi regime will be able to feed itself indefinitely, however long war may last, and thus we may weaken the deterrent force against war of that blockade to which the honorable Member who has just spoken referred. We should have removed another of the deterrents that stand between us and war. The nazification of the whole of the Danube states is a danger of the first capital magnitude to the British Empire. Is all to go for nothing? Is it all to be whistled down the wind? If so, we shall repent in blood and tears our improvidence and our lack of foresight and energy.

Two years ago it was safe, 3 years ago it was easy, and 4 years ago a mere dispatch might have rectified the position. But where shall we be a year hence? Where shall we be in 1940? In these next few months all these substantial countries will be deciding whether they will rally, as they would desire to do, to the standards of civilization which still fly over Geneva, or whether they will be forced to throw in their lot and adopt the system and the doctrines of the Nazi powers. The Prime Minister spoke about the negotiations with Italy. I forbear to comment upon them, because I prefer to await the results when they are presented to us. I know no more effective means of aiding those negotiations than the creation of a Danubian bloc, and nothing that would make it more likely that any engagement entered into would bear fruit and be effective in the hour of serious need. I trust that the Government will do their utmost. If it is too late, the evil is upon us, but do not let any chance be thrown away of endeavoring to save this great area from being overrun, exploited, and despoiled.

I now come to the second aspect of the deterrents which we are assembling against aggression—namely, national defense. I welcome very much the announcement that the Prime Minister has made in this respect, and particularly his decision to consult the trade unions. I know that he is averse from hasty decisions. No one can say that this is a hasty decision in the third year of rearmament. I was very glad also to hear the reassurance that drastic action will be taken to augment the speed of our air program, of our air raid precautions system, and our our antiaircraft artillery. It is only a fortnight ago that my right honorable friend told us he was satisfied that we were making the best and the most effective use of our resources. However, it appears that there were other resources not being used which now will be used in a greater effort. I regret very much that these additional resources have not been applied during the last 2 years, when the air program was seen to be trailing so far behind. Not only did we start 2 years too late, but the second 2 years have been traversed at only half speed.

Let me give a warning drawn from our recent experiences. Very likely this immediate crisis will pass, will dissipate itself and calm down. After a boaconstrictor has devoured its prey it often has a considerable digestive spell. It was so after the revelation of the secret German air force. There was a pause. It was so after German conscription was proclaimed in breach of the treaty. It was so after the Rhineland was forcibly occupied. The House may recall that we were told how glad we ought to be because there would be no question of fortifying it. Now, after Austria has been struck down, we are all disturbed and alarmed, but in a little while there may be another pause. There may not—we cannot tell. But if there is a pause, then people will be saying, "See how the alarmists have been confuted; Europe has calmed down, it has all blown over, and the war scare has passed away." The Prime Minister will perhaps repeat what he said a few weeks ago, that the tension in Europe is greatly relaxed. The Times will write a leading article to say how silly those people look who on the morrow of the Austrian incorporation raised a clamor for exceptional action in foreign policy and home defense, and how wise the government were not to let themselves be carried away by this passing incident.

All this time the vast degeneration of the forces of parliamentary democracy will be proceeding throughout Europe. Every 6 weeks another corps will be added to the German Army. All this time important countries and great rail and river communications will pass under the control of the German General Staff. All this time populations will be continually reduced to the rigors of Nazi domination and assimilated to that system. All this time the forces of conquest and intimidation will be consolidated, towering up soon in real and not make-believe strength and superiority. Then presently will come another stroke. Upon whom? Our questions with Germany are unsettled and unanswered. We cannot tell. What I dread is that the impulse now given to active effort may pass away when the dangers are not diminishing, but accumulating and gathering as country after country is involved in the Nazi system, and as their vast preparations reach their final perfection.

For 5 years I have talked to the House on these matters—not with very great success. I have watched this famous island descending incontinently, recklessly, the stairway which leads to a dark gulf. It is a fine, broad stairway at the beginning, but after a bit the carpet ends. A little farther on there are only flagstones, and a little farther on still these break beneath your feet. Look back over the last 5 years. It is true that great mistakes were made in the years immediately after the war. But at Locarno we laid the foundation from which a great forward movement could have been made. Germany began to rearm in earnest and openly to seek revenge. If we study the history of Rome and Carthage, we can understand what happened and why. It is not difficult to form an intelligent view about the three Punic Wars; but if mortal catastrophe should overtake the British Nation and the British Empire, historians a thousand years hence will still be baffled by the mystery of our affairs. They will never understand how it was that a victorious nation, with everything in hand, suffered themselves to be brought low, and to cast away all that they had gained by measureless sacrifice and absolute victory—gone with the wind.

Now the victors are the vanquished, and those who threw down their arms in the field and sued for an armistice are striding on to world mastery. That is the position—that is the terrible transformation that has taken place bit by bit. I rejoice to hear from the Prime Minister that a further supreme effort is to be made to place us in a position of security. Now is the time at last to rouse the nation. Perhaps it is the last time it can be roused with a chance of preventing war or with a chance of coming through to victory, should our efforts to prevent war fail. We should lay aside every hindrance and endeavor, by uniting the whole force and spirit of our people, to raise again a great British nation standing up before all the world; for such a nation, rising in its ancient vigor, can even at this hour save civilization.

Mr. Speaker, to me it seems that the outstanding lesson for us to learn from the experiences of England, as described by Winston Churchill, is the wisdom and absolute necessity of our increasing and strengthening our national defenses. In this connection I desire to quote, in conclusion, the words of two great Americans who are also authorities on this subject—Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker and Col. Charles A. Lindbergh.

Captain Rickenbacker, in a recent radio address, said:

With a strong Navy, and an air force of 25,000 pilots and 50,000 planes, no foreign government dare even think in terms of war against us; and if they be so foolish, our people need have no fear of invasion.

Colonel Lindbergh, in his recent radio address, said:

Let us look to our own defenses and to our own character. If we attend to them, we have no need to fear what happens elsewhere. If we do not attend to them, nothing can save us.

From Palm to Pine Through a Land of Enchantment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, so much has been done by Congress to aid the States in the commendable work of highway building that every United States highway, whether running east and west or north and south, is of great interest to national lawmakers and administrative officials at Washington. However, some of these newer highways in the West are of greater interest because of their possibilities. The United States Highway 89, through Arizona, or a link of the same, is a case to illustrate.

In general, highways have been built east and west with greater enthusiasm and more outlay, especially west of the Mississippi River, than have roads north and south. Perhaps this is because the general trend of our population movement is toward the West. One great objective in highway building has been to connect the East and Middle West with the far West and Pacific coast by concrete roads or other types of modern highway construction. A fairly good job has been done in building these east-west modern roads. Arizona has logically received her liberal share. Four great transcontinental highways cross Arizona; namely, United States Highways 60, 66, 70, and 80. We would be delighted to have Arizona crossed north and south by four such remarkable highways. It is about one of these north-south highways that I rise to speak today.

First, let me explain why four transcontinental east and west highways pass through Arizona. It is because Arizona is geographically a gateway to the Pacific Coast. Arizona always has been such a gateway. The great barrier between the eastern part of our country and the Pacific coast has been the Rocky Mountain area. This great natural barrier is lowest in Arizona. That geographical fact explains why two transcontinental railroads were built across Arizona to the Pacific coast. It also explains why air travel, either by plane or dirigible to the Pacific coast, prefers to pass over Arizona, and these geographical conditions permitting all-year-round travel, unhampered by snow and bad weather, really explain the presence of four transcontinental roads running east and west through Arizona.

On next Sunday, October 8, the Governor of Arizona and a large concourse of people will meet at Sedona in Oak Creek Canyon, in northern Arizona, for the celebration of the completion of a highway through Oak Creek Canyon, from the Verde Valley to Flagstaff. This completes another north-south road and closes a link in a significant international highway, reaching from Mexico to Canada, and now makes it possible to travel on good, modern pavement all the way from Mexico to neighboring Canada on the north. I wish I might have all the Members of this Chamber as my guests for a few hours in this beautiful Oak Creek Canyon where the celebration is being held. I did invite the Members of the House Committee on Naval Affairs to be my guests in Arizona this September 13 and 14, and had made tentative arrangements with two chambers of commerce to take my colleagues through Oak Creek Canyon as a part of their sightseeing in northern Arizona. Some bad storms and the calling of the special session changed the committee's plans and prevented the carrying out of mine. This rare treat is yet in store, not only for the Members of the House Naval Affairs Committee, but, I hope, for many others of my colleagues as well.

United States Highway 89 leads through some of the most scenic portions of Arizona. Whether this new link from Prescott and Jerome to Flagstaff, by way of Oak Creek Canyon, will become a part of United States Highway 89, which now follows a different course, has yet to be decided, but that it will be a part of some United States highway running north and south cannot be doubted. And what a highway! Of all the highways of America over which I have ever traveled, I know of none over which I would rather take my friends for a thrill, such as scenic grandeur can give.

Oak Creek Canyon is a miniature Grand Canyon of the Colorado. The Grand Canyon in northern Arizona is known throughout the world and is recognized as the most sublime natural spectacle on earth, but I tell you truly that Oak Creek Canyon, in my judgment, will repay a second visit, even more than the Grand Canyon. It has all the gorgeous colorings in the canyon walls which may be found in the Grand Canyon. It is drawn on a much smaller scale so that its sublimity is concentrated, and it may now be traversed with ease on a splendid automobile road. Gentlemen of Congress, I could wish nothing better for myself than to join the Governor of Arizona next Sunday in this celebration at Oak Creek Canyon, and I could wish nothing better for you than that you might be my guests on a trip through Oak Creek Canyon on this new highway.

Price Movement and the Shoe Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM D. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, the remarks I am going to make today are addressed to the President of the United States and the Tariff Commission, as well as to this House, of which I have the honor of being a Member. My remarks are on a subject that is being discussed by the general public and is being closely watched by the administration and practically every branch of the Federal Government. I refer to the subject of the price movement and the possibility that we will all have to pay higher prices for commodities and the necessities of life. There is, I am sure, in this crisis a general feeling among sound businessmen that they should not allow, if they can possibly help, the prices of raw materials, commodities, and finished goods to advance to the point where they will suffer from some of the violent reactions we have had in the past.

This feeling, I believe, is somewhat of a change of heart for business brought about undoubtedly by sad experience, but it nevertheless will help the Congress materially in its work to protect the ultimate consumer from excessive extortion and unreasonable cost of living. However, the businessman who knows that an inflated price level will eventually work to his ultimate disadvantage will need help in some cases from the Federal Government.

I shall attempt to prove my point by expressing my views on a subject with which I am familiar and on a business with which I have been intimately associated for 25 years. I refer to the shoe and leather industry, one of the most important and certainly economically necessary in the United States.

In 1929, the Seventieth Congress passed what is known as the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. You are all familiar with the consequence of this legislation, which a great many people think did more to start the depression and to bring on the collapse of business than anything else up to that time.

In my own mind and for our own industry, it was a very vicious and pernicious piece of legislation. Now, however, we are in the situation where prices are advancing at a very rapid rate either through scarcity or speculation, and the question arises as to how we can keep them under control. When the price of sugar started to get out of line several weeks ago the President, in his wisdom, canceled sugar quotas and immediately a sharp upturn was at least checked for the time being. I have heard nothing but favorable comment on his action.

The price of manufactured shoes to the retailer and through him to the ultimate consumer depends largely on the price of the leather that goes into them. Of course, there are other factors which might raise or lower the manufacturing cost, such as labor and overhead, but I find in examining the figures that on a girl's shoe which is produced in volume and a manufacturer will sell for, say, $1.55, the value of the leather is 64 cents, or approximately 40 percent of the cost. The same is true in the selling price of the leather where the value of the hide is even more and in some cases runs as high as 65 percent of the cost.

So it is very reasonable to assume that any steps that can be taken to keep hide prices down to a reasonable level will, in the end, keep down the cost of shoes to the general public. My own figures show that on the present market a 10-percent rise in hide prices—and they have gone up now considerably more than that—reflects at least 8 cents a pair in the particular shoe about which I am speaking. Now the retailer may be able to absorb from 5 to 10 cents a pair without adding to the price to the consumer. However, the chances are that he will not, and that this shoe will be taken out of the $1.55 price level and, instead of retailing for $1.99, it will immediately go to $2.25.

Now, there is nothing exorbitant about these figures, which are based on a small profit for the shoe manufacturer and the shoe retailer. Suppose, however, we would take the 10-percent ad valorem duty off of the South American hides which was placed there by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, and which was designed to help the farmer, and nearly broke everyone in the United States—would we not place a large portion of this great industry in a position to keep down the cost of its product? Of course, there is also a duty on leather and a duty on shoes, but with practically every other country in the world at war, they will be too busy manufacturing for themselves to import finished products into this country.

Now, as I have said, this duty placed by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act on hides and skins was designed to help the farmer. I think the average farmer will tell any Member of Congress that it did nothing for him at that time. The fact is that the large packing companies consider the hides as more or less a banana peel when they are purchasing cattle. It is true that a number of the big packers take the hides from their own kill and put them in their own tanneries at whatever price they please, and in this manner can control, to a large extent, the market on leather for their own convenience. But this is another subject, and might later be worth looking into if price conditions should get very bad. The point I make now, however, and in conclusion, is that by putting hides and skins back on the free list, where they had been for, I believe, 50 years, or until the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, will tend to put the price of shoes down to the ultimate consumer and will have no effect on the farmer.

I am sending these remarks to the President of the United States, the Tariff Commission, and to the various departments of the Government which I think will be interested.

The Share of the Domestic Market Supplied by the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK H. BUCK
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, there seem to be several of us who desire to keep the record clear as far as information regarding farm activities is concerned. For some time past we have heard a good deal of discussion about keeping the American market for the American farmer, the inference being that he was imposed upon by imports of commodities that are classed as agriculture.

Let us look into this. The American farmer still has the American market for the things he produces, the same as he has always had. For many years he has been supplying approximately 90 percent of the domestic market. In recent years that percentage has not declined; if anything, it has increased.

But why does not the American farmer, with his agricultural surpluses, supply 100 percent of the domestic market?

The American farmer might possibly be able to supply 100 percent of the domestic market. If he were to completely supply the domestic market, however, he would be doing two things.

First, he would be raising products which he is not equipped to produce, such as coffee, rubber, silk, and bananas. Consequently they would be produced only at a high unit cost, if at all.

Second, because he would be shutting out all imports of foreign farm products into this country, his products would likewise be barred from foreign markets. And since the American farmer needs more than the American market, he could not afford that course. For instance, during the past 15 years, our domestic agricultural exports have averaged $1,346,000,000, whereas competitive imports have averaged $718,000,000. To have gone on a strictly nationalistic basis during this period would have cost the American farmer $528,000,000 a year.

In other words, it is more economical for the farmer to produce an abundance of those commodities which he is best equipped to produce—with them supplying the home market and selling the remainder abroad—while he lets foreign producers supply a trickle of competitive imports and certain specialty articles not so readily produced in this country.

In order to visualize just what the share of the domestic market supplied by the American farmer amounts to, I append hereto a table covering the years 1924 to 1938, which is self-explanatory.

The share of the domestic market supplied by the American farmer, calendar years 1924–38 [1]

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 5, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. JOHN A. MATTHEWS

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, it is most interesting to note in the question of neutrality that persons not in legislative work really think out the issues and are interested enough in the welfare of their country to present their views to their Representatives.

The following is a very masterful treatise on the question of neutrality by the very able judge, John A. Matthews, of Newark, who is highly respected by every member of the bar of our State:

NEWARK, N. J., September 19, 1939.

Hon. ALBERT L. VREELAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN VREELAND: May I identify myself as Judge John A. Matthews, of Newark, N. J., who appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at the last session of Congress and who wrote you and sent you, at your request, a copy of an address I delivered over the radio against repealing the embargo provisions of our present neutrality law?

Well, our prophecy has come true. The international bankers and "the captains of business and finance" are once again doing what William Allen White says at page 371 of his book, "Woodrow Wilson," they did in 1917, "superimposing their will upon the will of kings," and, as is plain to see, upon our President, and they are trying hard to impose it upon the Congress.

You may recall that my fellow Democrat, KEY PITTMAN, resented that statement when I made it at your committee hearing. But it is just as true today as White says it was true in our pre-World War days. Moreover, White says, again at page 371, "Democracy had no champion in those days. It (the war) began as a war for commercial power. War motives were shot through with the greed of junkerdom in every European capital." And so it is today.

May I venture the following suggestions to you, who, in the providence of God, will keep alive the truth of what Champ Clark, the father of Senator CHAMP CLARK, once said on the floor of the House, namely, that "the history of our country seems like a last attempt on the part divine Providence in behalf of the human race."

1. I think Senator VANDENBERG'S reported statement that "you cannot be an arsenal for one belligerent without being a target for the other" can well be the keynote of our campaign against destroying the protection which American mothers now have for the sons they went down into "the valley of the shadow" to bring into this world.

2. The Nation should know the real purpose of Morgenthau's visit to Europe this summer and whether his visit had to do with this campaign to put us into the blood business. We should find out whether the European banking and munitions gang held parley with our dictator of the "stabilization fund."

3. The Nation should have its attention called to J. P. Morgan's "grouse hunting" trip to Europe this summer, at which time he "entertained" the King of England after the King had returned from his "visit" to America. When Morgan arrived home, just before war was declared, he is reported to have said to newspapermen that it would be natural for his firm to be asked to be agent for the purchase of war supplies here for England and France. Remember they were in the days of the World War, when, as Hendricks' book, The Life and Letters of Walter H. Page, shows, we paid England's overdraft of her account for war supplies with J. P. Morgan to the extent of $400,000,000 "out of the proceeds of the first Liberty loan" (vol. II, pp. 272, 273). And remember that's what England owed Morgan on April 6, 1917, when we entered the war. And that's what "cash and carry" will turn out to be if we become England's arsenal. Indeed, if the Nation has put before it the financial condition, the debt of England and France today (Paul Mallon had a brief résumé of it in his column recently), our people will realize that in a so-called long war, which the propagandists for England are now declaring this war must be, neither England nor France could begin to pay cash even on the basis of what they bought and never paid for in the World War. Cash and carry is only a catch phrase to delude the American people. If they have the cash, let England pay now what she owes us—$3,316,858,552. And let France pay us her debt—$3,654,944,930.

4. The country should also get this picture. Why are the propagandists for England and France flooding our press and radio with statements that there will and must be no short war, but that the war must last "2 or 3 years"? Even allowing that Hitler is the "aggressor" in Poland—and he is "aggressing" for what the burglars of Versailles took from the country he fought for as a citizen and as a soldier—why should overtures for peace after the conquest of Poland be refused in advance of their being actually made? And why should our country by her unneutral act in repealing the arms embargo and thus making possible a "long war" by becoming first the arsenal of England and France and ultimately their cobelligerent—why should our country, I say, join with self-seeking England in closing all the doors to peace and remove herself from the only role she should play in this conflict, that of arbiter and peacemaker?

Let us make no mistake about it. History will rightly lay at our door this threatened world carnage if we join in this dastardly business of closing the doors to an early peace. The fate of Poland, who selfishly abetted the fate of Czecho-Slovakia, may well be mollified by an early peace, the terms of which we, as a neutral, might well be consulted about. A World War can mean only, as Herbert Hoover says, "universal dictatorship."

Moreover, as Hoover says in the same article, "no competent observer believes that the dictatorships, singly or in combination, could successfully attack the Western Hemisphere, even if they were inclined to try it, which they are not. * * * We cannot become the world's policeman unless we are prepared to sacrifice millions of American lives—and probably some day see all the world against us. In time they would envisage us as the world's greatest bully, not as the world's greatest idealist. * * * War means that our country must be mobilized into practically a Fascist state. It would be so organized. It went some distance in the last Great War, although we did not use that term at the time. It would have gone much further if the war had extended longer. I speak as this not from hearsay but as one who participated in the economic organization of the Great War. I saw the rise of opposition to demobilization of the interests which benefited, and I have seen the attempts to restore these measures ever since. * * * Let us at least recognize that a war to save liberty would probably destroy liberty. In my view, another great war will make dictatorship universal." (Liberty Magazine, April 15, 1939.)

Incidentally, I notice Roosevelt didn't ask Hoover to the conference for Thursday next. Yet Hoover has had more international experience and knows more of European intrigues than Landon or newspaper owner Knox ever could know. If there is to be no politics in this conference, why leave Hoover out?

5. Again the Nation should reflect on this eventuality. Russia, whom England wooed in vain, has a big ideological foothold in France, as was evidenced by the all but successful efforts of the "Front Populaire." Who knows whether if by our unneutral act of repealing the embargo we become England's arsenal and thus really create the "long war" into which we, as a result of repeal, will surely be drawn, who knows whether we may not be left "holding the bag" with England, who, of course, will then fight "to the last American." With Japan and Russia in comparative entente, with Germany and Russia in declared entente, it is not my unreasonable fear that France may, in a "long war," find herself internally fomented by the present seemingly dormant "Popular Front" crowd until revolution compels her alinement with her ideological friends. And let it be noted that the Communist crowd in France, or call it if you will the leftist crowd, or the Socialist crowd, refused to accept preferred places in the Daladier war cabinet under the pretext that the representation offered wasn't commensurate with their strength and members in the nation.

6. Our people should be told of an opinion recently given by Henry L. Fraser, an authority on international law and a member of a committee which has recently completed a 3-year study of the subject of neutrality. Mr. Fraser may be quoted as follows: "A more difficult question arises when a neutral state relaxes its regulations existing at the outbreak of war. Would the lifting of the present prohibition on the export of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war * * * compromise our neutral status? It seems clear to me that the lifting today of such embargo would be an unneutral act." (Cf. New York American, September 16, 1939.)

And suppose that Germany upon our repeal of the embargo should call it what it is in international law, an unneutral act, how long do you think it would be before we were given, not incidents, but an invitation into war? The game of European power politics has no rules; its chips are human lives. Let America ponder being the cause of a "long war" by becoming its arsenal. Let us not merit the blame for destroying civilization by cooperating to block an early peace.

7. The Nation should have the "lay aside partisan politics" plea stripped of its camouflage. The "limited emergency proclamation" of the President looks like a political move. It will be only 21 days after war was declared in Europe that you of the Congress are called into special session. Why didn't he call you before he proclaimed this "emergency"? Was it because he wanted to put himself before the country in a position to dictate terms to you of the Congress when he should call you into special session? Let the Nation know that the real "emergency" in our country today is the solution of our domestic problems and not European power politics. Lifting the embargo would be plunging into European politics as the rankest kind of a partisan.

As the erstwhile New Dealer, Moley, says in his book, After Seven Years (Harper Bros.):

"The American people have been told that they must help the democracies because two or more forms of government cannot coexist in the world, because the world must become all democratic or all totalitarian. This, of course, is a fallacy.

"In point of fact, there has been no scintilla of evidence that Britain and France are at all concerned with the defense of democracy or with a desire to bring all nations to the democratic form of government. War has threatened not because of the internal horrors produced by Hitler's intolerance but because of a struggle over the boundary lines of Europe. Only our bellicose patriots forget the distinction."

8. The country should be told on the floor of Congress and by you real Americans over the radio who the arch propagandists for repeal really are. As Colonel Lindbergh said over the radio, September 15 (cf. New York Times, September 16): "We must learn to look behind every article we read and every speech we hear. We must not only inquire about the writer and the speaker—about his personal interests and his nationality—but we must ask who owns and who influences the newspaper, the news picture, and the radio station."

Tell the country who is and what is behind Stimson. Reveal Nicholas Murray Butler, lately returned from England, in his true light as America's Anglophile No. 1. Expose that "educational congress" in New York under Butlerian auspices, which timed itself almost to the month of the declaration of war, and show how Englishmen hogged the stage to propagandize America to the side of England. Point out how Lord Lothian (formerly Philip Kerr, Lloyd George's alter ego at the Peace Conference) now England's Ambassador to the United States, is a close friend of Geoffrey Dawson, editor of the London Times, and "one of the 10 most important people in England." He is to this propaganda drive for war what Lord Northcliffe was in the pre-World War days.

9. Finally, may I suggest that you call the attention of the Senate to what to my mind is the real story behind this repeal-the-embargo campaign, namely, the greed of the captains of industry and finance, or to put it another way, the greed of the international banker-munition makers.

You will find ample proof that history is repeating what William Allen White said was done in pre-World War days, by reading pages 123 to 126 of Gunther's book, Inside Europe. May I give you a few high lights of quotation from these pages as follows:

"The arms companies are as incestuous as white mice. They play together and breed. * * * Extraordinarily interrelated and intertwined the arms firms lace the whole world in their net. * * * It has long been known that French and German steel producers had an unwritten understanding during the World War not to bomb each other's plants. * * * War scares are good; real wars will be better. Let there be no mistake about it. Arms dealers want war. They are hypocrites if they deny this. War is to them what milk is to a baby. They fatten on it. They fatten on it like pigs in corn."

Another illuminating source of proof that these merchants of murder want to see the embargo on implements of war removed may be found in Pierre Van Paasen's recent book Days of Our Years, at pages 75, 76, 131, 132, the highlights of which may be quoted as follows:

"Representatives of the German Chemical Trust, of the Swiss copper interests, and of Vickers (British arms company), Krupp (German arms company), Schneider-Creusot (French arms company), and the Comité des Forges (French steel makers' trade association, which dominates the policy of its 250 producers who are its members by allotting quotas and setting prices) met in Vienna at the moment (during the World War) when the armies were locked in a death struggle in the mud of Flanders. Their sole purpose was to devise ways and means of keeping the war going profitably. 'People believe they are dying for their fatherland; they are dying for the industrialists,' said Anatole France, when he learned the answer of Senator Berenger as to why the metallurgical district of Thionville was not taken back at the outbreak of the war, when it was undefended by the Germans and the French Army was within a stone's throw. The reason no attempt has been made to recapture Thionville was that it would have brought the war to a premature termination. 'For the occupation of Thionville,' declared the Senator, 'would have reduced Germany to 7,000,000 tons of poor steel per year; all production would have been stopped. Seizure of Thionville would have put an end to the war immediately.' The stoppage of the war was to be prevented at all costs."

Is history about to repeat itself? Must there be a "long war" to "stop Hitlerism," or to "seek fools' gold," as President Roosevelt said August 14, 1936, at Chautauqua, N. Y., or to enrich the international merchants of murder?

But perhaps the most illuminating quotation from Van Paasen, which reveals the real story behind this present war, is the following, which I will set out in full so that the entire context may be had:

"Paul Faure, deputy for the district of Le Creusot, revealed in the French Parliament that Schneider-Creusot, the mammoth French Cannon Trust, headed by the cousins De Wendel, one of whom was a member of the French Chamber and the other of the German Reichstag, was contributing funds to the Nazi Party of Adolf Hitler, and that Skoda, the Czechoslovakian Armament Trust, which is largely controlled by Schneider-Creusot, was supplying Germany with artillery, gunpowder, and cartridges on credit.

"Why should Hitler have received French, Czechoslovakian, and British money (for Sir Henry Deterding, chairman of Royal Dutch Shell, was also reported amongst the contributors to the Nazi Party's funds)? The answer is simple. One needed but read the Führer's book, Mein Kampf. In that document, the upstart party leader, with scarcely 10,000 followers at the time he wrote the book, announced that his first task upon attaining power would be to rearm the Reich. Did not such a man deserve international sympathy and support? Armament factories all over the continent were standing idle, dividends were sinking, stock quotations going lower and lower. And not a cloud on the horizon to give the deadly armament industry a little spurt; no danger anywhere to warrant the manufacture of a single gun. Would it not be a godsend if Hitler could come to power and make Germany dangerous once more? Wouldn't that be sufficient excuse to kill all this nonsense in Geneva about world peace and disarmament? Once Germany started to rearm, all could follow suit. For the primary condition of a general armament campaign is the rearmament of only one powerful state. With Germany on the way, "the tragic and ridiculous spectacle" (as Francois Delaisi called it once) of nations arming because they were afraid, and afraid because they were arming, could start all over again.

"It did start all over again, and you felt sick at heart with the chicanery and the hypocritical palaver in Geneva about peace and democracy by men who represented the so-called great democracies, but who were scheming and conniving behind the scenes to sacrifice the German people to a barbaric, militaristic authoritarianism because that was the condition sine qua non for setting the armament campaigns in their own countries in motion again. Before August 1914 the most influential Parisian newspapers had been heavily subsidized by Germany to whip up the spirit of revanche in the French people, and so help the French Government pass ever heavier war budgets, and, in turn, give the Kaiser's cabinet the opportunity of obtaining more war credits from the German people. Now the chief task of international diplomacy was to kill the urge for peace and general disarmament in the peoples by introducing a new menace to peace in the center of Europe.

"You saw the sordid mystification of Geneva, the murderous traffic to betray the hope of humanity, but who were you, a simple newspaperman, to denounce the contemptible trickery to set the peoples on the warpath again? Was it likely that anyone would believe that men like Austen Chamberlain, Baldwin, Briand, Stresemann, MacDonald, Simon, and Paul Boncour, who had the word "peace" forever on the tip of their tongues, were in reality playing with the life and death of Europe and the future of civilization? You managed to get some 'revelations' printed in the periodicals and reviews of the Quakers and the Christian antimilitarists in Holland, Switzerland, and France, but that was all that could be done about it."

In conclusion, may I urge that alongside of these revelations by Cunther and Van Paasen the country have placed before it these words by President Roosevelt, at Chautauqua, on August 14, 1936:

"Industrial and agricultural productions for a war may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster.

"Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

"They will tell you—and, unfortunately, their views get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other to belligerent nations the unemployed of America would all find work.

"They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts.

"It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning. * * *

"If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.'

"It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous."

It will not do to try to explain Mr. Roosevelt's change of mind on the embargo and war profiteers as the New York Sun did in an editorial, September 13, 1939, wherein it said:

"It should not be necessary to recall that the Chautauqua speech was made in the heat of a Presidential campaign or that the peace of the world was then so badly disturbed that a speech of that sort went big. The Italian conquest of Ethiopia had just been accomplished. Germany was starting to reconstruct its war forces. The Spanish civil war was boiling. Japan was busy in China. As a candidate for reelection, Mr. Roosevelt found peace an attractive topic and in the speech quoted by Senator NYE he played it to the limit."

The "heat of a Presidential campaign" is again in the offing. If we lift the embargo, we will be at war when that campaign gets under way. The third-term objections, our domestic problems, the recovery of our country from its all-too-long depression, everything will be subordinated to the old slogan, "don't change horses in midstream."

Senator BORAH, the mothers of American sons, millions of them, look to you as the star of their hopes, and not to the tinsel title of "Gold Star Mothers," as a bauble for the blood of their boys. Once again I repeat what I said to you in a letter some time ago: I am unwilling to think that the Congress of my country will answer the warning of American mothers and fathers against shedding the innocent blood of their sons in any European carnage by a reiteration of that awful curse of 2,000 years ago, "Their blood be upon us and upon our children."

Sincerely yours,

JOHN A. MATTHEWS.

Fool's Gold

EDITORIAL FROM THE LIVINGSTON (MONT.) ENTERPRISE

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Livingston Enterprise, of Livingston, Mont.:

FOOL'S GOLD?

Old-time prospectors can tell many stories of the fellows searching for mineral wealth, who picked up a rock or piece of stone that looked as though it carried a heavy load of yellow gold. It sparkled in the sun and seemed to possess the value that had called this and that prospector to spend lonesome days and days of hard work out in "them thar hills."

Perhaps this chap dared show his find to a fellow prospector and learned then and there that in reality he had failed to find the yellow metal he had been searching for, but he had picked up what among prospectors is known as fool's gold, of no value. It may be that his discovery of the worthlessness of his find came after a long trip to town, but sooner or later he found it necessary to return to prospecting and digging, never to be fooled a second time by the lure of the shiny surface.

Twenty-five years ago, the United States was not greatly unlike the prospector. Gold, lots of it, was offered if our great industrial and business organizations would gear up to the capacity necessary to provide the equipment and merchandise needed by belligerent nations in Europe who were too busy prosecuting a war to provide for the wants of soldiers and civilians enlisted in the war program. Factories were set going at full blast in America and new jobs were created by the tens of thousands to get under way these vast manufacturing programs. New factories were constructed, new machines were made, and the money rolled in.

Finally the war ceased, and with that cessation a nation industrially geared to overproduction was suddenly confronted with the necessity of getting enterprises back on a normal basis. Europe had so impoverished itself that the normal pre-war market was gone and our own bank rolls were depleted because of loans made in the heyday of war excitement, which have not, and undoubtedly will not, be repaid. In the countries that had been at war it became necessary for them to produce their own foodstuff, clothing, and other needed material and supplies, because their credit had become exhausted during the war. Finally, with our own participation in that world struggle, the situation became more acute, and national obligations to those who risked life and limb to fight "over there" were but a small part of an expense bill that was to contribute to the financial crash that eventually followed. Within a few short days declining values of everything produced or possessed brought penury to replace affluence and the gilded dollars that had seemed to flow in disappeared as snow fades under the heat of a warm spring sun.

Fool's gold?

Today we have another opportunity to repeat the program above recited. Another war rages in Europe. Even promising greater havoc than its predecessor, we are inclined to look with much enthusiasm upon potential riches and quick money that will be offered. Larger and more costly machines are being used in combat, and food shortages have appeared less than a month after the actual beginning of hostilities. We witness the daily rise in the cost of our own food supplies, and some of us rush to store sugar and other staples, thinking to insure against the upward trend, only to find we are contributing to a state of mind that "ups" the cost of every article we are later compelled by our own necessity to purchase.

Of course every loyal American would and does want to see every American gainfully employed, but not at the expense of replacing the 12,000,000 unemployed today with 25,000,000 unemployed after this war has been decided.

It would be far better for this country to gear its industry to supply that which in peacetime has been imported, for our European importations have vanished overnight. This responsibility which is today forced upon us can well care for the reemployment of those not now at work.

The Congress, now in extraordinary session, can well limit its action to consideration of the cash-and-carry system, and even this permission may prove costly in the long run. It can hardly be denied that the Congress faces one of the most serious problems that has ever confronted it.

This country, like the prospector, has had the experience of taking what looked like gold to the assayer, only to discover our possession of fool's gold. What is true of the business that demands too much and expands too much is equally true of the workman who demands too much and thus contributes to fatal expansion.

Repeal of the Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

LETTER FROM CHARLES CHENEY HYDE AND PHILIP C. JESSUP

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication which was printed in today's edition of the New York Times:

[From the New York Times of October 5, 1939]

LEGAL ASPECTS OF REPEAL—DRS. HYDE AND JESSUP SUPPLEMENT THEIR ARGUMENT AGAINST EMBARGO CHANGE

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Since the publication of our letter in the New York Times of September 21 concerning the legal aspect of a repeal of the embargo on munitions of war, numerous utterances in unofficial, as well as official, places cause us to supplement our statement.

First of all, we must challenge the suggestion that international law has ever imposed any duty on a neutral to permit the exportation of munitions of war from its territory, and that accordingly the retention of the embargo is contrary to the precepts of international law. That is not the case and never has been. As we have already pointed out, the applicable rule of international law is merely that the neutral state is not normally obliged to prevent the inhabitants of its territory from exporting munitions of war therefrom.

In the Neutrality Report for the Harvard Research in International Law (American Journal of International Law, vol. 33, sup., pp. 283 ff.), there is an extensive list of precedents for neutral arms embargoes. The list includes the following states, which, when neutral, have prohibited the export of arms and munitions; it is to be noted that these are chiefly states which may properly be called traditional neutrals:

Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Salvador, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay (of these, five have embodied the rule in their penal codes); Austria, Belgium, Denmark; Hamburg, Hanover, Lubeck, Mechlenburg-Schwerin (before the unification of Germany); Germany (in 1920 during the Russo-Polish war); Liberia, Netherlands, Norway.

OPPOSITION CITED

Mr. Hackworth, the able legal adviser of the Department of State, testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee in 1936, cited other and broader World War examples and said: "So far as I know, nobody complained about them" (hearings, p. 294). In regard to the arms embargo specifically, in a prepared memorandum he said: "There appears to be little or no serious objection to this section from any quarter, even by those who tell us that we should have no domestic legislation but should constantly rely upon international law. The sentiment of the people seems to be opposed to the furnishing of finished instruments of war to belligerent countries" (hearings, p. 298).

In December 1936 Secretary Hull, at the Buenos Aires Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, sought to secure the agreement of all the American republics to a treaty which declared in article VIII that "upon the determination of the existence of a state of war between two or more American republics, those of the high contracting parties remaining neutral shall not permit, during the continuance of hostilities, the exportation from their respective territories of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any of the belligerents or to any neutral country for transshipment to, or for the use of, any of the belligerents" (State Department Press Releases, Dec. 12, 1936, p. 483).

It is fantastic to call the present arms embargo a violation of international law, and it is misleading to intimate that it represents a departure from that law.

SOME CHANGES LAWFUL

We must emphasize the point that we have been far from asserting that any change in a neutral's laws and regulations, effected in time of war, would be a breach of international law. The neutrality report for the Harvard research in international law correctly states that some changes under certain conditions may lawfully be made. The point, however, that we have sought to stress is that the United States, having before the war forbidden exportations of arms and munitions to belligerents, cannot now permit such exportations without an affirmative governmental act; such an affirmative act, if taken for the purpose of assisting one belligerent side, "constitutes a governmental taking of sides which is unneutral and illegal."

We stressed the "two factors—the governmental control already achieved by an act of Congress and a governmental desire to relax that control so as to help France and England."

In the neutrality report for the Harvard research in international law much the same position is taken (at pp. 316 ff.) where it is said:

"The task confronting the neutral state which takes action under this article [permitting changes during war to safeguard its neutral rights or to fulfill its neutral duties] is to make certain to itself and clear to other states that the motive inducing the adoption of a new rule or regulation during the course of a war is the product of its concern to act strictly in accordance with the laws of neutrality and not the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent. * * * The neutral state which takes action under this article may be required to bear the burden of showing that the change in its rules was induced by its own neutral necessities and not by the desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

CHANGE IN SITUATION

As we said in our letter of September 21, "the situation confronting the United States today is sharply different from that of a month ago before the war broke out. While peace reigned no international obligation hindered Congress from legislating as it might see fit. With the outbreak of war, however, the situation changed overnight."

Moreover, we stated that the repeal of the embargo at this time would reflect the desire and effort of our country to help a particular cause in the present conflict. It has since been suggested that the proof of such motive is beyond reach. We are not now asking what proof of motive would be necessary to satisfy the mind of an international tribunal. We are merely asserting that there is evidence which must convince the mind of an honest American people who are shrewd enough to perceive, and fair enough to acknowledge, the real reason behind the effort to repeal the embargo.

Hence we would suggest to those who support repeal of the embargo to ask themselves the question and to answer it in all honesty, "Would you still favor repeal if the situation were the reverse of what it is and if repeal would aid Germany instead of the allies?" If the answer to that question is "no," there is substantial recognition of what seems to be the obvious fact that the underlying purpose of repeal is to aid the allies.

Undoubtedly some persons sincerely believe that aiding the allies now by repealing the embargo will help to keep the United States out of war by contributing to an early allied victory. That is beside the point which we made, namely, that if the purpose of repeal is to aid one belligerent side, the conduct would not be impartial, and the United States would become to that extent a participant in the conflict and would subject itself to the charge of being guilty of unneutral conduct.

RESPECT FOR LAW URGED

We hear it said on every side that the bearing of international law on the conduct of the United States at the present time is unimportant, that the real issue is one of policy, and that in deciding what that policy should be at a time like the present the requirements of international law sink out of sight and are not to be regarded as a deterrent of the action which we wish to take.

This contention is of vast significance, since its rests upon the notion that a distasteful legal obstacle to a desired line of national conduct may be blandly thrust aside. Is the United States really ready to flout international law? Is it prepared to class itself with those nations whose conduct it has denounced as lawless? Somehow one cannot believe that the American people would consciously and deliberately become a lawbreaking nation.

As a Nation we have always insisted that there is a law determining neutral rights and duties. It is not the American philosophy to repudiate that traditional position when the law hampers our freedom of action and to assert it only for our advantage when protesting against violations of our rights under that law. There is little disagreement with the proposition that today the world sorely needs examples of national adherence to precepts of law and justice. Is it possible that the United States will now take the stand that national policy should be guided not by respect for law but solely by a desire to further what is deemed to be a national interest?

Congress Should Stay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 5, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) SUNDAY CALL

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, the Newark Sunday Call, one of the leading Sunday papers of New Jersey and edited by my good friend, Eddie Bataille, expresses an opinion which I think is the keynote of the whole question before the country in these times of stress.

The following editorial appeared Sunday, September 24, 1939:

[From the Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call of September 24, 1939]

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY

There is no good reason to doubt the sincerity of President Roosevelt's desire to keep America out of war. But his open sympathy for the allied cause makes many doubt his ability to maintain the official impartiality required of the head of a neutral state.

It is unfortunate that he climaxed an excellent and sensible message by a blunt suggestion to Congress to do the work he outlined and then get out of town. His desire to be rid of Congress will strengthen the suspicion that he wants a free hand in foreign affairs. Once Congress adjourned, only he could call it back. It is not enough to keep in touch with the leaders of Congress.

In normal times the conduct of foreign affairs is the constitutional responsibility of the President. These are not normal times. Mr. Roosevelt is impulsive and loves to be bold and dramatic. His is not the most dependable temperament in times which call for dispassionate judgment.

He is surrounded by advisers in whom the American people have little confidence. He needs the constant collaboration and restraining influence of Congress, which is much more closely in touch with public opinion than he.

Congress should stay in Washington until the beginning of the regular session in January.

Cash-and-Carry Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILL TAYLOR
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 5, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE KNOXVILLE JOURNAL

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit an editorial from last Monday's issue of the Knoxville Journal, of Knoxville, Tenn.

This editorial from the pen of one of the most virile and versatile editorial writers of the South, Mr. Guy L. Smith, illustrates by allegory a very strong argument for cash-and-carry neutrality.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Knoxville (Tenn.) Journal of October 2, 1939]

A READER'S ARGUMENT IS FURTHER EXAMINED

On Saturday there was published on this page a letter from a reader in which he expressed his opposition to the repeal of the existing embargo legislation as follows:

A certain man had two neighbors who lived nearby, one an enemy and the other a friend, so he said to his friend:

"Lend me your gun; I want to shoot my neighbor, who is an enemy."

"No," said the friend, "I will not lend you my gun, for I should then be an accessory before the fact of the proposed killing."

"Oh," said the neighbor, "but I will buy your gun and pay you for it cash."

"A thousand times no," said the friend, "if I took money and lent you my gun as well, I would be a worse criminal than you propose to become; my answer is ten thousand times no."

On its face, that simple example may seem both sound and humane; the trouble is that it does not accurately illustrate the real relationships in the present European struggle between nations. Let's be a little more accurate; a little truer to the facts involved between Hitlerism and the British-French alliance.

This is the way the little story should read:

"A certain man had two neighbors who lived nearby, one an enemy (previously convicted of murder, arson, and stealing), and the other a friend, so he said to his friend:

"Lend me your gun; I want to be in position to defend myself against my gangster neighbor in case he goes on a rampage as he has in the past. Particularly do I need the loan of your weapon if this gangster neighbor teams up with another nearby gangster who affects the handle-bar mustachios of several years ago."

"But," protested the neighbor, "if I lend you my gun I will be accessory before the fact of a possible killing."

"Oh," said the neighbor, "then I will buy your gun and pay you cash for it. And by the way, you might keep in mind that my gangster enemies have already killed many other neighbors, have taken their property, and have subjected their own followers to cruel tyranny. Further, if your gun helps me give these gangsters a good drubbing your chances of not having to cope with them later are just that much brighter."

With the parable nearer to life, as they are in the revised story, would the answer still be ten thousand times no?

Does Declaration of a Neutral Zone Mean War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, on September 21, 1939, the President delivered to the joint session of Congress a message, in which he suggested that we return to international law. The question which may be asked is, What was the President's purpose in making this request? I shall now quote a few paragraphs to refresh your memory:

It was the so-called Neutrality Act of 1935—only 4 years ago—an act continued in force by the joint resolution of May 1, 1937, despite grave doubt expressed as to its wisdom by many Senators and Representatives and by officials charged with the conduct of our foreign relations, including myself. I regret that the Congress passed that act. I regret equally that I signed that act. * * * I seek reenactment of the historic and traditional American policy which, except for the disastrous interlude of the Embargo and Nonintercourse Acts, has served us well for nearly a century and a half. The step I recommend is to put this country back on the solid footing of real and traditional neutrality.

This recommendation is clear and can be understood by all of us, but the President did not mean that, because he did not ask for the repeal of the Neutrality Act so we could return to international law. I shall now quote what he asks for:

I seek a greater consistency through the repeal of the embargo provisions and a return to international law.

This reveals his real intention, and it is not, as he said, for the United States to return to the traditional policy of international law, for to bring that about would require repeal of all neutrality legislation.

In order that those who read this may understand how plausible and deceptive language may be, I shall quote a few more paragraphs from the President's message:

Repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue.

This should read: Repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the jokers of this issue, because repeal of the arms-embargo clause will give the President unlimited power, which in itself may provoke an incident or causus belli. I do not believe anyone familiar with international law will concede that there is even the slightest possibility that all nations will accept our Neutrality Act as an amendment to international law. International objections may be raised when the President begins to enforce the power given to him by Congress. All nations except the United States subscribe to international law, but we have an act of our own which is to be enforced by the President. Is it now reasonable to believe that other nations will meekly submit to the President's proclamations? I think not, for they might say, "Mind your own business, Mr. President."

Let us put the shoe on the other foot. Suppose, while we are engaged in a life-and-death struggle, a foreign dictator arbitrarily would set aside zones for the ships of his country so that they could carry merchandise to our enemies or enemy possessions. Would we accept such proclamation meekly and submissively? Of course not. We would tell him to mind his own business. We have done that before and no doubt would do it again.

Assuming now that the President gives orders to the Navy to enforce the power given to him by Congress in the Neutrality Act. It is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and Congress has given the President a power in the Neutrality Act which, if enforced, is bound to meet with objections from nations now at war.

This is a phase which Congress must consider seriously before it repeals the arms-embargo clause. In reality the Neutrality Act is unenforceable unless it is backed by the full force of the United States Navy, and then we might provoke an international fight.

I wonder if Members of Congress realize what they are doing in granting such power to any Executive. In addition to its danger, it is also unconstitutional for there is no provision in the Constitution of the United States that gives Congress the right to grant such power to the President by special acts of Congress. As to Congress, it is an indication of weakness, for we, by granting such power to one man, admit that he and his appointees are more competent than 531 Members of Congress. Congress may recover the prestige and public confidence that has been lost for the past 8 years by taking charge of the Government as set forth in article I of the Constitution, and it would not be amiss to assist and advise the President as regards his duties as set forth in article II.

From the President's message:

I now ask again that such action be taken in respect to that part of the act which is wholly inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations—the embargo provisions. I ask it because they are, in my opinion, most vitally dangerous to American neutrality, American security, and American peace.

It is not the embargo provision that is inconsistent with the law of nations, it is instead the Neutrality Act itself. So the paragraph should read in the following manner: "I now ask again that such action be taken in respect to that part of the act which is wholly inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations"—the Neutrality Act. "I ask it because it is, in my opinion, most vitally dangerous to American neutrality, American security, and American peace."

We must not be misled by panaceas or soothing words. The objective of this special session is not to strengthen neutrality. It is instead to give the President unlimited power by repeal of the arms-embargo clause so that he may be released from all legal restrictions, which, of course, will leave Congress responsible for his acts.

It is necessary to understand the minds of those who guide the hand that writes pleasing words and slogans in order to confuse and deceive the public. It is unfortunate when anyone underrates public intelligence, or even that of Congress, employing deceptive phraseology in a document that may mean war or peace.

The Neutrality Act gives the President power to declare war zones, to regulate ocean-going traffic within zones not so declared, and to detain or to prohibit departure of ships under foreign flags. All of these powers may involve us in war. If enforced, they will prove objectionable—not only to nations at war, but also to neutral nations. See section 7b of the Neutrality Act.

The embargo clause is not in conflict with international law. In fact, it is not unusual to place an embargo on merchandise in time of peace as well as war. Nations now at war have placed embargoes on such merchandise as they need for their own use. We have the right to do exactly the same. Such procedure or embargo is not inconsistent with international law. As a matter of fact, there is no provision in such law that compels any nation to sell merchandise against its wishes.

We have been entirely too liberal in giving to other nations secrets of private as well as military value. It is this attitude on our part that is actually responsible for much of the progress in other nations in all fields of production, and it is also responsible for much unemployment we are suffering today. We need embargoes to protect our industry. Embargoes are employed in other nations, and should be equally useful to us. Let us be sensible and disregard the propaganda which is now carried in our daily papers, which is for no other purpose except to instill fear of war. Where is the attack to come from? Surely not another attack from Mars!

The present "spy scare" began in Hollywood and is carried on constantly in our daily papers. This prepared propaganda is for the purpose of making our people believe that they are in the midst of an army of enemy spies. What are these mythical spies looking for? And what secrets are they after? Surely, if we are to believe our daily papers, magazines, and information obtained from congressional committees in regard to the leakage of military secrets, this bogey vanishes of itself. Can anyone in his right mind imagine an army of spies peeping around corners trying to steal secrets that can be obtained on a cash-and-carry basis?

The embargo clause sustains American neutrality because it restrains the unwarranted power granted in the Neutrality Act itself. It is a part of an act that is a declaration of our policy enacted into law. This policy has been recognized and accepted not only by nations at war but by neutral nations as well, and to change at this time will be looked upon with disfavor by such nations as may be affected. It is not a question of our rights, for they cannot be disputed. We have a perfect right to change our own legislation whenever we please, but when such changes affect our position internationally, it is better to wait for a more propitious time. We should follow the precedent established by the late Secretary of State, W. J. Bryan, when he, in 1915, refused to make a similar change in our international policy on the request of one of the powers at war. A precedent established during President Wilson's administration should be equally sound during President Roosevelt's administration. See Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 55.

I quote the President again:

> These embargo provisions as they exist today prevent the sale to a belligerent by an American factory of any completed implements of war, but they allow the sale of many types of uncompleted implements of war, as well as all kinds of general material and supplies. They furthermore allow such products of industry and agriculture to be taken in American-flag ships to belligerent nations. There in itself, under the present law, lies definite danger to our neutrality and peace.

I shall now quote from section 6 (a) of the Neutrality Act, May 1, 1937:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under the authority of section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter be unlawful, until such proclamation is revoked, for any American vessel to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerent state or to any state wherein civil strife exists, named in such proclamation, or to any neutral state for transshipment to or for the use of any such belligerent state or any state wherein civil strife exists.

Violation of this provision is subject to a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for 5 years and confiscation of ship and cargo. The President complains because American-flag ships are allowed to clear to belligerent nations with a cargo of merchandise that is not prohibited in his proclamation. If the President is interested in preventing export of products in American-flag ships, why does he not include all products in his proclamation? It is within his power to do so.

If the President is interested in preventing export of contraband cargo in American-flag ships, he may give orders not to issue clearance papers to ships carrying such cargoes to nations at war, their possessions, and war zones. Contraband articles come within practically the same classification as other war necessities. No special legislation is required to stop American-flag ships from trading with nations at war, in war zones, or any other zones—for that can be accomplished under the present law, by refusing clearance of such ships. As a matter of fact, refusing clearance is the most effective method to enforce our neutrality.

There is no restriction in trading with neutral nations removed from active combat areas, but, I believe, as I have said before, that to prevent mistakes it is better to identify our ships distinctly and to follow trade routes in a straightforward manner. If the destination of such ships is to neutral ports in active war zones, all belligerents should be notified of departure and when entering such zones.

Declaring "emergencies" has become a chronic habit of this administration, to which it is now a confirmed addict. I realize misery loves company, but the habit of the administration is self-elected and certainly not argument for making it a public nuisance. Let us forget this acting and clowning with "emergencies," with spy scares, war scares, attacks from Mars, and other phobias. Are we a nation of hypochondriacs, or are we a nation of sound and sensible American people, able to mind our own business and courteous enough to extend the same right to others?

Let us forget all this planned regulation under which we have operated for 7 years. If there are supermen, let them come out in the open, so we may know who they are. Those who have acted as advisors in this and other administrations are no criterions of ability if we are to judge by results.

The Inter-American Conference of Foreign Ministers at Panama City is another planning body that is liable to give the United States a headache, for they have set aside a sea limit of 300 miles, extending south of Cape Horn, and northward on both sides of South America and North America to the southern boundaries of Canada. This is called a safety zone, a sort of new Monroe Doctrine. As I see it—it means a lot of trouble for the United States, for if we attempt to protect this zone we are bigger fools than I think we are. I shall now give the British version of this, quoting from the Washington Daily News:

> BRITISH SEE NEW PROBLEMS IN SAFETY ZONES
> LONDON, October 4.—The Western Hemisphere's "safety band" is a "novel idea but replete with imponderables," sources close to the British Navy said today.
>
> The sources recalled that the 3-mile limit principle in territorial waters dated back to the days of Queen Elizabeth when guns could shoot no further.
> Commenting on the "safety belt," the London Times said: "Any action taken by an American Navy to enforce prohibitions contained in the [Panama City3 declaration would have no sanction in international law, and such action would amount to an act of war and nothing else.

I am quoting this because it is in line with the points I have made against establishing zones for trade routes outside the 3-mile limit. This is the English version, and those who are now fighting for the Neutrality Act should read this and give serious consideration to the subject now up for debate in the Senate. This so-called safety band does not differ in status from other safety zones which would be established should the President proclaim and designate war zones.

It means war for the United States, as is clearly stated by the London Times, if we intend to enforce our opinion on any nation, neutral or belligerent. Our Neutrality Act, as is clearly stated, has no sanction in international law, and for that reason cannot be enforced by any means short of war.

It is for that reason that I am opposed to the repeal of the arms-embargo clause. Its restriction on shipping to nations engaged in war counteracts the danger in proclaiming safety zones for the routing of such ships. Such safety routes are established indirectly, and comprise such safety bands as are not included in the war zones. Such designation "would have no sanction in international law," and any action taken by our Navy for protection of such safety bands is an act of war. Do not miss the point. This opinion comes from London, England, and I will grant that no power in the world has juggled and used international law to its own advantage more than Great Britain.

Myopic statesmen wrote injustice in the Treaty of Versailles, and hatreds in the Treaty of Trianon. In this partition of innocent vanquished powers, particularly of Hungary, a grave injustice was done. It was such injustices that have made it impossible for tranquillity to be established in a region of Europe that has always been more or less disturbed.

The present war in Europe follows the immutable law of gravity.

The present war will no doubt in time realine and adjust the borders of the central European states along lines best suited to themselves. Self-determination being conceded, why deprive others of that which is recognized as the right of a people?

The World War was nourished by the invisible government in London, Berlin, Paris, and in our own New York. We raised an army and paid for that war. Let the invisible government now raise its own army and pay for the present war.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN, SEPTEMBER 22, 1939

Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Baltimore Sun of September 22, 1939:

Mr. Roosevelt's address to the Congress yesterday possessed in full measure the responsibility and dignity for which the occasion called. In word, in voice, and in manner the President revealed understanding of the gravity of the decisions to be made and understanding of the obligation upon all to rise above political or personal bias. If Mr. Roosevelt can maintain this attitude during the stress of the debate and controversy of the next few weeks, he will serve his country well, and he will set an example which his opponents must respect to the further good of the Nation.

The speech may be divided into two phases: In one the President deals with method in determining the policies of the United States. In the other he deals with content of policies. The soundness of his treatment of method in determining policies is plain for all to see. His objective is to stay out of war. He grants that to be the objective of other responsible men in office and out of office. With agreement on objective, with agreement that "the mantle of peace" is wide enough to cover all, he proposes to move along a course of rational argument in formulating policies that will most probably insure peace; and he promises very soberly to consult with leaders of both parties in the Congress, during periods when the Congress will not be in session, in order that all may be fully informed as to facts in the war which concern the welfare of this people. This is the way of a free, self-governing, self-sustaining people. It is the safe way. It is the way which guards against impulse and passion.

As to the content of immediate policies which offer the best prospect for preserving our peace, the President ably argues for the legislation to which his administration has been committed for months. He finds anything like genuine economic isolation from the belligerents to be a delusion. American experience with embargoes prior to the War of 1812 and the facts of the present situation equally show that an attempt to shut ourselves within economic walls will fail. All the authority of the Jeffersonian hierarchy could not reconcile the American people to the embargo of a century and a quarter ago; and today no one of the isolationist leaders, no one of the advocates of embargo, is willing to go to the American people and say that they should cease all trade with the belligerent powers as a means of guarding against "economic involvement," which some superficial students have insisted was the cause of our entrance into the last war, or as a means of guarding against "incidents" on the high seas which might arouse our people.

A spirited, dynamic people will not consent to be shut in. With that established as the basic fact, the President rejects the argument that economic isolation in a narrow area is either necessary or wise. That is to say, he rejects the argument that we should continue the present so-called Neutrality Act, which lays an embargo upon shipments of arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerents. He shows the inconsistency of embargoing munitions and of permitting the sale and shipment of processed articles which may be assembled quickly on the other side into munitions. He proposes, instead of the halting, inconsistent embargo upon the segment of our trade that is represented by arms, munitions, and implements of war, a policy which will (a) assert and rest upon our rights to trade under international law and will (b) limit the dangers inherent in trade during wartime by requiring belligerent purchasers to pay cash on our shores and to transport their purchases in ships for which they bear the responsibility.

This will permit sale of all commodities, subject to the rules, including arms. The Sun has repeatedly stated its support of this view. If any be concerned about the moral aspects of the trade in arms, munitions, and implements of war, they will find themselves at a loss for argument in reply to Mr. Roosevelt's portrayal of the inconsistency of embargoing the completed article used in war and freely permitting sale of the processed parts which may be assembled abroad into the completed article. If any be concerned about our rights to sell arms, munitions and implements of war, the historic record of our freedom to do so is there for all to see. If any be concerned about the question of neutrality, they will find themselves in difficulty to explain why we should lay an embargo on arms, for the first time in our history, when the practical effect will be to hamper Britain and France and to aid Germany. And if any be concerned with the anger of Germany, the reply is that we already have it, and will have more of it as we continue to sell nonmilitary supplies.

The sound policy for this country, the policy that is in accord with our history and with the temperament of our people, the policy that we can be expected to live under with reasonable comfort and with the maximum of security during the trying days that are ahead, is the policy in which we assert and maintain all our rights to trade and then take our own steps in our own way to limit the dangers that attend trade during war. That is the policy that is embodied in the Hull program. That is the policy that Mr. Roosevelt urged yesterday upon Congress. It should be adopted.

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, announcement of the death of Senator MARVEL MILLS LOGAN, of Kentucky, on Tuesday, October 3, was received with sorrow by his many friends throughout the United States and Canada. I have been acquainted with him since September 1920, when I met him at Boston, Mass., at the Annual Session of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. At that time he was a Representative of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky. Thereafter I met him annually at those conventions until the time of his demise.

When I met him he was attorney general of the State of Kentucky. I afterward knew him as a member of the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky. Then I knew him as United States Senator from that State. All his life he has been active in public affairs. As a Member of the United States Senate he was chairman of the Committee on Claims. This committee considered a bill in which Minnesota people were interested. It affected thousands of families and involved a substantial sum of money. Senator LOGAN was chairman of the subcommittee, and due to his wide grasp of problems of this country, we were able to command his attention and his sympathetic consideration of this important measure. I mention this to show the great humanitarian viewpoint which always actuated him in public life.

His public career is ended but all of us classify him in the language which Lord Tennyson used in his ode on the death of the Duke of Wellington. This language of Lord Tennyson is said to be the finest tribute ever written. He said:

He stood four squared,
To all the winds that blow.

So may it be said of Senator LOGAN that he was a leader in the affairs of Government in this country and his integrity, loftiness of purpose, his outstanding ability, marked him as a man worthy of this tribute.

Of course, I knew him as a friend, and I express the sentiments of a multitude of people when I say that to know him was to love him and that every individual who came within the sphere of his influence was benefited thereby.

Senator LOGAN never lost his touch with mankind and the greater his honors in public life, as well as in his private life, the greater seemed to be his common appeal to the men and women of America. I express what I think is the unanimous sentiment of everyone that knew him:

Green be the turf above thee
Friend of my better days,
None knew thee but to love thee,
None loved thee but to praise.

With the passing of our friend, Senator LOGAN, the fraternal circle has lost one of its great workers and leaders. The world was truly his home, and to do good was his religion. With Senator LOGAN it was a sound approach to life to say that all men were brothers, and consequently he subscribed to those lofty fraternal sentiments which preach the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

I first met him, as I have heretofore indicated, as a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was a representative from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky. I was a representative from the Grand Lodge of Minnesota. As the years passed by, his qualities of leadership in the fraternity were demonstrated, and in September 1929 he was installed as grand sire of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He served in this capacity until September 1930. This mark of distinction is attained by only a few. It came to him in recognition of his outstanding devotion to all of the fine ideals which the great fraternity over which he presided has proclaimed to the world. He was a real leader. He inspired confidence. He practiced in his daily life the doctrines of friendship and love and truth.

He loved his fellow men, and they loved and trusted him. A poem that has touched the hearts of men describes the visit of an angel who interviewed Abou Ben Adhem.

Senator LOGAN, as this man of old, loved his fellow men. I liken him to this character. I close my brief tribute to his memory by commending as typical of the character of Senator LOGAN the sentiment expressed by the ancient friend in the following verse:

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said:
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay; not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

Neutrality

HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM HOWARD E. GROSVENOR

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, of all of the mail received in my office during this period, when the Congress is considering neutrality legislation, I believe the one received by me from the Colonel Winterton Chapter of the Military Order of the Purple Heart to be the greatest tribute ever received from any of my constituents.

This order is made up of veterans who have been wounded in action. They are the ones who fought in the last war, and to their opinion should be given the greatest credence.

The letter follows:

COLONEL WINTERTON CHAPTER, NO. 10,
THE MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART OF THE UNITED STATES,
East Orange, N. J., September 22, 1939.

Hon. ALBERT L. VREELAND,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR AL: At the regular monthly meeting of the Colonel Winterton Chapter, No. 10, Military Order of the Purple Heart, held September 14, 1939, the adjutant was instructed to reply to your recent letter addressed to the commander, Roland C. Smith.

It was the consensus of opinion of the members present at this meeting that you, as our Representative in Congress insofar as this district is concerned, should be charged with the duty of deciding what action the Government of the United States should take on the question of neutrality to be acted on at the special session after careful consideration of the facts available to you in Washington and the opinions as expressed by the members of this chapter, as follows:

Each and every member of this chapter is battle-scarred and is well aware of the cost entailed in life and property, as well as years of suffering by some after, in waging a war. Nevertheless, they are also mindful of the fact that at this time there is loose in the society of nations a system which may, if successful, endanger that freedom we now enjoy, which was purchased at such a sacrifice by our forefathers, unless stopped by some organized effort on the part of those lovers of liberty.

We also believe that all moves of an international nature should be approved by the Congress, as direct representatives of the people, and under no circumstances should the President be authorized to decide major issues affecting the welfare of the Nation; furthermore, there should be no legislation which would tend to eliminate American commerce from the seas.

While the members are wholeheartedly for peace, they are still ready and willing to fight, if acceptable as combatants by the Government, to preserve that peace. To you we have passed the torch. It is up to you to decide. But no matter how you decide, your friends in this chapter will know your decision was made in the interest of all concerned.

With kindest personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

HOWARD E. GROSVENOR, Adjutant.

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY BEFORE THE NEW HAMPSHIRE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at Manchester, N. H., on October 5, 1939, before the New Hampshire Manufacturers Association:

Since accepting your courteous invitation to address you upon this occasion, many things have happened which have had a tendency to distract one's attention from our domestic economic problems. The whole atmosphere of Washington at this time is saturated with war talk; it is charged with a tendency toward further delegation of power and a greater centralization of authority, forgetful of the lesson we have learned in the last 6 years. Not minimizing the responsibility which is ours by reason of the international situation, it nevertheless is my judgment that our main attention should be focused not solely on the continent of Europe and its never ending quarrels and hatreds, but rather on this continent of North America, on which, thank God for the independence and courage of our forebears, we now live; it is here where our primary interests lie and our future destiny rests.

America must stay out of this war! We are called upon to save no democracy except our own. We are under obligation to no one except Americans. Our great burden of responsibility in these days of world crises is to demonstrate to all the world that we can make our own democracy work, and that those who live under its fine aegis can be happy, peaceful, and content.

We have our own business to mind; our own economic and social troubles to cure. The great mass of our citizens are for peace. America can keep out of the war provided its people so resolve and so determine.

In this connection industry has a challenge to answer, affirmative action to take to belie the statement of those who say: "We won't become embroiled in this war unless industrialists on the scent of war profits force us into it." You know, or should know, as hard-boiled, long-headed New England businessmen, that from a purely mercenary viewpoint, you can't afford a war. Why?

Any temporary excess profits your enterprise might conceivably earn during wartime would be wiped out by stupendous long-term taxes which inevitably would follow in the wake of such a war's termination.

Moreover, the inescapable depression which follows every war would have to be faced and met with the terrific price it exacts.

Finally, do not idly dismiss the probability that our involvement would lead to conscription of all industry with iron-clad Government control, no profits, followed by Nation-wide peacetime regimentation.

No; war would be too costly even from that standpoint. Such considerations are those not taking into account the most costly price of all—the price paid in human life.

There is no question about it, our participation in the war will mean the temporary obliteration of much that the American people have come to regard as the essentials of their civilization, and that the dictatorship necessarily set up for its conduct will be continued.

During the war free speech, free press, and free assembly will be restricted. The profit system will be scrapped, labor organizations will be enchained, party government discontinued.

We will have a central government of arbitrary powers rationing out food, clothes, and necessities; dictating what job each individual may have; fixing prices; seizing all profits.

The price in money of conducting a war on such a major scale will be paid in an inflation which is almost an inevitable consequence. With the concomitant wiping out and destruction of the people's savings there will be higher taxes and lower living standards, and all living costs will rise concurrently.

When the war ends and peace comes, so also will come the inevitable business crash as dislocated industries throw out unwanted workers and new labor-saving devices make renewed unemployment more lasting than even today.

In these days of turmoil abroad the narrower considerations of partisanship give way to the deeper concerns of patriotism. We must, however, never lose sight of the fact that real Americanism always asumes, and genuine patriotism demands, the arrival at sound national policy by the orderly processes of honest debate, the essence of democracy. This Nation is of one mind—that is, to keep out of this war and to avoid the terrible slaughter and destruction incident to our military involvement overseas and participation in the age-old wars of European power politics. But to say that we are of one mind does not mean that the successful steps of our national program are not a proper subject for careful deliberation and honest discussion among all the people.

I have no purpose in this presence to be pugnaciously partisan, but I am speaking to you as a Republican, and as such I am constrained to comply with your request and to discuss the situation as I have seen it, and as I understand it.

(1) What, then, did Congress do for business in the Seventy-sixth Congress?

(2) What will it do in the next regular session?

(3) What should it do?

Here, then, are some things that Congress could do to help business:

Congress could back-track to the clear and overwhelming "mandate" given it and the Democratic administration in 1932.

The President of the United States has referred to "a mandate" many times since March 1933. But the mandate he received was unmistakable. It was drawn up at Chicago and the President flew to Chicago in a melodramatic manner to add his pledge to the promises of the Democratic Party. Those promises—it may come as a shock to us today—included:

"A 25-percent drastic reduction of governmental expenditures;

"A call upon the Democratic Party in the States to make a zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result;

"A Federal Budget balanced immediately;

"A sound currency to be preserved at all hazards;

"A removal of Government from all fields of private enterprise."

This was the real "mandate" of the American people. They stated clearly that they wanted Government to stay out of the mess, that they'd attend to it as they had done before. They were ready to pay the fiddler for their bad judgment by declaring emphatically that they would not tolerate any easing of their debt obligations through tinkering with the standard of money.

The people had an opportunity to take another course, to issue a different mandate. There was, as you will recall, the Socialist platform:

"A Federal appropriation of five billions for immediate relief;

"Five billions for public works and roads, reforestation, slum clearance, decent homes for workers;

"A shorter day and week without reduction of wages;

"Free public employment agencies;

"Minimum-wage laws;"

and so on.

But the people wanted none of political magic, or doles, or dictation from the District of Columbia. The leader they chose was the one who decried the growing number of boards and commissions and bureaus, the leader who expressed their belief—and in their homely words—that "taxes come from the sweat of every man who labors;" that "liberal governments are wrecked on the shoals of loose fiscal policies."

The leader they chose was one who expressed, in a stirring speech, a belief in States' rights and that individual liberties would go when the Federal Government attempted to run everything.

Yet not a single plank in the Democratic "mandate" has been carried out; while, despite the opposition of a militant minority, practically every plank of the Socialist platform has been put into operation.

Now, socialism is the direct antithesis of the American free enterprise system. Socialism is the political operation of the machinery by which a people exchange the products of their labor, trade their services, undertake new enterprises. The half-way house on the road from free enterprise to socialism is—

Political control of the machinery;

Control of the people's earnings and savings;

Political control of the set-up of industrial and agricultural and commercial operation;

Control of the relations between manager and employee;

Control of the myriad activities of the market place;

Control of every act of every enterpriser who brings money, labor, machines, and materials together and takes products and services to the market place;

Control that begins with the financing of the project and follows through to the label of the package;

Control of banks, labor relations, oil, coal, lumber, telephones, retailer, stock and grain exchanges, insurance;

Control of the social problems of States and cities;

Control by supervision, and also by competition, as in the case of the Federal yardstick for power;

Control by means of 153,000,000 compulsory reports from business management last year.

This control exercised by some 137 Federal boards, bureaus, commissions, incorporations, and authorities—a majority of which agencies pass laws daily in the form of rules, regulations, and judgments often based on arbitrary opinion and personal whim.

Government by men instead of law.

The money cost of this control, great as it is, is not the real hindrance to recovery today. The real hindrance comes from the thing we are fighting, the tremendous increase of taxes and enormous peacetime borrowings. That sum is equal to the gross income of all the States west of the Mississippi. It is a sum equal to one-third the earnings of the American people. But even at that, the genius and drive of business management could take this tax burden in its stride and forge ahead if it were not for the greater obstacle which has been erected by the tax money Congress appropriated ostensibly to speed recovery. This obstacle is composed of new controls of business operations by executive bureaus.

Now, control in itself is not bad, but when this control is of the uncertain kind, in that bureaucrats have the power to change the rules overnight and change them back again the following day, then you have an obstacle indeed. Congress used to write the rules in the true American way, on the statute book, so that anyone could read if not understand. Today Congress has been obliged, because of the magnitude of the socialistic program to "make America over," as Professor Tugwell put it, to delegate lawmaking to executive departments. Today, hour by hour, thousands of rules, "interpretations," Executive orders, with all the effect of law, carrying penalties of fine and imprisonment, are made by more than fifty-odd new bureaus, boards, commissions, authorities, set up without definitive powers and more or less under the domination of the Chief Executive. Here are a half dozen examples:

Mr. Andrews, wage-hour administrative agent of our lawmaking body, Congress, announces he has reversed himself in exempting from the Federal law those white-collar employees who receive a monthly salary of $200 and more. Here is placed in the hands of one man the power to prescribe the working conditions of more than a million citizens, the power to throw thousands of operating budgets into the red. Whim or caprice, or political favor, may rule his decision. In this case Mr. Andrews admits he is rewarding a special group which, he says, "has done such a swell job in helping me fight my battles." The special group in this case was a labor union, but it would have been just as reprehensible and disturbing to business planning and venturing if it had been the United States Chamber of Commerce.

This is a two-headed monster. It looks both ways. It is not unreasonable to assume that some man occupying such a place of authority might by a parallel act do labor everlasting, destructive damage. The people—labor and management, are confronted with a problem which outweighs the question temporarily in the scales. Labor might do well to ponder, in the light of recent events, its own position in the picture should the Government continue to take and exercise such control.

A ship carrying whisky was rammed and sunk in harbor. The distiller applied for refund of the $2-a-gallon revenue tax, following the procedure prescribed in official regulations. The Alcoholic Tax Bureau informed him that the regulations had been changed; the consignee was the one to apply. The new regulation was followed only to have the consignee informed that another regulation provided the application must be made within 30 days and the time had expired. But finally, after months of bickering, the bureaucrat approved the refund on the ground that the amended regulation had not been published.

A Senate committee found 70,000 regulations in the Internal Revenue Bureau were not open to the public.

Some one of the score of young men and ladies in the Federal Trade Commission, whose job is to read the newspapers, found the manufacturers of granite tombstones were misleading their customers by calling granite "everlasting." Some day they may even rule that an affidavit must accompany a can of milk from contented cows to the effect that no single cow is discontented. The Commission has ordered a manufacturer to mark his fabrics "rayon" because they look so much like silk.

The Labor Relations Board adds injury to insult in its tyranny of prolonged hearings, some running into months, with stenographic records at times extending into the tens of thousands of pages. Its decisions enter the dangerous realm of the intent of the accused. It decides that the philosophic sayings of Henry Ford circulated for 25 years now are circulated with intent to embarrass the administration of Labor Department.

The Michigan Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, set up by the Department of Agriculture, requires each farmer who receives livestock on credit to sign an agreement that he will not "at any time prior to the final liquidation of my loan * * * do anything that is in opposition to the A. A. A. program."

The Social Security Board will soon decide whether agents of life-insurance companies are subject to the act, and the decision is to be on the strange ground that if the company exercises a high degree of control over its agents they and the company are taxed, whereas a loose control and directions makes the company exempt.

Let's bring it right home to Manchester. According to the Associated Press the National Labor Relations Board, in a decision described as "unique," has ordered the Wambec Mills, of Manchester, N. H., to pay 2 years' wages to two skilled workers it never actually hired, and to hire them immediately.

There was no public announcement of the action of the Labor Board that usually accompanies such decisions, but it was learned that the decision, the first of its kind, was handed down several days. J. Warren Madden, Chairman of the Board, and Edwin S. Smith, member, signed the order.

In July 1937 Alphonse Chartier and Edward G. Geoffrion, described as experienced silk-mill workers, applied for jobs at the mills. The men went through all the steps preliminary to getting employment and the employment manager was said to have promised them both jobs. After investigation at the nearby mill where the two workers had been previously employed, it was found, according to information here, that the two men were described as "trouble makers" and when they reported for work at Wambec Mills they were told the jobs were not available.

The N. L. R. B. version of the matter was that the men were not trouble makers, and the Board ordered the company to pay them wages from the time they reported for work and were turned down up to the present, and further ordered the mill to hire both men now.

And in so many instances the citizen has no redress at court. The decisions of boards and bureaus are in many cases without court appeal. Courts will not entertain motions on the part of the citizen who feels he has been aggrieved on the ground that the courts have no jurisdiction. This is not a partisan statement. Two ardent new dealers, Senator Logan, of Kentucky, and Congressman WALTER, of Pennsylvania, both of whom have voted for every piece of New Deal legislation setting up these boards and bureaus, admit that great injustice has been done. They admit it in the form of an appeal which they presented to Congress 3 weeks before the regular session ended—an appeal that was brought out unanimously from the Senate Judiciary Committee and passed by the Senate. Upon the personal plea of Senator MINTON it was to be reconsidered. The House Judiciary Committee brought it out unanimously. The appeal provides—of all things in this land of the free and home of the brave—that a citizen still has the right to be tried by a jury of his peers.

It is a shameful admission that the Bill of Rights and the Constitution have been violated by New Deal legislation. The passage of this bill will be a palliative one. Congress should review its legislation and definitely place limits beyond which this great new bureaucracy cannot go, because it has been shown that an appeal from a Labor Board decision has cost those citizens who have made such appeals an average of $20,000. This makes it impossible for the small-business man to get relief.

Up here in New England 150 years ago the executive powers of Great Britain were extended to such an extent that our people rebelled. That executive, King George, had sent his bureaucratic appointees to the Colonies along with his tax collectors. The sturdy colonists went to war because of it, and announced to the world that they went to war because their ruler had "sent hither a multitude of officeholders to eat out our substance and harass our citizens."

We have multiplied this fully 10,000 times today in the United States, and only by a realization of the whittling away of our individual freedom and the building up of a ruling class which has taken place can we give a mandate to our representatives in Congress to restore the free enterprise system to America.

Enough of that background material. The Seventy-sixth Congress brought forth a change. The corporal's guard of vocal dissenters from such a program was enlarged and strengthened. At its insistence a change materialized. It accomplished many things, as many of you are aware.

What did it do for business? Here is the answer, in part:

(1) Although the appropriations for expenditures by the Federal Government were originally close to $10,000,000,000, an effort was begun in July to push through Congress a bill for novel and questionable forms of projects, and for an attempt to evade the statutory limit on the national debt by borrowing and spending outside the Budget approximately $2,700,000,000 more. Reduced in form, this bill passed the Senate. It was defeated in the House. The House refused to consider it, and against the spendthrift leadership of the administration forced at least a beginning of economy.

(2) The Senate passed a bill authorizing the United States Housing Authority to raise a second $800,000,000 and give another $45,000,000 to its borrowers. The House refused to consider this bill.

(3) In the face of official insistence of an appropriation of $850,000,000 for so-called relief, the sum was originally cut to $725,000,000 and later raised to $825,000,000. Congress did away with the prevailing-wage theory for skilled persons; required them to work for a reasonable time for their security weekly wage; required that careers on relief be ended through an 18-month rule; did away with theater projects and the like; and gave less in appropriations than had been officially requested.

(4) Against militant opposition it put its stamp of disapproval upon the creation of a bureaucracy fraught with political consequences inimical to the best interests of the Nation, by passing the Hatch bill which provides penalties for attempts to use relief workers for political purposes, and provides that any employee in the executive branch except the policy makers, is to lose his position if he engages in any political activity.

(5) It passed the revenue act, which abolished the tax on undistributed profits; placed the rate on corporate net income at 18 percent; allowed corporations to carry forward net operating losses for 2 years; permitted corporations to declare a higher value on capital stock this year and next for purposes of capital stock and excess-profits taxes; and ameliorated several provisions of law causing hardship to individuals and corporations. Hundreds of millions of dollars in future taxes saved to both labor and industry.

(6) It made extensive amendments and revisions in the Social Security Act, particularly as to old age insurance, the benefits of which were increased while being made payable 2 years earlier, beginning on January 1, 1940, while the tax rates at 1 percent were prevented from advancing on January 1. By virtue of its provisions, in the future small nonprofit organizations will be relieved from a ruling that their unpaid officials are to be counted as employees to make the organization employers of eight or more subject to the Federal tax of 3 percent on actual pay rolls. Freezing the pay-roll taxes at 1 percent saved many millions to industry and labor for the days to come.

(7) Under Republican leadership, it insisted that the limitation upon the total public debt at $45,000,000,000 should not be raised.

(8) Despite the persistent evasion of responsibility by the administration, it provided for investigation by a special committee of the House of the National Labor Relations Act.

(9) Efforts of the administration to obtain from the Rules Committee a rule necessary for consideration of amendments to the wage-hour act were defeated, and the act was neither altered, amended, nor repealed.

(10) Appropriations for the Army and Navy were about equal, each receiving between seven hundred and eight hundred million dollars, for naval aviation fields, shore stations, the accumulating of strategic materials; for civilian-pilot training; the creation of a Coast Guard Reserve; the building of a highway across the Isthmus of Panama; the manufacture and purchase of aircraft instruments and aeronautical accessories; in short for adequate national defense.

(11) In the face of determined administration resistance, Congress forced a measure of tax revision to relieve business of crippling punitive levies and established a special recess investigation to recommend general tax codification to the next session.

So much for a partial list of the legislation enacted.

We fought for economy at every step of the way in the last session, and that fight most assuredly will be pressed in the next term. However momentous may be the problems and issues ahead for American business, however challenging the foreign situation may appear, orderly finances in government remain a cardinal requisite of real national strength and security. Our program does not contemplate the merciless and heartless disregard of the unemployed or the unemployable. But here, as in every other aspect of government, we are dedicated to honest and efficient administration, to the elimination of political racketeering, and to the direction of all relief funds to those actually in need.

We tried in both the House and Senate to restore the power over money to the Congress, where, under the Constitution, it rightfully belongs. That fight surely will go on, for the American people appear to be in no temper to have their monetary system permanently on a 24-hour basis. A stable currency and a fixed money are the foundation stones of productive enterprise, under whatever conditions of emergency or tranquillity.

Next, our side attempted to curb the increasing tide of foreign imports from the bankrupt nations of Europe and the Orient. Recent events have given us great assistance in an economic way, where as a minority in Congress our objectives could not be wholly accomplished by legislation last term. Our dedication to the principles of solid protection for the American standard of living and wages, and preservation of the home market for our American farmers, still stand as beacon lights of Republican policy. These, likewise, are cornerstones of true and lasting American prosperity.

A special committee of the House is at work seeking codification of the Federal tax laws, with a view to removing unnecessary shackles upon enterprise, thrift, and prudence.

Assuredly there will be new tax legislation at the January session. It must be legislation calculated to strengthen our economic position on the home front. It must be based upon the traditional American concept that taxes are designed for revenue, not to serve as vehicles for vast and untried social experiments often at war with the principles of private enterprise and constitutional self-government by consent.

Reverting to Europe's catastrophe—America can best serve the entire world by remaining out of war.

When exhaustion lays the nations of Europe, who shall feed them, if not America? Whence will come the materials of reconstruction and rehabilitation? Indeed, our economic vitality may be the sole thread to save European civilization from the abyss of chaos. But what of this assistance? Should we bleed our own economy white by direct military participation abroad? What if we should involve our own financial system to the point of wild monetary inflation? Who then would succor the victor and the vanquished alike in their terrible agony of economic prostration and social disorganization after an exhausting general war?

America's first line defense is along the economic front at home. Strong, vibrant, robust, unafraid, we could be the true benefactors of stricken Europe. But weak, uncertain, anemic, and fearful of our own security, we would be unable to carry to the Continent that morsel of aid which might avert another Dark Ages.

What will we undertake to do at the regular session, do you ask? We shall continue to undertake:

(1) To curb unnecessary, wasteful, and reckless spending.

(2) To make such necessary amendments in the Federal tax structure as will eliminate or modify the provisions which are retarding business recovery.

(3) To so amend the National Labor Relations Act as to clarify the mutual obligations of workers and employer, and the duties of both toward the public, in order to end the present paralyzing discord.

(4) To repeal the dangerous discretionary authority which the President now has over the nation's monetary system; define specifically the area of government competition with private enterprise, so that business may be able to create jobs with some certainty as to the future; clarify and codify and publish the existing rules and regulations so that industry and business may know what to expect.

(5) To restore American markets to the American farmer and wage earner, and develop new markets for agricultural products, to such an extent and insofar as the existing situation aboard may make it possible so to do.

(6) We shall oppose and reject all experimental legislation not clearly helpful in promoting recovery, or which would subject agriculture, labor or industry to the compulsory decrees of a Federal bureaucracy.

(7) Keep the United States out of war.

It has been well said, and it may be said again, that this Republic is founded on inalienable liberties. It is dedicated to the dignity and personality of individual men and women. It is consecrated to truth, justice, tolerance, and mercy. These liberties and obligations are inseparable. If political freedom, intellectual freedom, or economic freedom are any one of them undermined all the others will fall.

These high purposes of this Nation are being undermined by the policies now pursued at home and by alien theories from abroad. Our first great mission is the preservation of these principles.

Today economic progress is being paralyzed. That destruction is the destruction of social progress. The imperious necessity of America is to restore economic productivity and thereby jobs for men. That alone can support our humanitarian aspirations. For social progress in care of the aged, the young, the ill-fed, the ill-clad, the ill-housed there must be parallel economic strength. Economic restoration is our second great mission.

We are the living custodians of the torch which fell from the hand of Abraham Lincoln. Cooperating we may again rekindle the heart and mind of America with the glow of hope and promise for the future. Congress faces an opportunity for a service to a great people. Congress means business. What are you going to do about it?

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK, OF MASSACHUSETTS, AT THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK, of Massachusetts, at the national convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Boston, Mass., August 29, 1939:

As we view the happenings of recent years—yes, even weeks, in certain countries of the world, we realize more profoundly what it means to be an American citizen. In looking over world conditions we have directly called to our conscious mind the meaning of our institutions of government, and of the benefits that flow from our priceless heritage.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," is as true today as when uttered and fought for by those courageous heroes of the Revolutionary days.

Here we enjoy and possess a government that recognizes that state is not supreme—omnipotent—the beginning and end of man's existence.

Here we recognize that God himself is omnipotent; that while government is necessary in order for a people to live and exist together, it is the servant and not the master of its people, with all sovereign and political powers ultimately resting in the people.

Here, as individuals, we possess personal liberty, freedom of religious conscience, freedom of speech and of the press, the right of peaceful assembly, of petition to our public officials, of the sanctity of the family life being protected, of the protection of property lawfully obtained, of the right of a trial by a jury, and the other human rights set forth in the Constitution, rights that government itself cannot abridge or abrogate.

Here, my friends, the dignity and the personality of the individual is guaranteed and protected. History has shown that the destruction of the dignity and personality of the individual is the first attempt made upon personal liberty, the first effort being made in an attack on religion, all religions, either directly, as in the case of Soviet Russia, or indirectly, but just as destructive, as in the case of Nazi Germany.

Under our constitutional democratic processes of government, no governmental policy of persecution can exist, such as exists under certain totalitarian nations. Individuals might, but, thank God, our Government, as such, cannot engage in such a vicious policy. While, unfortunately, we have had in the past vicious movements of intolerance and bigotry due to weaknesses, prejudices, and emotional reactions of unthinking persons responding to the indecent and un-American appeals of those who exploit them, our constitutional Government has never engaged and can never engage in such contemptible practices. Every American should realize that bigotry is not only indecent but un-American. It violates the spirit and the intent of the Constitution. This is a proper time for the strong condemnation of efforts that are now being made to again array American against American because of a difference of race, color, or creed.

Here we have a Government that recognizes the omnipotence of God, and not of man, as the source of all rights and powers, and that man is responsible to God for the manner in which he exercises his powers. Our Government—a government of laws and not of men—has its origin in love, love of God, and love of neighbor, not, as in certain dictator-controlled nations, in hate.

If we keep this important fact in mind, we can then understand more clearly the reasons for the actions of those governments which are following the course of hate.

Hate carries with it the application of force and violence, hypocrisy, deceit, a disregard of the rights of others and of equity and justice among nations.

Hate appeals to the baser thoughts of man. It attempts to destroy the forces of good and to substitute therefor the forces of evil.

The history of man records, and present-day events clearly show, that where hate obtains control the rights of man disappear.

Let us not forget that what we possess was not created by Americans of today. Our Government was born by men who knew from experience the results of oppressive and personal government, of men who fought oppression to establish great principles of government and to put them into operation. Today that Government is ours—a great heritage. It is our duty to preserve it. It is our individual duty to vigorously and intelligently, rationally and not emotionally, perform our responsibilities to that end.

The first duty of government is self-preservation. Within its means, a government must provide for its national defense. If a government does not perform that primary duty, those in control are recreant to their tasks. The conditions that exist throughout the world, the dangers imminent from other nations, the policies of other nations, are prominent factors in determining our policies of national defense. We have been blessed with an excellent geographical location, but we are not justified in these days of rapid travel and communication in placing too much confidence upon this factor alone.

It is our duty to have navy and air forces and an army that are not only capable of adequate defense but which will be powerful enough to command respect—yes, fear, if necessary—in the minds of any nation or combination of nations that might cast their envious and covetous eyes in our direction.

Six years ago our Navy was in a helpless condition. Our air forces and our Army were negligible. We were unprepared. I remember well the fight that I and others made in the House in 1930, 1931, and 1932 to prevent, on the plea of false economy, our Army being sharply reduced from its then small level.

Today, thanks to the foresight and leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, our beloved President, and the Members of Congress who supported him, our Navy stands prepared, our air forces are being rapidly increased, and our Army is being prepared for any future emergency. During the period, for illustration, from 1922 to 1929, inclusive, we built only 17 naval vessels, 9 cruisers, 3 submarines, and 6 river gunboats, totaling 83,710 tons. During the same period Great Britain built naval vessels totaling 325,832 tons; Japan, 324,401 tons; France, 271,118 tons; and Italy, 204,320 tons. From 1929 to 1933 we built nothing to speak of.

According to a recent Navy Department statement, since March of 1933 there have been completed 106 new naval vessels, all now in commission. These include 4 aircraft carriers, 8 heavy and 9 light cruisers, 27 destroyers, and 21 submarines.

There are at present under construction 8 battleships, 2 aircraft carriers, 38 destroyers, 20 submarines, 6 light cruisers, and a score of smaller craft and auxiliary vessels.

Our defenseless position of 6 years ago has been changed under President Roosevelt.

In the carrying out of that program President Roosevelt and the Members of Congress who supported it—this program of preparedness—received the wholehearted support of your great American organization, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. Let us give credit where credit is due.

As we view recent world events, with European imperialism undimmed, with unholy alliances being made between forces of world revolution and destruction of our ideals, forces far more powerful today than only a few days ago, with combination of nations of this type seeking to impose their will on others, employing any methods necessary, and acting upon the vicious theory that "might is right," in my opinion it will be our duty, of necessity, to further increase our elements of national defense to a point that will assure the protection of our priceless heritage. A navy is not built after a war starts. Whatever the world conditions might be in the future we must be prepared to meet them.

So long as powerful nations pursue the policy of "might is right," much as we dislike it, we must be prepared to meet force with force. In a lawless dominated community the law abiding must use extraordinary measures for their protection. Where lawless nations exist a law-abiding nation must govern itself accordingly. Our security is in preparation. So long as some nations persist in their substitution of the reign of terror for the reign of reason, as I see it, we must establish a policy that represents the maximum and not the minimum requirements of protection. Unless world conditions change materially soon adequate protection calls for further increases, particularly in our Navy and our air forces.

We must remember that the rights and benefits that we possess carry with them the duty of protecting them and our Government. The obligation of protecting our priceless heritage is a duty that we cannot shirk—it is one that we will not shirk. An adequate national defense is an important instrument to that end.

In describing the United States, a historian of repute, of another land, termed it as "an invulnerable state of states; an indestructible country of countries; an impregnable nation of nations."

That is the United States of today, created by the fathers of the country and the framers of the Constitution, and passed onto us by generations of the past.

It is our responsibility and duty to keep it so—to be prepared to meet all attacks from without or from within—to preserve for ourselves and for posterity the "inherent and inalienable rights" of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Unjust Freight Rate Discriminations

RESOLUTIONS UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED AT A MEETING IN LITTLE ROCK, ARK., FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1939

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That we, the members of a conference assembled in Little Rock, Ark., representing agriculture, industry, and commerce, in an area comprising 10 Southern States, most earnestly appeal to our Senators and Congressmen to fight for the removal of unjust freight-rate discriminations which have been imposed upon this great southwestern area.

Industry cannot develop and agriculture cannot thrive in this area until transportation costs have been reduced and such reduction made secure. We beg of our Representatives in Washington to oppose any conference report on the Wheeler-Lea transportation bills unless and until the amendments adopted by the House have been incorporated in the conference report, together with other amendments necessary to insure low-cost water services to the Middle West, South, and Southwest.

Regulation of port-to-port freight-rate structures by the Interstate Commerce Commission means increased freight costs to the producing and consuming public. We urge our Senators and Congressmen to oppose any conference report on transportation which does not contain an iron-clad mandate to the Interstate Commerce Commission which will insure to the public who pays the freight the economies of low-cost water services for which Congress has expended hundreds of millions of dollars to provide.

We urge upon our Representatives in Washington to give careful and sympathetic consideration to the reports of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chairman of the Maritime Commission, which show clearly and conclusively that the legislation proposed in the Wheeler-Lea bills is not in the public interest.

Respectfully submitted.

Northwest Citizens About To Be Bilked Again by Federal Agency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, Minneapolis and St. Paul citizens and people in the entire Northwest area should rise up in united protest against another steal now being promoted here in Washington by big-business interests of the East.

The proposed price-fixing plan for bituminous coal, if we allow it to be adopted by the Board of Examiners of the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of Interior, will place an added strain not only on business and industry but also on every individual pocketbook in our great midcontinent area. It is just another one of several similar Government edicts which have been put across in favor of selfish eastern interests at the expense of the people of the producing West.

Its effects will be similar to the baneful results which have come to us by reason of the workings of the "Pittsburgh-plus plan," now called the multiple basing point agreements. It may even be as bad as what has happened to us by reason of the unjust rates and discriminatory treatment which has been handed the Northwest for years since the rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission began in the United States.

It will not only add from $1 to $2 or perhaps $3 per ton to individual fuel bills but it will be reflected in higher gas and electric rates and in more severe competitive conditions for our factories and industrial establishments, perhaps causing us to lose still more of them, thus making more severe our unemployment situation and our tax burden.

An illustration of how the price-fixing proposal will raise the cost of coal to the consumer is as follows: From southern Illinois mines to Minneapolis and St. Paul the all-rail rate on steam-size coal is $3.32 per ton, as compared to the rail-and-river rate via Alton or east St. Louis of $2.50 per ton. The barge rate for domestic sizes is $2.70 per ton, as compared to an all-rail rate of $3.60.

From Kanawha River points to Minneapolis and St. Paul the combination rail-lake-river rate is $5.55 per ton, and the all-water rate is $3.50.

But the proposed plan not only fixes the price at the mine on the basis of the all-rail rate but it further penalizes the use of the waterways by fixing higher rates for coal which moves by rail and water than by all rail.

Similar discriminations are included in the prices for the upper Mississippi River area from the Omar No. 4 mine of West Virginia, except that the discriminations are greater. Further, the price on rail-water coal, f. o. b. at the mines in southern Illinois for delivery in the Twin Cities, is approximately $1 per ton higher under the Commission's new proposals than the all-rail price from the same mines.

In addition to that, the all-rail prices at the mines will be increased so that the consumer who now enjoys the saving resulting from the transportation of coal by water will not only be deprived of this substantial water saving, but must pay a higher price for coal received by rail.

And to intensify the transportation handicaps of our interior section, where freight rates are already excessive, the Bituminous Coal Division has exempted from the penalties imposed on the interior, water-borne coal for industry and commerce located along the Great Lakes and on the Atlantic coast, where industry already had a decided transportation advantage.

This is discrimination of the rankest type against the Midwest localities and should not be allowed to stand. We should take strenuous steps against it.

SUGGESTS STRIKE AGAINST FEDERAL TAXES AS REMONSTRANCE AGAINST UNJUST TREATMENT

My experience here in Washington has not only confirmed my convictions on this subject, but it has also forcibly impressed me with the realization, that the Midwest area has long suffered under an economic system in which we have enjoyed a position little better than that of provinces.

I have studied these various problems for several years as I have noted with pain how the lifeblood of our State has been drained by the destructive regulations fostered and aided by the Federal Government. One is forced to wonder if it would perhaps not be better for rich producing sections such as ours is, blessed with such great natural wealth and resources, to set up an organization separate from the Federal Government in all except matters of national defense, postal and monetary affairs, and perhaps a few other functions.

There seems good justification for some sort of serious action not only because we are suffering severely under the trade rules and under an economic system forced on us by the Federal agencies, but also because such a huge system of government as we are building up in Washington is more expensive than when administered locally; and also because statistics show that we 12 States of the Northwest paid more into the Federal Treasury during 5 years of the depression, from 1933 through fiscal year 1938, than we received back.

The States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio paid into the Federal coffers in total taxes during that period $5,704,947,055 and received back in Federal benefits only $5,686,081,000. In other words, each of the over 18,000,000 inhabitants of these 12 Midwest States paid in an average of $144 per person, and we received back only $143 per person from the Federal Government. And the chance is pretty strong that we would not have needed even that much, had we not been bled white by such schemes as the Pittsburgh-plus plan, the unfair rates promulgated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and others, and now presently by the plans of the Bituminous Coal Commission.

Another good indication that our section is not progressing but is fast going down hill, instead of growing as we did prior to about 1916, is in the fact that in 1934 we lost one of our 10 Representatives in Congress, so that now we have only 9. Why? Because other States are growing larger, while we stopped growing or got smaller.

We have had a lot of strikes, and I hate them as much as anyone possibly could, but if we cannot get a little more consideration and justice from these Federal departments here in Washington, I suggest that we all go on a strike against paying in any more taxes. Our slogan should be, "No more income taxes, no more cigarette, liquor, amusement, gasoline, or social-security taxes unless and until we get our just deserts."

Who will take the leadership for such a movement and save the Midwest from complete enslavement by the blase eastern interests? Something should be done, and at once.

OUR WEALTH DRAINS TO EASTERN FINANCIAL CENTERS

As matters stand at present, the wealth produced by our farms, forests, mines, and natural resources flows to the eastern financial centers aided by these nefarious governmental rules and rates. Our own State is one of the greatest producers of natural resources in the Nation, but still we are in the depth of a terrific economic depression with over 100,000 people out of work and poverty-stricken, if not starving to death, while our wealth in the iron mines, in the forests, and fields flows and continues to flow to the metropolitan centers of the East. What can the end or the answer be unless we all awaken from our indifference and act in unison as I have suggested?

Abe Lincoln, the Ferryman

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES M. TUCKER, SECRETARY OF STATE OF INDIANA, ON THE OCCASION OF THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW INDIANA ABE LINCOLN FERRY PARK, ON ANDERSON CREEK, NEAR TROY, ON SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1939, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE BOONVILLE PRESS CLUB

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an address made by the Honorable James M. Tucker, secretary of the State of Indiana, on the occasion of the dedication of the new Indiana Abe Lincoln Ferry Park, on Anderson Creek, near Troy, Ind., on the 1st day of October 1939, which ceremonies were held under the auspices of the Boonville Press Club of the State of Indiana. The splendid address given by Mr. Tucker follows:

This is the site of the Lincoln Ferry, where the boy, Abraham Lincoln, spent the greater part of his seventeenth year operating a ferry across what we now call Anderson Creek, but which was then known as Anderson River. We are met here at this dedication to once again pay tribute to the greatest man, not of divine origin, who has ever lived on this earth. No man in the annals of history has left an impression that has ripened and grown greater with the passing of years than that made by Abraham Lincoln from the date of his birth until his death in 1865 at the hands of an assassin. Honest, diligent, shrewd, strong, manly, and above all humane are only a few of the many adjectives that may be used to describe the life of this great man.

History, we are told, is the story of man and his achievements. As time has passed the names of many men have been engraved upon the pages of history. There are many who have risen to fortune, fame, and glory but of that great number there are only a few who have pressed their personalities upon the forefront of history with such vigor as to withstand the ravages of the ages. As we view those of long ago so will future generations view those of whom we think in terms of yesterday.

Let us turn back the pages of history and note the great whose names have been so indelibly carved thereon that their fames have lasted until this day. Twenty-three hundred years ago, namely, in the fourth century B. C., Alexander the Great held sway over all of the then-known civilized world. In a span of a few short years this young man had conquered kingdom after kingdom and empire after empire until, as we are told, he went up on top of a mountain and wept because there were no more worlds to conquer. Alexander's name is still written with those of the great men of the world, not only because he succeeded in conquering the world, but because his conquests brought a fusion of eastern and western civilizations, the marks of which have lasted until this day.

After Alexander there came other great men, but none so outstanding as Julius Caesar. In the first century B. C., Julius Caesar rocked the entire foundation of the world and gained an immortal place in history as a result of his placing himself at the head of the Roman State. Under the tutelage of Caesar, Rome rose to the mastery of the world—not alone by force of arms but by intellectual accomplishments. The works of Caesar and those who have followed after him have lasted even unto today. Without him the entire face of history would have been changed—our language, for example, would not be the same without its Latin base. As in that, so in many other things the Latin influence is felt, and the reason in most cases goes back to the dominant characterists of that great man.

In the latter part of the eighth century there arose in what is now France a King of the Franks, who was able to make order out of the chaos that resulted from the fall of the Roman Empire. That man, Charlemagne, succeeded in shaping an empire that rivaled that of Caesar in its extent. Truly the impression that he has made on history is a lasting one. Without the strength and foresight of Charlemagne, the entire face of Christian civilization might have been changed into a Mohammedan one. It was Charlemagne who preserved Europe for Christianity and thus permitted the civilization that we know now to come into being.

In more modern times there, too, arose in France another whose greatness is the more remarkable because he sprang from nothing to become the ruler of continental Europe, a feat equally daring as it was valiant, for Napoleon Bonaparte found France a weakened republic and built it until it held sway over all the nations of Europe except England. Napolean is not alone remembered for his victories, but for the many economic and legal improvements that he inaugurated during his reigns.

However, in a brief glance at those five men—five great men of the past—one thing flashes forth; one word alone is common to them all—conquerors. Each of them sought to foist upon the people and the world of their time, their ideas, their ideals, their desires, and their will in order that they might make names for themselves and to glorify their achievements in years to come. Contrast their outstanding characteristics and the fame that has lived after them with that of Lincoln, and therein you can see why Lincoln is the greatest of all men that has ever lived. Lincoln's sole idea in his work was to make this world a better place in which to live; not for white or black, rich or poor, or aristocrat or commoner, but for everyone. Lincoln's fame has lasted and grown brighter with the years, because he did not climb the ladder of success to fame and fortune over the broken bodies and gutted fortunes of conquered peoples; nor was his climb one of a person intent on personal glory. It was one that was made without any intention of creating a name for himself, but fame grew from the glories of his achievements made for the betterment of the human race. The unsought-for fame attained by Lincoln far surpasses in brilliance that of any other great man of history, who devoted their lives to the making of themselves famous.

In reading modern history too little attention is paid to the formative years of Lincoln's life which were spent here in Indiana. It was that period from his seventh to his twenty-first year wherein the boy Lincoln grew to become a man, and it was in those years spent here in Indiana that the foundation for the great life that he led was laid. Here he was taught the great unity of America. He was a riverman. He worked on the river. He made many trips up and down the Ohio and twice made trips to New Orleans by flatboat from Rockport. These experiences had a strong effect in molding his character. To him the Ohio River was not a boundary between Indiana and Kentucky but it was a connecting link between the place of his birth and the place where he spent his boyhood life. It was not in Lincoln to contemplate his beloved Ohio as a hostile border. To him the Ohio and the Mississippi and their connecting links were the arterial system of a great nation which they bounded together and which gave to it its very life. It was incomprehensible to Lincoln to believe that the Union should be divided. He could not contemplate it being divided at the Ohio, which was the natural place of division, and he so stated in his first inaugural address. It is for us as Hoosiers to forever impress upon people and upon history the fact that that great ideal of Lincoln's life was taught to him while he was here in our beloved Hoosier State. While he was here, Lincoln had many jobs. He was hired out to James Taylor, an enterprising farmer, whose home was about one-half mile up the creek. While he worked for Mr. Taylor, he also did some general farm work and worked as a butcher. His regular pay was $6 per month, but he was given special wages for his butchering. It is interesting to note that the regular rate for butchering was 25 cents per day, but Abe, because of his size and strength, proved to be so efficient as a country butcher that he received 6 cents extra per day for his services; in all, 31 cents per day. He often used an expression in later life that he acquired from his experience as a country butcher. Once when a dignified group of visitors called on him at the White House and in expressing their sympathy for the President because of the terrible burden the war put upon him, Abe surprised them by remarking, in an absent-minded way, "Yes; it's sure a hard hog to hold."

Picture, if you will, the young Abe moving from his hill home in Kentucky to a new land here in Indiana. See him as a boy of 7 crossing the Ohio and coming here to spend the most formative years of his ife in our State. It seems to me that that can be likened to the grinding of a piece of glass. The glass is taken to the grinder rough with no definite form, and by a process of polishing and rubbing the edges are worn away and a smoothed, polished, mirrorlike surface is the result. The experiences Abraham Lincoln had here in those 14 years were the polish that made him the man he was later to show to the world. Here Abraham Lincoln learned what it was to work for a living. True it was that he worked for Mr. Taylor, but the $6 he received as a salary per month from that went to his father, and he remarked often in later life of the time he earned his first dollar. Secretary Seward, during Lincoln's Presidency, wrote down the story in the President's own words of that experience, and this is what he said:

"I was contemplating my new boat, and wondering whether I could make it stronger or improve it in any part when two men with trunks came down to the shore in carriages and asked, 'Will you,' said one of them, 'take us and our trunks out to the steamer?' 'Certainly,' said I. I was very glad to have the chance of earning something and supposed that each of them would give me a couple of bits. The trunks were put in my boat, the passengers seated themselves on them, and I sculled them out to the steamer. They got on board, and I lifted the trunks and put them on the deck. The steamer was about to put on steam again, when I called out, 'You have forgotten to pay me.' Each of them took from his pocket a silver half dollar and threw it on the bottom of my boat."

Here the President paused and gave thoughtful emphasis to the remainder of his statement.

"I could scarcely believe my eyes as I picked up the money. You may think it was a very little thing, and in these days it seems to me like a trifle, but it was a most important incident in my life. I could scarcely credit that I, the poor boy, had earned a dollar in less than a day; that by honest work I had earned a dollar. The world seemed wider and fairer before me. I was a more hopeful and thoughtful boy from that time."

It was here, as a result of his activities as a ferryman, that he gained his first experience and knowledge of the law. Kentucky jurisdiction, as you know, runs to the low water mark on the Indiana side. It does now and it did then. There were two Dill brothers operating a ferry across the Ohio at this place under a Kentucky license. They filed charges against Abe and brought him before Squire Samuel Pate, justice of the peace of the Commonwealth of Kentucky on the other side of the river, charging Abe with running a ferryboat without a license. Abe pleaded his own case. He was too poor to hire a lawyer to plead for him and it was well that he was because from that brush with the law Abe gained his ambition and desire to become a lawyer. His defense was that he did not take passengers across the river but only to midstream so that they might board the steamers that passed by here but would not stop. There was no other way for them to take such steamers at this place, likewise there was no law governing such a situation. It was a work of simple necessity. He had not "set them over the river" and he therefore had not violated the law, for the Commonwealth of Kentucky did not require a license for such services. Abe's logic at this early date served him as well as it did in later life, for Judge Pate ruled with him and dismissed the charges.

We find in reading history that Abe was a flatboatman of excellence. He could not only build flatboats but could handle one with the best of them. It is amusing also to note that it was Abe's experience from having been a flatboatman and having learned the art of building them that the Union profited during the Civil War. When the Swedish inventor John Ericsson came to the Navy Department with his proposed draft of the Monitor early in the Civil War, he received no attention whatever. His plans were ridiculed. The Secretary of the Navy refused to have anything to do with it. At that time the Union had already established its blockade of all Confederate ports, when, suddenly, the Merrimac, an ironclad ship belonging to the Confederates, proceeded to wreak havoc upon the Union Navy by ramming and sinking its wooden ships with impunity. There was consternation in the Federal Navy Department, but during all this time Ericsson had quietly kept on with his plans because he knew his "cheese box on a raft," as it was called, would work. He had, in desperation, appealed to Lincoln, explaining to him his plan of placing a revolving turret with a cannon on the flat surface of a boat or ship. Lincoln listened to Ericsson and approved of his plan and told him that he did not know much about ship building but he did know a great deal about flatboat building and that Ericsson's plans certainly met all the requirements of good flatboat building. You are well acquainted with the result. It was Ericsson's Monitor that fought with the Merrimac, the first navy engagement between ironclad ships, which not only saved the Union cause in the Civil War but revolutionized the building of naval ships throughout the world.

The advent of Lincoln upon the political stage in 1860 was so opportune that to us it seems as though he was ordained by God to be chosen for the task he so ably mastered. No other man, in that darkest of hours for this Nation, had the foresight, diplomacy, and patience with which to battle a rebellious South and a recalcitrant North. Lincoln had the ability to foresee the futility of attempting to rear two nations in the confines of what is now the United States. Geographically and racially we know now that we were meant to be but one people, but there were many, in the North as well as in the South, who were unable to foresee that then.

Lincoln's sole ambition, his sole desire, his every living breath was for the preservation of the Union. To that end he was willing and did sacrifice his home, his family, his fortune, his political future, and above all, his life. No more sad thing and no more dastardly deed was ever done than his assassination after the work was done. One cannot but think that the hectic and trying days after the war would not have been had Lincoln lived on.

Throughout the entire conflict Lincoln's patience, though sorely tried at times, never faltered. Time after time, when generals would fail to do what they should have done, causing a reverse to the Federal troops, Lincoln would forgive them and give them another trial. During the war a great many of the northern soldiers were youngsters and away from their homes, would desert. When captured, the commanders, who wished some semblance of discipline to be preserved, would have them court-martialed and ordered shot. The appeal to Lincoln from a soldier so condemned never went unheeded. He would order the papers of the case sent to him and would promptly forget the whole incident, much to the chagrin of his generals. Truly Lincoln's humanity was so great that words are unable to convey the extent to which Lincoln would go to aid others in avoiding suffering. A man absolutely devoid of anger and passion in his relations with others is most ably described by his own words in his second inaugural address when he said "with malice toward none and charity for all." As late as March 1865 he further expressed this sentiment when he met the Confederate commissioners attempting to negotiate peace, telling them that if the rebellious States would agree to come back into the Union as they were before the war and to free the slaves they could name their own terms.

Noble, thoroughly cognizant of what he desired to do and willing to sacrifice all that that ideal might be reached, patient and steadfast, diligent and untiring in his efforts for the culmination of that ideal that the Union might be preserved, Lincoln lived to see the completion of his work and the successful accomplishment of that for which he so nobly strived. However, the saving of the Union is not his only claim which rears him to an immortal place in the seat of fame. This man of many characters on the 19th day of November 1863 gave to the world and to posterity the greatest utterance ever spoken by the tongue of men in the English language. Rhetorically, literally, in beauteousness of phrase his Gettysburg Address transcends any other literary masterpiece ever made by the hand of man from the beginning of time, in its breadth of feeling, deepness of thought, and clarity of reason. As we read it now we are at a loss to understand the ability of a man to put together such euphonious phrases containing such an explicit statement of the American ideals of citizenship in a masterpiece that required less than 15 minutes for its delivery. But Lincoln did that as he did everything else—no flare or no pomposity. As was his life so was his Gettysburg Address, a direct and simple statement of his beliefs.

Lincoln with his nobility of soul and purpose has done what no other great man has ever done. As time has passed on, his name has not become dim with the passing of the ages but has year by year, when the magnificience and effect of his works has been realized, grown brighter in the minds of men. His life was such that we cannot but help note the similarity between it and that of the Master. Like Christ he lived for others, and like Christ, he sacrificed all that he held dear that humanity might live in a better world.

Because of the man he was, the things he did, both great and small, Lincoln transcends all territorial and racial boundaries—he belongs not to America but to the world as its most brilliant apostle of human freedom. In history the name of Abraham Lincoln has stood forth above all others in the past, it so stands forth now, and will so stand forth in the future and forever.

"As some tall cliff that lifts its rugged form
Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

ARTICLE BY HEYWOOD BROUN

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Heywood Broun which appeared in the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, October 3:

[From the Washington Daily News of October 3, 1939]

IT SEEMS TO ME

(By Heywood Broun)

I wish to arise to a question of personal privilege, but in part the subject does lie in the domain of public interest. Once upon a time it was a general newspaper practice to give a man a chance to reply when some damaging charge was made against him. Now it seems increasingly customary to shoot the yarn out and let the injured party try to catch up under his own steam. And once a story has a start of 12 or 20 hours a denial has to be extremely agile ever to catch up with it.

On Saturday a man named Joseph Zack told the Dies committee that I had been a member of the Communist Party for 2 years. He said I joined in 1928. Out goes the story over press-association wires and into the columns of the newspapers by which I am directly employed. The New York Times was the only paper with sufficient courtesy and devotion to good journalistic practices to call up and ask what I wanted to reply. I have never seen or heard of Zack to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I doubt whether he is familiar by name or reputation to any city editor or managing editor.

On several occasions I have stated that I have never been a Communist. And something over a year ago I testified to this fact before the Dies committee. Now I am neither a liar nor a perjurer. I have been in the newspaper business continuously for more than 31 years. And so it makes me good and sore when some unidentified stranger can get up and take a crack at me without any newspaper offering me a chance to reply before publication. I realize that Stamford is a 30-cent phone call. It makes me particularly sore when the paper for which I work does a thing like that to me. And I also say it's bad newspaper work, because it is a matter of not particularly obscure record that during the time Zack assigns me to membership in the Communist Party I ran for Congress on the Socialist ticket and took a pretty thorough shellacking in the columns of the Daily Worker, which always referred to me as Hey Gin Broun. And the Worker also carried some excellent cartoons in which I appeared in a perambulator being wheeled around by Norman Thomas.

I am not arguing right now about political or economic interpretation of this or that. Or "radical" or "liberal." I simply state again for the tenth, and, I hope, the final, time that I have never been a member of the Communist Party for 2 years or 2 minutes. And that, I think, is enough or maybe too much of personal note. However, there is a public stake in such matters. A single item can do enormous damage to persons far more important and infinitely more virtuous than myself. I know enough of the time element in the making of a newspaper to realize that there are situations in which it is not possible to get both sides of a story immediately. But even if the story can't wait there ought to be an obligation to set forth the fact that the party of the second part has not yet had a chance to say his say. It isn't a question of redress. It's a question of fair play at the beginning. Libel suits are no good in circumstances where they may seem to be warranted. That's a sucker's game in the first place, and the practice might be abused into constituting an actual threat to free press. There used to be a day when indignant citizens stormed into newspaper offices with horsewhips, but even up here in rural Connecticut it's years since I've seen a horsewhip. Additionally I might, on occasion, find myself on the wrong end of the whip. And punching people in the nose never gets you very much after you have turned 50. I guess I'll just have to take it out by saying in this single column that I'm good and sore, and that I'm going to continue that way. When I swear that a thing isn't true then no newspaper and no prattling Zack can pin it on me. I won't go for it. After all, I've saved up $34, there are bullheads in the pond behind the house, and the woods abound with edible roots and wild berries.

EDITORIAL FROM THE RICHMOND (IND.) PALLADIUM-ITEM

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an editorial appearing in the Palladium-Item, of Richmond, Ind., of date October 2, 1939, which eulogizes the splendid work now being done by the Dies committee of the House of Representatives. May I say, in passing, that I sincerely hope each Member of the House will take the time to read the illuminating editorial which is embraced herein and give calm reflection to the far-reaching results of any continuance of the policy which the Dies committee has discovered to exist in our own Government.

The editorial follows:

[From the Richmond (Ind.) Palladium-Item of October 2, 1939]

HOW DID THEY GET THERE?

Representative DIES, chairman of the congressional committee investigating un-American activities, was authority for the statement that the Justice Department has been ordered by the Roosevelt administration to get rid of about 2,850 persons in Government service who are known to be Communists. President Roosevelt later denied any such action was contemplated.

How did those 2,850 Communists get into Government service? Someone had to appoint them to the positions they hold. Were those who did the appointing such dumbheads that they did not know they were appointing enemies of our country to positions in the Government? Or were they secretly sympathetic with communism and Communists and were they helping the game along? Has the Justice Department known right along that these persons involved were Communists? If so, who has kept that Department from taking action long ago?

Were thousands of Communists employed in Government positions when either Hoover, Coolidge, Harding, Wilson, Theodore Roosevelt, McKinley, or Cleveland was President? No? Well, then, why suddenly do so many Communists appear in Government service under the administration of Franklin Roosevelt?

Are 2,850 Communists the only ones in Government service? Or are there hundreds or thousands more of these persons there?

We are fortunate, aren't we, that Congress set up this committee to investigate such subversive activities? Fortunate that Representative DIES is chairman of the committee, a man who has investigated regardless of the political results. How many remember the time when President Roosevelt expressed displeasure with the work of the committee? How many recall the many unpleasant remarks made by various persons connected with the New Deal about the committee being a "red" baiting organization?

Do you approve of the work and findings of the Dies committee? If you do, does it occur to you it is queer that President Roosevelt does not come out publicly now in expression of his appreciation for the patriotic work that committee is doing? He has stated he is sorry he signed the present unneutral neutrality law. So he can express regret for a personal mistake. Why does he not, therefore, express regret for his disparaging remarks made some time ago concerning the Dies committee and now congratulate it on the splendid results accomplished?

An Answer to Senator Borah

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address I delivered Tuesday, September 19, 1939, at 7:45 p. m., over the National Broadcasting Co. network, radio station WJZ, as follows:

At the outset I am unalterably in favor of keeping out of the present and all wars. I am in favor of doing everything humanly possible to avoid our entrance into war. I shall vote for a war resolution only when our national sovereignty is imperiled, if the very life of our Nation is at stake. I shall vote for every reasonable, sensible measure with this objective in view and reject all bills that directly or indirectly impinge upon this principle. I do not want a recurrence of that fantastic period between 1914–17 when America made its last frenzied journey along the road to war and ruin.

The issue is not as the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [WILLIAM BORAH] stated over this station the other evening—intervention or nonintervention. It is simply methods of neutrality. Unlike the distinguished Senator, I cannot lose sight of the fact that radio, television, radiophotography, the magnitude of international trade, high-speed airplanes, the well-nigh annihilation of time has brought nations closer together. In 1914 the Atlantic Ocean, 3,000 miles wide, had never been spanned by an airplane. Now planes traverse it in little more than a day. Mechanical ingenuity has given it the aspect of a narrow channel. Virginio Gayda, fascism's leading newspaper spokesman, a short while ago threatened that Italy and Germany would soon meddle in American affairs and that the United States is "not protected by distance." The wife of our President has stated that her recent transcontinental tour convinced her that people are beginning to doubt that the United States can isolate itself from the rest of the world. In truth and in fact, we cannot. We are a dependent nation, commercially and economically. For example, we must import many articles to insure our economic progress and our commercial supremacy; to mention but a few—sisal, hemp, tin, rubber, manganese. We are not indeed a self-sufficient people.

Senator BORAH sets up a straw man. He says the opposition maintains that "because Europe is so 'near' to the United States, owing to modern inventions and the mingling of business affairs, that neutrality is impracticable if not impossible." Nobody in his right senses could argue that so-called "nearness" to Europe makes neutrality impossible and none of us seeking the arms-embargo repeal has set up such an argument. Such is but a figment of the Senator's imagination. Whether we are near or far, we must remain neutral but, nevertheless, that "nearness" must give us pause. We cannot live in a vacuum. Our latitude and longitude cannot make us insensible to what is going on in Europe. If our present rigid policy of so-called neutrality and isolation has frankly aided a culprit and aggressor nation, namely the Reich, and has practically denied help to victim nations, it is time to call a halt. Our closeness to Europe cannot blind us to Nazi brutalities nor to the Soviet's perfidy.

The Senator says that in Washington's time, South America was practically divided between Portugal and the Spanish Crown and the West Indies and Central America belonged to England, France, and Spain. Therefore, America was "smotheringly close" to Europe yet Washington, continues the Senator, issued his neutrality proclamation. Again the Senator sets up a straw man. We, seeking the arms-embargo repeal, are also for neutrality to the *n*th degree, yet wholeheartedly support Roosevelt's proclamation of neutrality. But Washington acted through fear. He was beset by all the nations mentioned. His was an unavoidable policy of embargo and nonintercourse while British warships impressed our seamen and captured our ships and Barbary corsairs and French privateers exacted tribute from merchantmen.

It is well to remember that in 1794 Gouverneur Morris wrote: "I am tolerably certain that, while the United States of America pursue a just and liberal conduct with 20 sail of the line at sea (armaments) no nation on earth will dare insult them. One thing I am thoroughly convinced of, that if we do not render ourselves respectable, we shall continue to be insulted." Our Nation was blockaded. American frontiers were attacked. There was a compelling reason why Washington, abetted by Hamilton, was neutral. He had no choice in the matter because there was "no 20 sail of the line at sea"; he had no Navy and no Army with which to fight. He knew that force then, as today, is the final arbiter between nations. Citing Washington's neutrality is meaningless in connection with the type of present-day neutrality.

The Senator seems to imply that repeal of the arms embargo would constitute an unneutral act because it would mean actually taking sides in the war. That statement involves a non sequitor. Repeal is not taking sides. He says that because France and Britain can buy arms in this country and Germany cannot, "is that not intervention in the present European war?" I fail to see how that is "intervention." Frankly, under his strained and illogical point of view, we are now intervening. I must remind the Senator that under the present law it is eminently proper and fitting for traders to sell to France and Britain all possible supplies and materials which go to make armaments and munitions. We sell, without let or hindrance, steel, scrap iron, oil, airship parts which are subsequently reassembled. Germany, lacking control of the seas, cannot make purchases of such vitally necessary war materials. By Senator BORAH's own test, we are thus "intervening." Yet he wants the present act continued. The present act bars arms and munitions but does not bar many vital war materials. What is the distinction between the two? Secretary Hull very succinctly points out that under the conditions of modern war lists of contraband are no longer limited to arms and munitions. I agree with the Secretary that life-giving wheat is just as important as death-dealing gases.

The Senator argues that repeal of the arms embargo and the setting up of the so-called cash-and-carry idea would enable us to furnish arms and implements of war to one group of nations and deny them to others, and, therefore, is not that taking sides or intervention in the war? I again say emphatically "no!" Indeed, such a change would be a healthful return to the principle of neutrality as it was understood during the 145 years of our history. Never before have we tried to map our laws on neutrality according to the geographical advantages and disadvantages of belligerents. We never distinguished between arms and the steel and copper that makes them.

Italy has just renewed her sailings to America. She can buy anything and everything. She is not a belligerent. She can transship her purchased American arms and munitions to her axis partner, Germany. It is true the law forbids transshipment, but such is well-nigh impossible of proof. Mussolini could ship Hitler his own Italian-made arms and munitions, etc., and replace same with American products. That would be sticking to the law. Thus our present BORAH unneutral neutrality becomes the means of aiding the much-hated Hitler through Italy. And now the ghoul Stalin, who shares the corpse of Poland with his brother ghoul Hitler, can feed him more American arms.

Furthermore, the present statute gives the Reich an equivalent of an Atlantic Fleet, as it keeps American munitions from Britain and France with just as much certainty as if the German Navy kept British and French ships from carrying our guns and implements of war.

Canada is a declared belligerent. She, therefore, cannot buy now as much as a single airplane, no matter how much needed for her home defense, although Italy, and now Russia, open allies of Hitler, can buy all he, Hitler, wants. I say this also despite the fact that our President has interpreted the Monroe Doctrine as requiring us to go to war in the event of an attack of aggression by an enemy upon Canada.

Our Nation does not want war, but does want a change in the Neutrality Act. I believe that the vast majority of our people are behind this Roosevelt-Hull idea of cash and carry. A recent Gallup poll showed that 89 percent of our people favored it. The majority of our people would not advocate the change if they believed the Senator was right.

The Senator, who has always been a stickler for international law, fails to realize that the present act flies in the face of international law. It has always been the studied purpose of the United States from our very beginning to advocate and practice unrestricted trade in arms and munitions. It had never been the practice of any nation (except now Germany and other aggressor nations) to maintain in time of peace large military establishments or stores of arms and ammunition to repel invasion by a well-equipped and powerful enemy. If such arms embargo were adopted in the early days by other nations, the consequences would have been very serious to the United States. We were always compelled to buy from abroad most of our munitions. In the event of an attack by a foreign power, it would be a very serious disadvantage for small nations, particularly at the outbreak of war, not to have the right of such purchases. Secretary of State Lansing, in 1915, echoing the views of his predecessors, especially Thomas Jefferson, pointed out that the United States had always depended upon the right and power to purchase arms and ammunition from neutral nations in case of foreign attack. This right, which it always claimed for itself, it cannot now deny to others. Former Secretary of State Stimson strongly endorses this policy. If the Borah proposal were adopted and every nation would be compelled, in consequence, to have in readiness at all times vast stores of munitions of war to meet every emergency, every nation would thus become an armed camp.

Senator BORAH is an advocate of peace and so am I. His present theory would force militarism on the whole world and would work against universal peace. The very Washington whom Senator BORAH quoted on neutrality was a stern advocate of this practice of international law. To adopt Senator BORAH's theory would be playing into the hands of the present-day military despots. It would make most nations, unable to buy arms from us or other neutral nations, the prey of the current crop of deluded Caesars.

Furthermore, as I see it, there is no such thing as "neutrality" in thought or deed. In a recent fireside chat our President said, in part: "I cannot ask that every American remain neutral in thought. Even a neutral has the right to take account of facts." How can anyone in his right senses, how can anyone with any degree of humanity, within him, remain neutral in the face of that dreadful sea tragedy, the bombing of the Athenia, caused by the deliberately criminal action of the Nazis? Many innocent lives have been lost. This ship was torpedoed by a German submarine without warning. More than 300 American citizens were aboard. That bombing was in violation of a treaty which the United States has with Germany. It was an act as wantonly cruel as that which sank the Lusitania.

"I will not fight against women and children," said Hitler, in his war message to the Reichstag. "I have given my air force orders to restrict its actions to military objectives." As he spoke, German planes were dropping bombs on women and children in Polish cities. Maybe he can make us believe that terroristic bombing of a city is an attack upon a military objective. Heart-rending atrocity stories appear daily. Women and children were blown to fragments by bombs aimed, of course, at "military objectives." He has released a military terror in Poland that inevitably leaves men, women, and children crushed under the ruins of their homes. The Germans themselves release handsome photographs of the gutted and lifeless villages that mark their path in Poland. And now Stalin has entered the "blitzkrieg." How can one be neutral in thought in the face of such stark cruelty and betrayal?

The present Neutrality Act leaves belligerents free to buy in our markets war essentials such as oil, iron, steel, and copper, and permits shipments of same by American merchant vessels. There is thus nothing to prevent our becoming involved in seizures and other difficulties, in English and French blockades. The amended Neutrality Act voids the possibility of any such dangers by introducing the principle of "cash and carry," or "come and get it." This means that all belligerents would be free to buy all goods, provided they pay for same in cash and carry same away on their own ships. Also, no cargo destined to a belligerent could leave here until the American shipper had divested himself of all financial interest. Thus the new act would minimize our becoming involved in the war. The Senator failed to emphasize these advantages in the new bill. Of course, such a cash-and-carry proposal favors Britain and France. They have the cash and the means of carriage. They control the Atlantic. That may be unfortunate for the Reich. Hitler may regard such a change in our statute as an unneutral act. Let him. Frankly, in my opinion, the more we can aid England and France, by "measures short of war," as Roosevelt has it, the better. For lack of a better term, I would call the proposal of "cash and carry" a sort of "benevolent neutrality" toward the Allies.

Defeat of England and France would surely undermine our security and bring Hitlerism and Stalinism close to our doors. Aid to these democracies now is our greatest insurance against another war.

We in America have the perspective that permits us a realistic insight into the problem our neutrality creates in the present conflict abroad. We will be "bombarded" by propaganda from the belligerents. This is inevitable. But the issue to be faced is a cold and hard one. If unfortunate circumstances insure Hitler's success eventually, especially in the light of his unholy alliance with Stalin, his gleaming eye may be cast in our direction as "next" in his grandiose program for world domination. Fantastic as such a future may seem, we find his agents here desperately active in their attempts to effect a "peaceful penetration" of what it pleases the Nazis to call their ideals. Should Hitler be defeated, we shall not have to consider this very ugly possibility.

A revision of the Neutrality Act, I am confident, will prevent the recurrence of the so-called incidents that led us to participate in the last holocaust. This in itself is a paramount objective. A revision of our Neutrality Act will serve to establish England and France on a more equitable footing in their "last stand" fights against the totalitarian menace. A revision of our Neutrality Act now may save us many hours of bitter despair in the future.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTER FROM HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed to the people of North Carolina by the senior Senator from that State [Mr. BAILEY] on the subject of neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the People of North Carolina:

In view of a multitude of letters, it seems advisable to make a candid statement to the people of North Carolina on the subject of legislation intended to preserve the neutrality of our country for the purpose of keeping us out of the war.

There are three subjects before us: (1) The existing law; (2) the House bill; (3) the Senate committee bill, reported out September 28, and before us only since then. In due course there is likely to be a fourth, the conference bill, in the final phase, in the nature of a compromise between the pending bill and the bill passed by the House in the recent session. The first three have been approved, in their time, by the President and great numbers of people, and they have also been opposed by many. It is likely that the fourth—the conference agreement, yet to be wrought out, will likewise be both approved and opposed. We must read our letters in light of these facts, and interpret many received prior to September 28 as either supporting or condemning a measure that was not made known until that date. Let it be borne in mind that under the rules a bill in new form may be wrought out and submitted by the conferees of House and Senate, and such a measure will not be subject to amendments from the floor of either branch of the Congress.

Nevertheless, one may be sufficiently definite with respect to the matter before us, and this is my purpose in this public communication.

First of all, I am for keeping this country out of the present war, and I shall go far in the future to keep it out of any war. The welfare of the human race demands of us that this country shall escape the disaster and ruin entailed by modern warfare. The preservation of our constitutional democracy and the welfare of our people is more important to mankind now than ever before. Moreover, I have the utmost abhorrence of any policy that could possibly ensue in the sending of our boys to battle. If we ever fight, it must be on our own shores and in the defense of our homes against invaders and oppressors. Commerce is not worth the cost of war, and peaceful means of promoting it are more effectual than the means of force. I am not inclined to think that so-called international rights are worth the cost of war; and here, too, the methods of peace are more effectual. I believe that the involvement of this country in a war at this time, even if we should be successful, would tend to bring this country to ruin and our people into poverty, and hundreds of thousands of homes into incurable sorrow. We should prepare our defenses in the highest degree. We must have a great navy, a great merchant marine, and a well-trained, efficient, and modern military equipment. Some of us may not like this, but we are dealing with the world as it is, and we must remember that there are in the world nations that seem disposed to take whatever they can, whenever they can, wherever they can. Power to resist there must be. Our peace may not otherwise be preserved.

With the foregoing convictions governing me, I have decided that the new legislation, as reported by the Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, will tend more to make for the peace and security of our country than the existing law. The new legislation, when adopted, will remove our ships not only from the ports of belligerents but from zones of danger designated in the bill as combat zones. The existing law leaves our ships free to sail the seas regardless, carrying other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war. We may be sure that the distinction will not be observed. A merchant ship carrying food, cotton, tobacco, or people would be just about as likely to be attacked in the present situation as a ship fully armed and carrying airplanes, explosives, or guns. I subscribe to the policy that we should not only play the part of a neutral but we should also avoid provocation and seek to avoid incidents that might inflame our people and change their minds, now so profoundly attached to peace.

The policy proposed in the new legislation has also the virtue of being consistent with the international law of neutrality and with the historic policy of our country. That is to say, the new bill is in accord with experience and is approved by time and the customs of nations. It will be understood everywhere as actually and historically neutral. The only deviation from the standards of international law lies in the fact that we of our own motion withdraw our ships from belligerent ports and zones of combat. This is done in our own interest and to avoid incidents that might change the temper of some of our people from peace to war.

There are those who say that to change the law, now that war has started, is not sound policy and will be regarded as unneutral. I do not think this position can be sustained. When the Congress adjourned in August notice was given not that we would maintain the present law but that we would postpone action on the subject until the next session of the Congress. This was fair notice to all concerned that we might change the law. In addition to this we do not owe any obligation on this point to any nation. No treaty rights are involved. No moral obligation is implied. We have right to frame our policy in the interest of our peace, and this right is fortified by the fact that we propose to change it in the direction of historic international law and our historic policy as to neutrality.

On the subject of our relations to other nations, I do not intend to make utterances tending to arouse emotions or to create irritation. Let us pursue the true course of neutrals. We may have our attachments and we may have our antipathies, but let us be careful not to make utterances tending to inflame feelings. I have said this because I propose to present here what seems to me to be the essence of our situation.

We have a choice to make. We may choose to maintain the existing law, knowing that it is not consistent with our historic policy, knowing that it is not the only course consistent with the accepted international-law neutrality, knowing that its consequences may be to aid Germany and her allies and to deprive England and France and their allies of the normal means of defense and of sustenance, or we may support the proposed law, knowing that it is in accord with our historic policy and with the historic standards of the international law of neutrality, and knowing that it will, without risk to our ships and without risk of money or men, tend not to deprive England and France and their allies of the means of defense and of sustenance which normally are available to them not by reason of anything we have done, but wholly because they may control the Atlantic and Mediterranean Seas against their enemy—if indeed it shall be proved by events that they can.

Confronted with this choice, there are many considerations, but the consideration that appeals to me with the greatest force is a moral consideration, which I will not undertake to elaborate now, as I am sure our people know what is going on in Europe and what is involved. Whatever may be said on behalf of the German leader, it must be said that he has shown to the world that no obligation is binding upon him and that there is no way to deal with him by way of covenant or agreement. We and those who come after us in this country will have to deal with world powers and we may justly desire to deal with powers which respect their agreements and which do not hold that might makes right. We may now set a precedent that will serve us well in the future, for we can never hope to treat successfully with powers not subject to accepted moral restraints.

The motive in the pending bill is that of providing the security of the United States by avoiding involvement in the existing war. To this motive we must steadfastly hold in all events. The policy outlined in the bill is not so much one of aiding England and France as it is one of not contributing to the plans of Germany and her associates. And it is because it is considered that the existing law does unintentionally so contribute to those plans that we have for months been setting about to revise it. Since we are unwilling to aid England and France, surely we must see to it that we do not assist Germany and her associates by following a policy recognized the world over as unnecessary to neutrality as defined by international law.

I could well stop here, but I am impelled to add that I deeply desire that this country shall not pursue an abnormal policy, unnecessary to neutrality, the consequence of which would be to further the plans of the German leader. If he should succeed I do not wish it to be said that we aided him. We have an account to give to posterity and to the God of nations, to the Righteous Ruler of the nations who exacts at last of every nation and every ruler, and indeed of every human being, even to the third and fourth generations, the penalty of iniquity. He is a covenant-keeping God and requires that rulers shall keep their covenants. He does justice and loves mercy and in due time visits His judgments upon all cruelty and upon all who persecute and oppress His offspring of every condition, race, and creed. The Creator of men created also the moral law. It is self-executing. This moral law is the warp and woof of civilization. Others may forget but we must always remember that it underlies and sustains all abiding law. Soon or late it blesses all who observe it and overthrows all who disregard it. These considerations do not justify us in taking steps that might involve us in this war, but they would rebuke us if we should maintain a policy, unnecessary to our neutrality, the consequence of which would be to contribute to the plans of the German leader.

We must make it plain beyond all question that under no circumstances or temptations will we lend money to England or France or engage our country or its sons in this war.

Finally, let me say a word of comfort to those who are fearful that we will by some means become involved in this war. I do not think we will be involved. None of us can forecast the long future. I see no likelihood that within 2 years we will be involved, and 2 years from now, I hope we will be able to look forward to another 2 years of national peace and security. Our people are determined upon peace. Let them maintain this determination.

With all good wishes,

Very truly yours,

JOSIAH W. BAILEY.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY HON. JAMES J. DAVIS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by me, published in the Philadelphia Inquirer on September 20, 1939, on the question now pending before the Senate.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUEST COMMENTATOR DAVIS CALLS NEUTRALITY WEAK FORM OF INSURANCE—WE CAN STAY OUT, BUT POSITIVE ACTION IS A NECESSITY, PENNSYLVANIA'S SENATOR SAYS—COOPERATION URGED

The Inquirier publishes herewith another in a series of guest comments, reflecting the opinions of prominent citizens on important public issues.

The invitation to contribute to this symposium of citizen opinion was issued without any restrictions, and the choice of the subject was left wholly to the individual. Obviously, therefore, opinions expressed in this and following articles of the series do not necessarily coincide with the editorial policy of the Inquirer and may even be in direct conflict with it.

Another guest comment, by another prominent American, will appear in this position at an early date.

(By JAMES J. DAVIS, United States Senator from Pennsylvania since 1930, "Puddler Jim," immigrant boy and steel worker, was twice nominated without the support of the State Republican organization. Served as Secretary of Labor under the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations, where he aided in formulating an application of the quota immigration law and was cosponsor of the Davis-Bacon bill, forerunner of the act which fixed minimum wages for employees of contractors doing Government work. Prominent in fraternal organizations, has been director general of the Loyal Order of Moose since 1907)

"There can be no question as to the desire of the great majority of our people to keep free from war. The question is how we may escape involvement in the titanic conflict that is now raging in both Europe and Asia. Certainly no strong reliance may be placed on negative measures.

"Something more than the enactment or modification of neutrality legislation is necessary. At its best neutrality legislation is a weak form of national fire insurance. It is the attempt through legislation to prohibit the activities of our citizens that might jeopardize the peace. It does not in itself make for peace.

"QUIT TALKING ABOUT WAR

"Back of the law there must be the spirit of peace in the hearts and minds of the American people. Without this spirit among us there can be no lasting peace. As long as such a spirit steadfastly prevails we shall not go to war.

"Specifically I would suggest a number of constructive measures in behalf of peace.

"Quit talking about becoming involved in war and start making practical plans for the expansion of business enterprise that can be carried on successfully within our own borders without resort to war. America wants work—not war.

"Maintain our position as already established in various parts of the world as a strong and powerful nation with a voice that speaks consistently of peace and that will be heard because we can defend our peace.

"PUT ASIDE PARTY DIFFERENCES

"Refuse to take any national position that will ally us with certain foreign powers in opposition to others. If we take sides with one group against others we shall have lost our neutrality and disobeyed the injunction of George Washington to beware of entangling alliances.

"Inhibit the emotions of fear and distress that we have suffered in the past unless they are harnessed to constructive tasks of peace. Constant and unrestrained fear thoughts may lead to national weakness and make us the prey of the dangerous forces now raging in the world. Constant concentration on trouble will inevitably bring it either to the individual or the Nation.

"Bring the best intelligence of the country together at Washington, the seat of our foreign office, for continuous conference with the President, irrespective of party, for the duration of the war emergency.

"COMBAT ONE-SIDED PROPAGANDA

"Make available to the President a nonpartisan intelligence representative of the Nation as a whole to meet the most serious problem of our time.

"Organize an active spirit of class and racial toleration in our schools, churches, civic, labor, agricultural, and business associations that will combat the menace of one-sided propaganda and insist on the maintenance of our civil liberties under the Constitution so that we shall not become the victims of war hysteria.

"Resist the temptation to put all of our foreign-born population under suspicion because of racial origin.

"WE CAN REMAIN AT PEACE

"Encourage free discussion, public forums, the citizens' right to petition their Government, the voice of the people in the newspapers and on the radio, and every form of free exchange of thought and feeling that will help maintain our intellectual and emotional balance.

"These are but a few of the ways that we may follow in our endeavor to help the United States escape involvement in war.

"I wish solemnly to affirm that we can remain at peace if we make the maintenance of peace our first national obligation."

What Shall We Do Now?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, OF WASHINGTON, BEFORE SEATTLE BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered at a meeting of the Seattle Bar Association on September 13, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In assigning to me a subject upon which to speak tonight, my good friend George Boldt named it "The State of the Nation." I have two complaints to register against this selection: First, it is too restricted. George should know that Members of the United States Senate believe in free, unlimited debate. We don't like to be hampered by having subjects which might in some way limit the scope of our remarks. Second, the subject is not sufficiently dignified. George should also know that United States Senators are very dignified. Therefore, I am going to discard the assigned subject and choose one of my own, which will be both unlimited and dignified. The subject upon which I choose to speak is, What Shall We Do Now?

I use the word "now" advisedly. I use it because of my belief that every problem, regardless of its nature, scope, or importance, must at some time during its consideration touch upon its relationship with the all-important question, "How can we stay out of the European war?"

No one need prove to the American people the necessity of our remaining out of the European war. Everyone should constantly restate and reiterate, however, the reasons why we should stay out of the European war. The American people must never for a moment be permitted to forget them. There are four main reasons:

1. The cost of our participation. By this I mean the lives of thousands of our men. I mean the maimed bodies and stricken minds of hundreds of thousands of our men. I mean billions of dollars which would be spent, the maladjustment of our economic system, and the possible destruction of our governmental system. It must not be forgotten that, should we go into this war, we would enter it at a time when economic problems here were much more serious than they were in 1917. We must not forget that success upon our part in such a war would require the surrender of our democratic rights and would entail the danger that, at the conclusion of such a war, those rights could not be reclaimed.

2. The futility of our participation. No sane person today will argue that the sacrifices of 1917–18 either made the world safe for democracy or delayed the present European war. More people today live under dictators than did in 1917. The last 8 years have seen war more widespread than at any previous time in the world's history.

3. We must not forget that our participation probably would materially lessen our chances of wielding a powerful economic influence on behalf of permanent world peace. We thought before that our voice at the peace council would be strengthened by our participation. We now know that that council brought out the Treaty of Versailles with all of its inequalities and inequities. I do not criticize Versailles as vigorously as do some. Treaties at best at the conclusion of war always have been unjust and unfair. Versailles ranks very well in comparison with many others. Nevertheless, it did contain inequities and unjust provisions which made impossible the successful functioning of the machinery which it set up for the maintenance of peace. Assuming the present war is of long duration, our chances of strongly influencing the provisions of the peace treaty on the side of justice and equity will be much greater if we occupy a position of dominance in world economics than if we are ourselves weakened by the part which we might actively take in war.

4. Believing as I do that a long European war will in itself destroy democracy in the Old World, I contend that we do have both the opportunity and the responsibility to maintain democracy at home. We will lose that opportunity and fail in that responsibility unless we can preserve a condition of peace for ourselves.

That brings us to the question, What can we do to stay out of this war? There is no sure road that we can take. There are no legislative insurance policies that we can buy. In fact, I sense a positive danger in the attitude of many people who believe that by legislative fiat we can stay out of war. We must not assume an attitude of drifting. Nobody ever drifted away from danger. If we simply drift, we will drift into trouble. The present situation requires a positive will for peace.

Whether we like it or not, we do have an interest in world affairs. You notice I use the word "interest" instead of "investment." The word "investment" implies the obligation of use of force to protect it. We must not lull ourselves into a sense of security by ignoring what is going on in the world. We are a part of the world. We can't overlook that fact. We must, however, have an awareness of the ever-present danger of our involvement. If we should get into the war, it would be because the American people demanded it. No President and no Congress ever dragged the American people into war. Public opinion is, by overwhelming odds, the strongest factor which might result in our participation.

In this regard, we must not forget that the agencies for developing public opinion are much more efficient than they were 25 years ago. The radio and the press bring us much closer to the details of any conflict anywhere than they did at that time. Therefore I say there rests upon each individual, either in the Government or out of the Government, a constant responsibility of maintaining a determined attitude upon this question. It will not be decided in Washington, D. C. It will be decided by the people in their own homes listening to their own radios and reading their own newspapers.

Believing this, I think it of the utmost importance that we have constantly called to our attention the events which occurred in 1914 to 1918. We must not be permitted to forget the lessons we should have then learned. With all seriousness, I suggest that it would be valuable if our newspapers would each devote one-quarter of its front page to a reprinting of the war news 25 years ago today.

During the last 6 years the Congress has attempted to study the causes that led us into the last war, and to write legislation which would prevent their repetition. This brings us to a consideration of the so-called neutrality legislation. I use the term "so-called" because I think it unfortunate that it was called neutrality legislation. Its name has caused much confusion in our thinking. In the dictionary we find a synonym for neutrality. One is "disinterestedness." The American people cannot be disinterested in what is going on in the world about us. We should not be disinterested even if we could.

International law, during a long period of years, has built up its definition of neutrality. It conceived of nations, not belligerent, which still had recognized rights in the conduct of their own business in every part of the world. It was based upon the theory that belligerent nations, even during the conduct of a war, owed the responsibility to act as gentlemen toward nations not participating. Very well-defined and well-recognized rules of conduct toward neutrals became accepted in the civilized world. Treaties and conventions were signed setting up and outlining these rules. The Nation became a neutral through the simple procedure of the issuance of a proclamation such as President Roosevelt's first proclamation, issued immediately after the outbreak of the present war. This proclamation was similarly issued by many other nations, and did not involve the so-called Neutrality Act. Were those rules respected, we need have no fear of being involved so long as we conducted ourselves in conformity with them. The last 25 years has seen the almost complete abandonment of those rules. There has been nothing one-sided about their abandonment. The far-flung blockade which England and France declared against Germany had as its only precedent a similar far-flung blockade declared by them in 1915. President Wilson then vigorously protested against the extent of the blockade. The search and seizure of vessels destined for neutral shores by England in 1914 and 1915 not only was contrary to international law, but almost resulted in our getting into the war against those nations which were later our allies. We all remember the vigorous notes of protest penned by President Wilson at that time. So completely has recognition of neutral rights disintegrated that the sinking of many vessels last year off the coast of Spain by German and Italian submarines brought almost no protest from England and France.

Therefore, when we in Congress attempted to write a law to enable us to avoid controversy with belligerents, we should not have called it a neutrality act. It doesn't fit either the dictionary definition or the international law definition. It is a law by which our Nation regulates the conduct of its own citizens, taking away from them certain of their well-recognized rights in order that they may not involve all of our people by insisting upon our protection of their rights. Any fair-minded person attempting to evaluate such legislation must recognize that, since this is certainly a surrender of well-established rights, our Government has the right, in laying down the rules, to surrender that percentage of our rights which, in the opinion of the Government, will be most conducive to the avoidance of controversy upon our part. Since no foreign nation has a right to demand that we surrender any of our rights, then no foreign nation can complain if, in working out the standards, we don't happen on a result which is both impartial and disinterested.

The heart of the so-called neutrality legislation was the cash-and-carry provision contained in section 2. Briefly stated, it provided that no goods, the title to which remained in an American citizen, could be shipped by either American or foreign ships to a belligerent or to a neutral for transshipment to a belligerent. It prevented American ships from carrying any goods to a belligerent and decreed that insurance contracts on goods shipped to belligerents should not be deemed American interest therein, and prohibited the underwriters thereof from asking our Government to make claim for losses thereon. This section expired on May 1. Section 1 of the act is the so-called arms embargo. It prohibits the sale and shipment of arms, ammunition, or the implements of war to any belligerent or to any neutral for transshipment to a belligerent. This section is still in effect.

The President takes the position that in modern-day warfare all goods of value are of military value. He contends that no distinction should be made between goods which have been actually manufactured into arms, ammunition, and implements of war and other goods capable of manufacture into arms, ammunition, and implements of war. He contends that our involvement in the last war came from the shipment of goods owned by Americans and the sailing of vessels owned by Americans and the sailing on vessels, no matter by whom owned, of American citizens. He has asked the Congress to place all shipments upon a cash-and-carry basis.

The opposition to the President's position comes from those who believe that the arms embargo be continued even at the expense of the failure to reinstate the cash-and-carry provisions. We are in the anomalous position of having those who most ardently advocated cash and carry being willing to permit our own goods to be shipped on our own vessels through war zones to belligerents. It seems to me reasonably apparent that no one can defend our present situation. Congress should be permitted to act upon this question. The threatening of a filibuster in this situation is, to my mind, indefensible.

The opponents of the President's position make two arguments against the arms embargo repeal. First, they say that it would favor England and France to the disadvantage of Germany and, therefore, would be unneutral. In making this argument, they forget that fundamentally this law is not an effort to be disinterested or impartial but an effort to keep us out of war. Furthermore, it can be said with equal force that as the law now stands it favors Germany as against England and France which is equally unneutral.

Their second argument is that the furnishing of munitions will get us into war. Judged by the standards of the last war, this again is not sound. Every word of testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee went to prove that it was not munitions but other goods which led us into the last war. The leaders of the opposition had full opportunity to present testimony upon this point and they presented none. Furthermore, on July 28 of this year, in a speech before the Senate, Senator NYE of North Dakota make the following statement, which I quote:

"No member of the Munitions Committee to my knowledge has ever contended that it was munitions makers who took us to war. But that committee and its members have said again and again, that it was war trade and the war boom, shared in by many more than munitions makers, that played the primary part in moving the United States into a war that became an affair of ours only as we were interfered with and molested in our pursuit of the profit we found available from other people's wars."

Since Senator NYE is the leader of the opposition, this admission against interest coupled with failure to submit affirmative proof stands, in my opinion, as an almost complete answer to this argument.

I suppose that we will be confronted with a third argument when we get into session; that is, that we shouldn't change the rules now that the war was started. That was the precise reason why 11 of us on the Foreign Relations Committee insisted that action should have been taken in July. Were it not for the fact that our so-called neutrality legislation since May 1 has been a mere skeleton, I might be inclined to agree with them. I do not believe, however, that we can permit the present dangers to continue just because the most ardent advocates of the cash-and-carry system prevented us from reinstating it before war was declared.

I am also convinced that of equal importance in involving us before was the lack of preparation for our own defense. We waited almost 2 years after the last war broke out before we started to even think about preparedness. The German high command was constantly told that they need not fear us, we were so totally unprepared. No one can deny that this information, in part, at least, resulted in their nonchalantly ignoring our neutrality rights. I think we all are glad to know that we haven't made that mistake this time and that we are not going to make it this time.

I have listened by the hour to arguments on the Senate floor how we were endangering ourselves with the threat of militarism when we authorized the increase of our Army from 135,000 to 165,000 men and when we built toward a Navy which could defend our shores. I never could agree with them. I am glad now I was never even tempted to agree with them. When the military becomes so strong in a nation as to dominate it, it then presents a danger. It has always seemed to me utterly silly for anyone to present this bogey as a threat of American preparedness.

The will for peace is the thing which is going to keep us out of war. We can't shut our eyes. We can't shut our ears. We must not stick our heads in the sand. We must not drift. We must constantly maintain, through clear thinking, an intelligent determination to stay out of the European war. It can be done that way and through no other means.

I now want to discuss the other side of this subject; that is, the relationship between domestic problems and the possibility of involvement. Believing as I do that if we do get into the war it will be through the force of public opinion, I think it worth while at this time that we should give serious consideration to the many disputes and controversies that exist here at home. No factor is more important than that we should place our own house in order. The nation which is beset with unsolved economic problems, with class and racial differences and prejudices, with disputes industrial and political, is much more likely to be drawn into a world war than it would be were its various problems solved. A nation discontented has a much greater chance of being unnecessarily drawn into war than a nation whose people are content. The events of the last few days have placed upon each one of us new and greater responsibilities to cooperate with everyone else in securing a betterment of the conditions under which all our people live.

In saying this I do not urge the abandonment of any principles. I do not urge a compromising of anything which is right. I do, however, strongly urge the cutting out of the rough edges. I urge the lessening of the friction between our different people and our different groups. I urge the abandonment of selfish personal ambitions for power or position and the abandonment of senseless, preconceived notions that have stood in the way of domestic peace.

My hope is that what has happened in Europe may cause our people calmly and dispassionately to appreciate and understand our American democracy.

There are so many people who view our form of democracy as a pattern. To them the pattern itself is the sacred thing. They see our Constitution as a set of rules established and preserved to maintain a status quo. For myself, I don't think they honor either our Government or our Constitution by this view. Those who wrote our Constitution were not only wise; they were also far-seeing; they visioned a nation ever expanding, ever progressing. No patriotic American would accuse them of conceiving a strait jacket upon American advancement or progress. Of course, in making changes we must be slow. Our legislative bodies must be slow. Our courts must be slow. Our people must be slow. However, need for care must not be the excuse for stagnation. There are times when stagnation will much more surely destroy an institution than even a little too rapid change. True progress in government comes from avoiding either of these extremes. I credit our founding fathers with sufficient astuteness to recognize this. They braked down our speed with a written constitution. They insured against stagnation by making it a living, growing document, which could be used to fit the needs and the problems of the world's most rapidly expanding nation.

In order for a democratic community to endure, certain prerequisites are evident:

1. We must protect with our lives those weapons which will enable us to protect the democratic community. Most powerful of these are freedom of speech and freedom of press. Never for a minute may we permit these instrumentalities of democratic process to be impaired or diminished.

2. Equality of opportunity to participate in Government enjoyed by every citizen qualified to participate. That opportunity must be free from coercion or fear on the one side and free from impossible promises of reward upon the other.

3. The minority in a democratic community must recognize the right of the majority to govern, provided that the majority gives equal recognition of its responsibility for fairness and honesty in its treatment of the minority.

In a democracy the majority must insure to the minority the same degree of justice which it demands for itself. Failing in these obligations the majority becomes merely a mob. When the majority becomes a mob, democracy fades out.

It ill behooves us to be critical of nondemocracies elsewhere if we make a shadow of our democratic institutions here. There may be widely different opinions about America's present-day responsibility to the world; there can be no difference of opinion in our responsibility for furnishing to the world an example of peace and democracy in the Western Hemisphere.

One of the most controversial of all of our problems has arisen out of disputes between those who employ and those who are employed. It is of supreme importance now that constructive efforts be made by everyone to minimize those controversies. In order to determine how we shall deal with our labor problems it is much more important that we should understand the causes of the labor struggles than that we should, with moral indignation, pass censor upon the participants in those struggles. Industrial warfare is always an ugly thing, costly to labor, to capital, and to the general public.

The duty of men who will to understand, who will to solve our present problems, is the duty to refrain from inflaming the suspicions and ill feelings that inevitably attend differences between industry and labor.

The plain fact is that we have already lost costly and critical years in the long and difficult process of developing orderly responsible industrial relationships. The establishment of such relationships is the first and primary task of industrial as well as political statesmanship.

Enlightened public opinion has long recognized that before we can achieve and maintain industrial peace we must create conditions under which labor will be able to act and bargain collectively and with dignity. We cannot expect industrial peace until we can expect and ask for collective responsibility on the part of labor; and we cannot expect collective responsibility on the part of labor without a frank recognition of a democratically chosen collective leadership of labor in industry. The very preservation of private enterprise in industry depends upon industry's willingness to permit the irresistible demand of the average man for a larger share of control over, and consequent responsibility for, the conditions of his work.

A civilized community demands that both labor and capital respect its law. Under the present administration Government has at last moved, and is continuing to move, toward providing machinery which will safeguard the principle of collective bargaining. These efforts of the Government may be seriously impaired by excessive labor disturbances now visible in different sections of the country. Labor, which was extremely patient when Government was insensitive to its needs, should not lose its self-restraint when Government has demonstrated its awareness of labor's just demands. It is important that labor as well as capital recognize that if any group or class presses its demands beyond what the community as a whole regards as the bounds of reason there is danger that the community may reject the just as well as the unjust demands of that group or class. In a democracy men must accommodate their demands to the demands of others; there must always be a large measure of give and take in the adjustment of human relations. A civilized democracy demands patience and self-restraint from all of its citizens.

We must judge these problems with an open mind. We must be aware of what is going on in the world. Yet we must never for a moment forget that our responsibility is to decide then upon the basis of the best interests of our people not only today but in the days to come. I know many people are asking the question, "What will happen if the dictators gain control of Europe?" In the light of that fear, they say we should rush in now to put them down. I don't think the dictators are going to get control of Eurtope. If they do, I am confident it will be only after such a war as to prostrate all of them. If they do, I am confident that ultimately they will defeat their own ends. I want to conclude by reading to you a statement I made last year over an international broadcast on the night that Hitler marched into Austria. It includes a quotation from Emerson's essay on Compensation. Emerson said this. I quote:

"This law writes the laws of cities and nations. It will not be balked of its end in the smallest iota. It is in vain to build or plot or combine against it. Things refuse to be mismanaged long. * * * Though no checks to a new evil appear, the checks exist and will appear. * * * Nothing arbitrary, nothing artificial can endure."

Of all forms of government yet conceived, democracy furnishes the most useful agencies for fighting arbitrary and artificial mismanagement. What we must do is to protect and preserve democratic methods in America. No doubt we will be importuned again to spend our resources in a futile effort to correct conditions in Europe. The inevitable law of which Emerson speaks will take care of Europe. What we must do is to preserve American democratic processes—to care for our own.

History shows that democracies have disappeared when they failed to care for their own. Never in the world's history has it been more necessary for democracy to work than it is that democracy work here now.

That we have an abundance of local problems, no one can deny. Quarrels exist between industry and labor and Government. This is the time when these quarrels should be submerged for the general good. America's position must be consolidated. The permanent advance of civilization depends upon the successful maintenance of democratic institutions somewhere. That place should be here. Let us turn our hand to that task. Let no outside influence turn us from it.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE L. HERRING

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. HERRING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] on October 5, 1939, on the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I know of no citizen in the United States who wants this country to go to war. In tens of thousands of letters and telegrams which I have received from all parts of the country, mainly from my own State of Michigan, everyone, both pro and con on the neutrality issue, urges that we be kept out of war. On the question of how to do it, there is the most violent disagreement. A few of these letters are vicious. Some indicate that the writers are greatly overwrought upon the issue and say things that would not be said if based upon cool judgment. Many of the letters are inspired, but, nevertheless, they reveal the attitude of the writers. The most appealing are those that come from children and from mothers and fathers who refer to the possibility of their dear ones being called into the service.

Many of these writers seem to forget that Senators are human; that we, like them, have families, sons who may be called into the service. I have three sons, one who is now eligible for military service. He is a strong, vibrant youth, symbolic to me of all the sons of American mothers and fathers. This should lead those who write in terms of violence to at least give us credit for being activated by the same motives as are they.

So I approach this problem—how to keep out of war—with the viewpoint of an American having in mind what will best serve to keep my country out of war and as a father having the purpose of keeping my sons from facing death on the battlefields of Europe. My vote in Congress upon the neutrality issue will have but one purpose; that is, to keep this Nation out of war. I want this country to remain a noncombatant. I feel reasonably sure that we are safe from attack. I feel reasonably sure that assaults upon our citizens, ships, and property abroad will not be sufficient to cause war, because I do not think our citizens, ships, and property should be abroad, and they will not be if the pending act becomes law. Therefore, the only way that we will go into a war is by our own deliberate and considered choice.

Fortune has favored us in geographical location. We are not, like Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland, in the paths of the contending armies. We are, thank God, isolated, and war cannot, in my judgment, be forced upon us. What, then, is the danger? Why fear that we would deliberately choose to go in? I will try to give you the facts as I see them.

In my judgment, despite the fact that our general feeling now is that our entrance into the last war was a mistake; notwithstanding that the British and French have deliberately failed to pay us the just debts they owe us out of the last World War, American sentiment is strongly pro-French, pro-British, and pro-Polish; or to put it the other way, it is mainly anti-Hitler. Why is this so? I am not among those who assert that we should say nothing about it. We have free speech. We can express the views our minds entertain. We don't like Mr. Hitler because he has seized and throttled democratic government in Germany and has reorganized a powerful nation for the purpose of dominating Europe. Like the war-drunk military masters of the past, from Alexander to Napoleon, the power lust dominates him and he must have, not Germany as it was under the Kaiser, but a more powerful, dominant, and militant Germany than ever before. Our sentiment has risen against him because he has cruelly persecuted a Jewish minority; because he has endeavored to break down religion, attempted to break down the great Christian Church in Germany, Catholic and Protestant alike; because he has mercilessly bombed Polish cities and slaughtered Polish citizens without just cause; because he has devoured the democratic countries to the south of Germany such as Austria and Czechoslovakia against their will. I think no military master or ruler in history has gone as far as he has. He aspires not only to one-man rule, but he dictates his successor. Even the absolute monarch claimed no such power; he was bound by the laws of legitimate inheritance and succession. But Hitler names his successor, his successor's successor even unto the fourth. But we condemn him most because he has plunged an unwilling world into war, unleashed the most contagious passion known to man, and menaced my sons and yours. This and much more is the reason for the dominant anti-Nazi sentiment of America today.

I fear this sentiment. I saw its parallel in 1916, and I can see its workings today. I fear the propaganda of the British and French. It is able, it is subtle. Its chief said the other day, "Hitler is England's best propagandist." I want to do that which will completely counteract both this conscious and unconscious propaganda.

We are now facing a realistic situation. How can we best meet it? How can we best prevent America from becoming a participant in this war?

Heretofore there has always been trade between a nation at war and a nation at peace—when military power did not prevent it. In both of our wars with England we traded with France and other neutrals, as far as we could in view of the British sea power. The Mexican War did not stop us from trading with Europe. The American Civil War did not prevent the North from trading with England and France and Germany; nor did our Spanish War. In all of our wars our trade in all articles continued.

Germany has built a mighty army and a mighty air force, and her geographical position enables her navy to control the Baltic Sea. Germany maintains a trade with all neutrals she can reach. Through her army the trade routes between Germany and Russia, Rumania, Hungary, Italy, and even Belgium and Holland, are kept open. Through her naval control of the Baltic her trade with Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark, and Russia is maintained. From these nations she gets vital military supplies. But Britain and France, who have spent tremendous sums to control the seas are, for the first time in history, denied by our law, passed largely because of American public sentiment in the Ethiopian, Spanish, and Chinese difficulties, to trade in war implements with us. Is it a neutral position we now take? No; it is a position which in fact gives Germany an unfair advantage over England and France. Germany's army and navy keep its trade lanes open. America's neutrality law keeps the French and English trade lanes with America closed. This the American public does not approve.

I say, let us be realistic about this. Our one great object is to prevent America from going to war.

It is not the mere question of whether Congress, in whom the constitutional power to declare war rests, will declare war. A vote in the Senate today would probably be unanimous against war. The question is, Will American public sentiment, in the event of allied losses and possible defeat, change American sentiment? I affirm that from my 7 years of contact with Members of the House and Senate, I am convinced that Congress will not declare war unless forced to by an overwhelming public demand.

How can we prevent conditions that will give rise to such a demand? By returning to the age-old practice of real neutrality, which in this situation it must frankly be admitted will aid the English and French just as the policy of Sweden, Finland, Russia, and others aids Germany. The American public will then know that we are doing nothing to aid Hitler. Many believe we are doing so today. If our age-old policy of neutrality aids Britain and France, I assert that the great majority of the American people will say that if it is right for Germany to trade with her neutrals to the north and east and possible to so trade because of her Army and Baltic Sea navy, then it is also right for England and France to trade with their neighbors to the west, and possible not by reason of any action of ours but because of their control of the seas. Our present law aids the German Army and her Baltic navy, and in effect blots out the power of the French and English Navies.

Let us think not of Germany, not of France or England, but only of America. If fate decrees we should go into this war, on whose side should we go? Everyone knows the answer. If our strict adherence to neutrality, as known in the past when these German Armies and British Navy were built up, aids in the result which will tend to keep America out of this war, why not assume such neutrality? Hitler, Chamberlain, and Deladier think only of their own nations. Let us do the same. I am convinced that this bill will best serve that purpose.

The issue here has been magnified beyond all reason. My distinguished colleague yesterday called repeal a symbol. He means a symbol of war. It is not. We will not go to war if we repeal the embargo. We will not go to war if we retain the embargo. Repeal or no repeal, we stay out. The issue is not war or peace, no matter how loudly the opposition shouts it to be so. We are not threatened with attack. Even if Germany now foolishly desired to provoke the world's most powerful nation by assaulting us, she could not do it. If we go into this war, we will do it of our own free will. None but the people of the United States will decide that question. Let us calm down in the Senate, in the press, in the news reels, and in the country and approach this and all like questions with cool reason, knowing that one piece of legislation will never do all the good that its authors claim for it, nor all the damage its opponents charge to it. What we now do, be it right or wrong, will never tear down the firm determination of this Congress and this Nation to keep America at peace.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HIRAM W. JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY FORMER GOVERNOR LA FOLLETTE, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a radio address delivered by Hon. Philip F. La Follette, former Governor of Wisconsin, on last Tuesday, on the subject of the pending neutrality measure.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Twenty-two years ago a pitiless campaign of abuse raged around my father. His name was made a word of hatred, his picture was torn from public places and ground under foot. He was burned in effigy.

His offense—his only offense was his profound conviction that the underlying causes of that World War were to be found in the commercial and imperialistic conflicts of European states. He voted against war in the face of personal abuse such as few men have known. Until his death he was sure that he had voted right—voted for the best interests of America. Millions now agree that he did.

The bitter experience of those days are burned into many American hearts. We know that there are steps which lead one by one to war. A peace-loving nation like ours cannot be led into war overnight. A democratic nation goes to war because it takes the steps that lead to war. Once those steps are taken, war becomes inevitable unless a miracle occurs.

THE ROAD TO WAR

Twenty-five years ago we expected to stay out when we elected President Wilson on the plea, "He kept us out of war," only to find later that we had secretly embarked on a course which led to war. That is why we are all struggling to see through the maze of arguments we hear now, as America stands poised to take that first step down the long road to war.

Three years ago, recognizing this country's overwhelming determination to stay out of other people's wars, Congress by a large majority adopted, and President Roosevelt signed, the Neutrality Act. That law was based on months of investigation conducted by Congress into the events that took us into the last war.

It was designed to guard against the mistaken steps we took in 1915 and 1916. Its most important provision prohibits the manufacture for sale of arms and ammunition to nations involved in war.

The President has just made to Congress a number of recommendations to strengthen the original purposes of the Neutrality Act, such as, for instance, a regulation that will keep Americans and American ships out of the danger zones. All such recommendations have the wholehearted support of the people of this country. We all favor amendments to strengthen the law.

The entire difference of opinion arises over the proposal of the President that Congress shall repeal the embargo on guns and ammunition and permit their sale to nations at war. Let me repeat there is no dispute over strengthening the Neutrality Act. The sole question is: Shall the Neutrality Act be scuttled by repealing the embargo on arms?

Let us pull the truth right out into the open. This question involves peace or war. If Congress repeals the arms embargo now it will do so to aid one side in the present European war. That is what we did in 1915, and that is what took us into the war in 1917. Some may try to fool our own people; but, make no mistake, we shall not fool anybody else.

Every country in the world will at once recognize such a step for what it is—our taking sides with one of the warring groups. From that moment there could be no such thing as our being out of the war.

It will be only a question of how far and how fast we get into it. It is beyond my comprehension how anyone can argue that we are helping to keep America out of the war by becoming an ammunition factory for the European war.

The eventual issue raised by the embargo question is: Shall we or shall we not become involved in the war in Europe?

HUMANITY'S SUFFERING

No sane American would dare propose that it is our job to save anybody's empire. Certainly no thoughtful American would urge that we should enter the European war to save humanity. Humanity has suffered in recent years when it might have been easier to save it. Humanity has been bombed and gassed in the uplands of Abyssinia, on the farms, and in the cities of China, and in the arid plains and mountains of Spain—not bombing in a relatively equal fight but in the rush of well-equipped battalions and squadrons against primitive people with a spear, against nations struggling to modernize their institutions, and against a society torn by civil strife.

Then was a time when, if ever, the appeal to humanity should have had the greatest force. But those appeals were then unanswered by those who now make them in their own extremity. I do not criticize. No man or woman speaking in this safe and blessed land has the moral right to criticize those who are charged with the terrifying responsibility of leading a people dwelling in the teeming lands of Europe or Asia.

An appeal to enlist in a crusade to fight brutal dictatorships strikes a responsive chord in the warm hearts of the American people. The desire to see the tyranny of dictatorship ended, whether those dictators be red, black, or brown, springs from America's deep-rooted love of liberty; and I yield to no man in my loathing of dictatorship as a denial of the free principles upon which America was founded.

But we must not fool ourselves into thinking that we can help fight dictators in Europe and still stay out of war. A nation cannot be half in and half out of war. We either go in or stay out. Past experience and today's facts should have taught us that cash and carry before very long would become "charge it" and carry it, too.

More important, let us not forget the tragic error of thinking that war supplies are all we shall be called upon to provide in this European war. Six months ago, while in France, I asked one of the highest officials what they expected from the United States in the event of war. He instantly shot back the reply "supplies—and men."

More than 1900 years ago the Master said, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world but lose his own soul?" That fundamental precept applies not alone to individuals but to nations as well. What shall we gain to crush dictatorship in Europe, if we lose our priceless freedom at home?

Make no mistake; the moment we embark on the road to war we inevitably take on the trappings of dictatorship. Modern warfare calls for the mobilization of a great deal more than an army. It demands the complete regimentation of all resources and all the people. It demands regimentation of thought and action of the entire population.

As war lengthens in duration and grows in intensity, the shackling of freedom becomes more and more absolute. When peace comes at last, the terrifying economic collapse which must follow may well become the emergency to continue dictatorial powers and thus destroy Americanism itself.

Let me turn again for a moment to my father's experience. At the very height of American enthusiasm for the World War, he never wavered in his repeated predictions that that war would be followed, not just by more wars, but by the worst economic collapse the world had known.

He was not a prophet. He was a student. He knew history. He knew that nations could not destroy millions of productive human beings and billions and billions of dollars of wealth without paying the inevitable price in hard times, poverty, and depression.

Look at the world today. Europe enters this war with billions of dollars of debt left over from the last one. With the enormous debt the world now carries and with the awful increase in the destructiveness of war today, you can write it down as a foregone conclusion that if this is a prolonged war, it will end in the complete collapse of the economic and political systems of every nation which participates in it.

But worse than the loss in bankruptcy and poverty—worse even than the slaughter of millions of human beings—is that prolonged war will be followed by the worst era of demagogues the world has seen. Those who sow the seeds of hatred, who spread racial, religious, and class strife, bigotry, and intolerance would feed and fatten on the distress and collapse that must follow. Every scoundrel anxious to exploit degraded aspects of human nature would find a thousandfold increase in the fields he can till if we make hatred respectable by joining in war.

"The stability and future of the American Nation do not depend on the victory or defeat of any other nation anywhere in the world."

They depend on what we do here at home. That is why in all that has been said I have kept waiting for word about America and American problems.

It is shocking to discover the eagerness with which some of us have dropped our own unfinished tasks here at home and turned our backs on the problems that gave us 10,000,000 unemployed, millions of distressed farmers, and millions of young and old who face still another winter with a scanty and uncertain living in this land of plenty.

In our excitement over wars in Europe and in Asia are we forgetting America? Are we forgetting that our task is not for ourselves alone but for every people of hope everywhere? If we are to be helpful to the world in the years to come, we must not forget that our first task is to safeguard our own people here at home and the principles and ideals in which they believe.

You have heard of the forgotten man. Does that forgotten man now live in a forgotten country?

When they vote for or against wrecking the Neutrality Act, your Congressmen and your Senators will be taking the first big step on the road to war or peace. You have elected them to decide for you. But you owe it to your conscience and your country to take your own stand on one side or the other of this life-and-death front.

There can be no alibis. This is not an issue where just a few chosen experts alone know the answers. This great issue is not a test of brains. It is a test of character. Once the floodgates are opened, the fences and those who sit on them will be swept ruthlessly along over the precipice.

Mothers and fathers—you who have through pain and sacrifice brought life into the world—what do you think? Your voice is more important than all the statesmen and leaders in all countries. Speak up for yourselves and your children.

Young men and women—you who dream of finding a useful place in the life of your country where your creative gifts can help America again become the beacon light of the world—you who would pay the bloody price for the mistakes of politicians—speak up for young America.

You who are older—doctors, teachers, nurses, ministers of all faiths, workers, and tillers of the soil; you who have the wisdom of experience—speak up and give your country guidance in this critical hour.

Americans all! You still hold in your hands the power to guide the destiny of this great land. Use it! America, speak up!

Our Duty as Americans

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY JOHN HAMILTON BEFORE NEW YORK COUNTY REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by Hon. John Hamilton, chairman of the Republican National Committee, before a meeting of the New York County Republican Committee and workers at the Manhattan Center in New York City, Thursday evening, September 28, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There are few places left in the world where such a meeting could be held as we are holding here tonight. Since September 3 the United States has been the only great nation where the processes of democratic government continue to function unimpaired. The implications of that fact are almost staggering. It places upon us a responsibility unique among the peoples of the world.

We must meet that responsibility as Americans. And all of us here and all those of like political faith throughout the country must meet it as Republicans. But we are Americans first and Republicans second. As Republicans our first duty is to be good Americans. Happily there is no conflict here. We can become better Americans by becoming better Republicans.

By that I mean we can best serve our country by closing our party ranks and achieving a unity in which there is strength. We must forget whatever differences we may have had amongst ourselves in the past. We must let bygones be bygones. We must look forward and not back. The course of world events has placed upon us as a party a new and grave responsibility. Ours is the obligation to keep alive the American system of representative government. As the party of Lincoln it is our sacred trust to see that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

All of us have heard a great deal of talk lately to the effect that politics ought to be adjourned in the present emergency. But what do those who make this appeal really mean by politics?

If they mean the kind of politics that was played right here in New York County by "Jimmy" Hines, if they mean the kind of politics that is played across the East River in Brooklyn by Frank Kelly and across the Hudson River in Jersey City by Frank Hague, of course that kind of politics ought to be adjourned. That is putting it mildly. It ought to be ended for all time. And we're getting around to that.

But there is another kind of politics—a quite different kind. It is what I shall call the politics of principles. It is politics in the true and uncorrupted meaning of the word as defined by Webster: "The theory or practice of managing or directing the affairs of public policy." And let me say most emphatically that that kind of politics should not be adjourned by the Republican Party at this time.

For that is the kind of politics which subordinates partisanship to national welfare, the kind of politics that has as its objective the preservation of representative government in the United States, the kind of politics that translates ideals into action, the kind of politics that makes democracy work.

It is the kind of politics that is constructive in theory and in action, which does not seek to obstruct for the sake of obstruction, nor to embarrass the opposition merely because the opposition wears a different party label. It is the kind of politics that guarantees the freedom of speech, of worship, and of assembly. It is the kind of politics that vitalizes the Constitution and assures the smooth functioning of our Government of checks and balances, represented by the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches. And, finally, it is the kind of politics that hears and understands and obeys the voice of the people every day. Heaven help us if that kind of politics is ever adjourned in these United States.

We are told that we are facing an emergency. In fact, a state of limited emergency already has been proclaimed. But what is the nature of this emergency? No guns are leveled at this Nation. No threatening demands have been made upon us. No ultimatum has been delivered. And none will be delivered. We are a Nation at peace and not at war. And if the will of the people is allowed to prevail, we will remain a Nation at peace.

It is true that the outbreak of warfare in Europe has brought us to a crisis in the ordering of our own affairs. Momentous decisions must be made which may well affect for better or for worse the whole future destiny of our Nation. But there is no immediate threat to impel us to rush headlong to hasty and ill-considered conclusions. There is ample time for mature consideration and deliberate debate.

There is no obligation or compulsion to blindly follow the leadership of any one individual or group, no matter how disinterested or inspiring that leadership may be. There is no reason to surrender our American birthright of frank, free, and open discussion to any leadership, no matter how intelligent and well informed that leadership may be. And let no leadership attribute unworthy motives to those who differ honestly with it and have the courage to express those differences. Let the voice of the people be heard. And let the voice of the people prevail.

Along with this talk of adjourning politics is heard the suggestion of coalition government—the suggestion that Republicans be included in the Cabinet of the present administration. The plea is made that we must make a show of national unity; present to the world a united front.

Those who advance this argument overlook two fundamental facts. In the first place, the kind of united front of which they speak becomes a necessity only after final decisions have been made and the national welfare demands that the entire Nation stand back of them. In the second place, ours is not the type of government which lends itself to coalition.

We have as yet made no final decisions in this crisis. We are in the process of making them. We are in the discussion stage where regimentation of thought and opinion has no place. We are at the point where it not only is the privilege but the duty of every responsible citizen to exercise his best judgment for the welfare and the protection of his country. Now, if ever, is the time for every American to speak out, boldly and unafraid. Ideas which cannot stand the test of scrutiny and debate are unworthy either of support or adoption.

Unlike England we are not at war, and unlike England we have a written Constitution and a two-party system of government. The members of our Cabinet are responsible to the President alone. They hold office at the President's will; may be dismissed without reason at his pleasure. They can be held to no accountability either by the Congress or the people. That is not true of the English system. Yet, even in England, after the declaration of war, when national unity reached a life-and-death imperativeness, leaders of both the Liberal and Labor Parties declined posts in a coalition war cabinet. As explained by Sir Archibald Sinclair, the liberal leader, they felt that they could render better service to the nation by supporting all necessary war measures from an "independent position."

Our Federal system of checks and balances was set up by the Constitution. From this logically flowed our two-party system of government, now so time-honored that it is as deeply rooted as if it had been implanted in the Constitution itself. Republican and Federalist, Whig and Democrat, Republican and Democrat—so runs our political history. The story of third party movements is a story of successive failures.

The proper function of the minority party under our two-party system is both positive and negative. On the positive side, its function is to propose and fight for policies which to its leaders seem better designed to promote the public welfare than the policies and program of the party in power. From the negative standpoint, its function is one of constructive criticism to expose the errors and fallacies of the majority party's philosophy and to serve as a brake upon excesses which inevitably result from the unrestrained exercise of great power.

Minority party criticism should always be motivated only by a desire to advance the public good. A classic example of its abuse is to be found in the reminiscences of Senator Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, concerning the Adams administration. Senator Benton wrote:

"I belonged then to an opposition which was keen and powerful and which permitted nothing to escape that could be used against the President rightfully or wrongfully."

I covet for the Republican Party today an opposition record which nobody will ever be able to narrate in those words. I covet for us an ability to distinguish between good and bad in the performance of the administration. I covet for us a willingness to cooperate with the good. And I equally covet for us a determination to attack the bad and to expose it and, if possible, to prevent it from coming into being.

But I resent any attempt in the name of emergency to stampede the party into becoming a mere rubber stamp for administration proposals, to divert it from its proper function in our system of representative government. In 1933, in the name of emergency and in its zeal to promote the public welfare, the party acquiesced in the surrender of important legislative powers to the Executive. Not until the last session did the party make any substantial success in reclaiming for the Congress its rightful powers and in its efforts to restore representative government. That success, I might say in passing, was achieved by the only kind of coalition that is possible under our form of government—a coalition of like-thinking representatives of the people in Congress—in this case Republicans and Jeffersonian Democrats.

The result of the adjournment of politics in 1933 is that millions of unemployed still walk our streets and our national debt has reached an all-time high. The mistake of 1933 must not be repeated.

Nothing would be more disastrous to this Nation than adjournment of politics which would permit a black-out of urgent domestic problems. As a party, we would be faithless to our trust if we permitted what is happening in Europe to divert us from the task that is ours of correcting the errors of the past six and a half years and of redirecting our energies toward a useful and permanent recovery.

We need to reorder our finances and we need to consider some of the ill-advised legislation which still remains on the statute books. There are many other vital domestic issues about which we need to think and to think deeply.

We must not forget that our domestic problems are just as vital, just as urgent as they were in the weeks preceding the European war. We must not forget that those problems still remain unsolved. We must not forget that only a few weeks before the outbreak of hostilities overseas the Temporary National Economic Committee told us that the survival of the system of private property itself depends upon the restimulation of economic activity, that government acted, but the economic machine remained stalled on dead center; that people are still without jobs; that farmers are still without satisfactory markets; and that industry is still without sufficient purchasers.

The challenge thus presented to our party can be met only by political action. It is our solemn obligation to meet that challenge and not to dodge it by seeking refuge in an adjournment of politics at a time when our domestic problems are as critical as our foreign relations.

And we must meet that challenge soon. The party national conventions are less than a year off. In November of next year the people must choose a President of the United States. If there ever was a time when the politics of principles should not be adjourned it is now and in the months preceding that vitally important undertaking.

The real need today is for more, and not less, political alertness. It would be fatal for the Nation if we permitted our preoccupation with the affairs of Europe to blind us to the state of affairs at home. The danger is all the greater since the war itself already is serving to obscure and to distort the domestic picture.

The war in Europe may enable the New Deal to escape in large measure the dire consequences of its mistaken farm policy, its wasteful spending folly, its hamstringing of business, its drying up of the sources of investment capital, its fomenting of labor strife, and its bleeding white of the American people through the pyramiding of taxation.

As security values advance on the stock exchanges under the stimulus of war demand, as industrial operations speed up, and our crop surpluses are reduced, our people must not be permitted to lose sight of the fact that all of these things are merely the result of temporary circumstances and that the fundamental conditions which retard the return of a sound prosperity remain unchanged and must be changed if we are to regain our normal standards of American wages and American living. We must not delude either ourselves, or permit the people to be deluded, by mistaking a temporary war boom for a return of sound prosperity. By so doing we would only postpone the ultimate day of reckoning and aggravate conditions which already are unsound.

So let us dedicate ourselves here and now to party unity and to unselfish service to the Nation through political action based on sound principles and uninfluenced by unworthy partisan considerations.

Repeal of Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 6 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTER BY COL. HENRY BRECKINRIDGE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a most able and illuminating letter on the subject of the repeal of the arms embargo, written by Col. Henry Breckinridge and published in the New York Times of October 1, 1939.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of October 1, 1939]

LIFTING EMBARGO HELD NOT UNLAWFUL—VIEWS OF DRS. JESSUP AND HYDE DECLARED CONTROVERTED BY THE FORMER'S PREVIOUS EXPRESSIONS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In your issue of September 21 was published the joint letter of Charles Cheney Hyde and Philip C. Jessup on the question of removing the existing embargo on munitions to belligerent countries.

On January 30, 8 months ago, Dr. Philip C. Jessup wrote another letter which was published in the New York Times and to which reference will be made later in this communication. Charles C. Burlingham was a cosigner of that letter.

It is unpleasant to read Dr. Jessup's drastic comment in his recent letter on the action proposed to the Congress by the President. It would be "unneutral and is contemptuous of the legal duty which the law of nations imposes upon every neutral sovereign." Again, he characterizes it as "illegal as well as unneutral." He suggests, in speaking of his country, "it cannot at this time relax its embargoes without besmirching its character as an advocate of international justice."

With great respect, I differ with Dr. Jessup, and my difference of opinion is based largely on what I glean from his own writings or the precedents which from time to time he has so voluminously collected. In his letter published in the Times of September 21 he speaks with a dogmatism and finality supported, so far as I can learn, neither by the precedents of his own collection nor by the official admission at any time of any officer of the United States throughout its history acting on a specific case requiring a formal stand by our Government.

PREVIOUS STUDY CITED

Fortunately for us less-informed citizens, as recently as July 1939 Dr. Jessup, as reporter for the research in international law under the auspices of the faculty of the Harvard Law School, gave us a fat tome on the Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War. Whether or not Dr. Jessup agrees entirely with the comments in this book I cannot say, because the book has an introductory comment. This tells us that there is fundamental difference of opinion among the compilers of the book, and that its contents are not presented to its readers as reflecting even a consensus of the advisory committee.

Many interesting things appear in Dr. Jessup's report of July, 1939. For example, the Thirteenth Hague Convention of 1907, Article 7, is quoted as follows: "A neutral power is not bound to prevent the export or transit for the use of either belligerent of arms, ammunition or, in general, of anything that could be of use to an army or fleet."

Again, "the neutral laws of the United States never forbade the export of contraband until 1935."

It may help our minds to recall that portion of Dr. Jessup's "Draft Convention," cited by Dr. Clyde Eagleton in his letter published in the Times on September 25. I quote: "A neutral state, for the purpose of better safeguarding its rights and interests as a neutral may, during the course of a war, adopt new measures or alter the measures which it has previously adopted, provided, however, that the new measures adopted do not violate any provision of this convention." Why, it may reasonably be asked, does Professor Jessup so blandly conclude that the proposed changes are not "for the purpose of better safeguarding its rights and interests as a neutral"?

Dr. Jessup cites the comparable text of the Thirteenth Hague Convention of 1907: "Preamble. Seeing that, in this category of ideas, these rules should not, in principle, be altered in the course of a war by a neutral power except in a case where experience has shown a necessity for such change for the protection of the rights of that power."

RIGHTS DEFINED

And Article 26 of that same Hague convention: "The exercise by a neutral power of the rights laid down in the present convention can under no circumstances be considered as an unfriendly act by one or other belligerent who has accepted the articles relating thereto."

Thus, never before 1935 did the neutrality laws of the United States forbid the export of contraband. New legislation restricted the normal rights of American citizens under international law, and the common-sense interpretation of The Hague Convention of 1907 is that this legislation can be changed while a war is in progress, and under no circumstances can it be considered an unfriendly act by belligerents. This is true, unless Professor Jessup can sustain his contention from clear authority that a neutral power can only change the status after the outbreak of hostilities by still further restriction and may not relax any pre-existing restriction.

What is the American history on the subject? During the Napoleonic wars with England, while hostilities were in progress, we imposed and raised embargoes. Reference to the action of our Government in 1794, 1797, 1807, 1809, and 1812 is sufficient proof of this. Most of this action was unwise, but would Dr. Jessup say it was illegal, dishonorable, and unjust?

The joint resolution of 1935 amended our neutrality laws at the outset of the Italo-Ethiopian War and the joint resolution of 1936 did likewise while the Italo-Ethiopian War was in progress. But Dr. Jessup would retort that these were restrictive and not relaxing actions.

During the World War Secretary Lansing in one of his notes to the Austro-Hungarian Government on the arms-export question wrote: "The right and duty to determine when this necessity exists rests with the neutral, not with a belligerent. It is discretionary, not mandatory. If a neutral power does not avail itself of the right, a belligerent is not privileged to complain."

Admiral Sperry, an American representative at the Hague Conference of 1907, in speaking of the point now under discussion, stated that, "All the acts performed by a neutral state in fulfillment of its duties of neutrality are performed by its own authority and not for the purpose of fulfilling a duty or granting a favor to one or the other of the belligerents."

COMMENT ON REPORT

Referring again to Dr. Jessup's report at the botton of page 318 and the top of 319. Speaking of article 13 of his proposed "Draft Convention on Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War," his comment is, "From the point of view of the principle embodied in this article, it is immaterial whether the new rule is thus intended to perfect the performance of a neutral duty or whether it is intended to exercise a neutral privilege for the sake of further protecting neutral rights and interests."

"Nevertheless, the text does not go so far as to say that no relaxation of a rule would ever be permissible." This is the comment of Dr. Jessup's report upon his own proposed article 13, which gives a neutral the right to change the status after the outbreak of hostilities.

Again I quote from Dr. Jessup's report: "Fear that changes during war might be considered unneutral apparently carried no weight in the United States during the eighteenth century." Why should it in the twentieth century?

It is admitted that we are dealing with a question obscured by the varying positions taken by nations as dictated from time to time by their self-interest. This is true of much in international law.

But surely the burden of proof must be upon those who deny the right of the United States to pass any neutrality law, either of restriction or of relaxation, that does not violate the well-established rules of international law.

Respectfully do I invite Dr. Jessup to cite one authentic instance in which the Government of the United States has admitted the right of any foreign power to restrict its rights of action as a neutral as long as its action does not assert some unprecedented privilege for itself or its citizens. This is the stand taken by Lansing to Austria-Hungary. It is the stand taken by Sperry as one of our representatives at the Hague Conference of 1907.

Now, let us come to the other letter of Dr. Jessup printed in the Times of January 30. It will be recalled that this was just before the total collapse of the Loyalist government under the onslaughts of Franco and after 2½ years of civil war. Candor compels the admission that Dr. Jessup fell back on the technical fact that the United States had never recognized the belligerency of either party to this civil war, and that, therefore, the United States was not technically bound by the laws of neutrality.

CONTRARY ACTION SEEN

But as a practical matter he was advocating that the President lift the embargo on arms to Loyalist Spain, that there might flow from our shores, 2½ years after the outbreak of hostilities, a stream of arms and munitions to succor the Loyalist armies in their desperate plight. That was an eloquent and closely reasoned appeal to change the status after hostilities had commenced. In January he was urging the exact action in behalf of the Loyalists that he now deplores because it would be unneutral and unjust. He justified his stand on arms to Spanish Loyalists by saying there was no formal war.

With great sincerity and facility Dr. Jessup found the lawyer's reasons to help those whose cause he then espoused. It is interesting to see that same mind now weaving a less tenable thread of argument to the advantage of Nazi interest and to the disadvantage of the western democracies.

His reason for raising the embargo at the eleventh hour to Loyalist Spain was stated by him as follows: "It would further mark a return to our historic policy of avoiding intervention in European civil wars by following a strict hands-off policy instead of taking affirmative action, which, as events have demonstrated, inevitably affects the outcome of a struggle in which we profess not to be concerned." This "hands-off" policy then was to lift the embargo and to permit the shipment of arms to the losing faction of the Spanish civil war. His "hands-off" policy now would insure that England and France could get no arms from here.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] in the American Forum of the Air last night. I think it is the ablest discussion of the question now before the Senate which has yet been made.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I don't know whether Mr. Granik will like what I am about to do or not. I was invited and asked to use up my 12 minutes' portion of this program in making a speech. I am wondering if audiences, particularly radio audiences, are not getting a little tired of listening to speeches upon this question. There has been an average of two or three an evening during the last 2 weeks.

Like every other Senator, I have received a large volume of mail during this special session—so large that it is impossible to give specific answers to each letter. Many of the letters contain definite questions which are very pertinent. Therefore I have decided to use my time in reading some of these questions and my answers to them. In other words, I am taking advantage of Mr. Granik's invitation to answer my mail by radio. There will not be time to read the whole context of any letter, so I am limiting myself to those portions of the letters which contain the questions, and those portions of the replies which contain the answers to the specific questions.

I had one letter last week from a man in Bellingham, Wash., which contained this question: "My understanding in 1937 was that the Congress had passed a completed neutrality bill. I thought that bill was permanent, yet I saw by the papers in April of this year that hearings were being held in both the House and the Senate on new neutrality legislation. Then when the Congress decided not to adopt any legislation last session and the war came on, the President called you folks back in special session. What I would like to know is why there was any need for Congress considering neutrality at all this year."

My answer to that question was: "It is true that in 1935 and 1936 and 1937 we in Congress passed neutrality acts. The 1937 act had three main parts. First, was the arms embargo. Second, a provision requiring all goods shipped to a belligerent to be carried on ships not owned by Americans and with the title to the goods passing to the purchaser before the goods left our shores. The third provision was known as the financial section, and it rather indefinitely restricted financial transactions between our people and belligerent governments. Section 2 of this act, or the carry provisions, expired by the terms of the act on May 1 of this year. Under the law as it now stands, our goods and our people and our ships may travel between the United States and the belligerent countries. It was the fact that that expired which caused us last April to hold hearings on the whole question.

"In the opinion of most of us that was the most important part of the law. As a result of those hearings, everybody in the Senate concluded that it was necessary to restate and strengthen the carry provisions of section 2. Everybody concluded that it was necessary to strengthen the provisions of the financial section. Everybody concluded that it was necessary to prevent our ships, even though destined for neutral countries, to stay away from submarine zones and mine-infested zones, and that our citizens should be kept off belligerent ships.

"For those reasons, about which there is no particular difference of opinion, it became necessary to rewrite the neutrality legislation. In addition to that, a great number of us, and I think the majority, concluded that America's chances of staying out of the war would be much better if the so-called arms embargo were repealed. That is the question around which the present debate is raging, but I think you can see that, regardless of anyone's opinion upon that phase of the question, there must be agreement that some legislation is necessary. I don't think any Member of Congress will seriously disagree on that conclusion."

Another interesting question was posed to me by a writer living at Clarkston, Wash. Clarkston is right near the Idaho line. The letter came to me by air mail, having been written on Wednesday. It said: "Now, I am confused. We here next door to Idaho have always had great confidence in Senator BORAH and when he came out against the repeal of the arms embargo why I thought, of course, that I did agree with him. Then last night Senator NORRIS went on the air and took the opposite side. Personally, I look upon Senator NORRIS as my ideal statesman. Tell me how these two men, with all their experience and with their honesty, can violently disagree on this vital subject."

My answer to that letter was as follows: "I don't blame you for being confused. I agree with everything you have said about both Senator BORAH and Senator NORRIS. Does it not occur to you that what you have asked me is simply an illustration of what a fine thing it is to live under American democracy? There are very few places in the world today where a debate, such as we are now conducting could be carried on. In many countries if Senator BORAH and Senator NORRIS made the speeches which they did over the radio, one of them would end up in a concentration camp. Here we still have room for differences of opinion. We still have the right to express those differences of opinion. That room and that right must not be destroyed. That's why it is so important that, regardless of the outcome of this legislation, we stick to our determination to stay out of this war. We must not endanger American democracy by getting into it."

The next letter is interesting because it comes from a high-school student, and I will read all of it:

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I am a junior in high school and I want to get on my high-school debate team. The subject for the try-out is, 'Resolved, that the Congress should amend the Neutrality Act as requested by the President.' I have been studying this for the last 2 weeks, and I would like to have you help me by explaining what the new bill will do. I have studied all about the arms embargo, and I have made up my mind about that, but what I want you to do is to tell me exactly what the bill will do. Yours very truly."

My answer was this:

"MY DEAR RICHARD: I received your letter telling me about your debate try-out. I am sending you, under separate cover, copies of the present law and the proposed bill; also the Senate committee hearings and six speeches, three on each side of the subject. I am glad to know that you have made up your mind about the arms embargo, and I hope that the speeches by the six Senators will not confuse you.

"You do ask me the specific question about what the proposed law will do, and I will answer that specifically as follows:

"It is a careful, painstaking effort to correct our past mistakes. It is a code of restrictions upon our citizens so as to prevent any one of us from so conducting ourselves as to endanger all of us. It prohibits our ships from traveling to belligerents or from making deliveries to belligerent ships. It prohibits goods owned by Americans being shipped to belligerents. It prohibits our ships and our citizens, even though destined for neutral countries, to travel through the dangerous submarine and mine-infested areas. It prohibits our citizens from traveling on ships owned by belligerents. It prevents the arming of our merchant vessels. It prevents our Government and our people from loaning money or extending credit to belligerent governments. It so strengthens the duties of the Munitions Control Board as to give Congress such a check on munitions as to prevent our being dragged into war by munitions sales. It takes away from the President all of the important discretionary power granted in the 1937 act. There is not a word in it giving the President power to name aggressors. Since it treats both sides precisely alike, it is as truly neutral as any law that could be devised. Since it simply restrains our own citizens, neither side has a right to object to it. It tries to substitute a true peace plan for our present dangerous unneutral hodge-podge. If any law can keep us out of war, this one will.

"With best of luck to you in your try-out for the debate. Yours truly."

The next letter from which I wish to read came from Wenatchee, Wash. In part, it reads as follows:

"What are you fellows trying to do? For the last 5 years I have heard about cash and carry. I thought that meant real honest cash, and now I see your bill provides for 90 days' credit. Why are you making that change and giving credit to these governments?"

I answered in this way:

"You certainly are entitled to ask the question you submitted in your letter. If, as you say, this present bill would propose to loosen up credit, I would certainly vigorously oppose it. I think it extremely unfortunate that those who oppose the bill have attempted to represent to the people that the new bill does loosen up credits. The fact is it definitely restricts them. I first ask you to remember that the present law, insofar as it relates to financial transactions, was very largely written by those who now oppose the new law. In 1935, 1936, and 1937 they wrote into the law the financial provisions which prohibit credits, the extension of credits, or the public sale or exchange of bonds or other obligations by any belligerent government. At the end of that section they used this language:

" 'Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its citizens, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.'

"If you will read that carefully, you will see that it places almost no restrictions upon the President. He can grant 60-day, 90-day, 120-day, or even 6-month credits under it. Those of us who wrote this new law felt that that was too much discretion to give to the President, and that it should be limited. Consequently, we inserted into the law three definite restrictions.

"We said that the President could not permit the extensions of credit by our citizens to belligerent governments for a period longer than 90 days. It isn't 90 days' credit. The 90 days is the outside limit. Then we provided that the obligation or contract by which the belligerent government bought goods from our citizens would have to show upon its face that it was not renewable. Our third restriction was that if any government failed to pay within 90 days they then could get no more credit.

"In other words, we took the present law, which was written by the opponents to the proposed law and which was loose and indefinite, and tied it up in three important particulars. Now the opponents of this law, who in 1935, 1936, and 1937 were perfectly satisfied with the indefinite and loose provisions which I have quoted, are trying to make you and other people in the country believe that the Pittman bill opens up the field for extended credits. It not only does not open up the field, it tries to tie up the loopholes in the present act."

The next letter was very short. It just had two sentences. Let me read them:

"You said over the radio last night that the United States will stay out of this war. Do you really believe it?"

My answer was: "I most assuredly do believe the United States will stay out of this war. The chief reason I believe it is that the American people are so determined to stay out. We know the utter futility of getting into another European war. We tried it once, thinking we could help solve Europe's problems. It took them only a short 20 years to get back at each other's throat again. We don't intend to sacrifice the lives, the bodies, and the minds of our young men, nor the resources of our country making that same mistake again.

"Another reason is that the Members of Congress are so determined that we stay out. Since I have been in Washington the last 2 weeks, I have not heard a single Member of Congress express the fatalistic idea that we had to get in. We are all determined that we are not going to get in.

"The third reason is that the President is determined to stay cut. I talked to him and I talked to many Members of the Senate who also had conversations with him on the subject. You probably have read criticisms of the President in the last few years that when he makes up his mind about something he, to quote the articles, 'gets his Dutch up' and nothing can change him. The President has 'his Dutch up' on this question of staying out of war, and nobody is going to change him on it. He is not going to permit our Nation to get into this war."

Proposed Neutrality Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from a speech delivered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] at a mass meeting called to support the proposed neutrality law held in the National Press Auditorum in Washington, D. C., on September 26, 1939.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The eyes of the world are upon America again. For what we do in the next few weeks shall, in the judgment of most men, determine not only the course of our country but the kind of world in which those who come after us shall live.

A war has been thrust upon the world by a great international brigand. A man who himself has ordered men shot down without a trial; with a pistol in his own presence because they differed with him politically. A man who has repudiated religion and man's God and turned the clock of time back before religion and Christ and the cross.

By a man who has probably adopted war—the killing of men, the widowing of wives, the orphaning of children, the maiming of men's bodies, the cruel, cold destruction of the finest artistry of man's mind and hands as the chief instrument of his international policy.

By a man who disdains human freedom, who scorns human rights, whose cynical mind ignores human aspirations, who derides the reach of human conscience into the ethereal realms of the spirit.

In the face of the prayers of the world, against the entreaty of men and women of good will everywhere, to satisfy his lust for power and greed for conquest, this man has engulfed the world in the carnage of war.

We love peace. We so much want peace that we are willing to make any sacrifice for it. In the neutrality legislation now pending we have been willing to give up the freedom of the seas—to abandon the high roads of the world—to bring home every American ship which flies the American flag, because we so much are determined upon peace.

While no other nation in the world restrains its commerce or closes its borders to any purchaser who comes for its goods, we say we will not venture a single ship—a single sailor or a single citizen—even where war may be upon the high seas, let alone in a country where a war is.

To the warring nations we say "If you want our goods, come and get them in our own harbors, upon our own shores; take them home, your own goods, in your own conveyances, and at your own risk."

While Germany buys from any one of a dozen neighbors upon ordinary commercial principles without any remonstrance from Germany's enemies, there are those who say that we will offend Germany if we alike open our shores and in our own harbors sell Germany's enemies who may come, get, and take home the goods they buy from us here.

In spite of the fact that under the neutrality law we do not even send our ships to Canada upon the Atlantic or the Pacific, though those sea routes are within the shadows of our shores.

They say we have not made enough sacrifices for peace.

They say they favor "come and get it" as a principle for general commerce, yet they profess to distinguish between commerce generally and commerce that might go to make war.

They say they will not keep soldiers at the front, yet they would furnish food, and uniforms, and communication wires, and trucks, and paper and pencils, and all the myriad other articles which go to make war.

They say it's all right for a land power to buy from its neighbors, but all wrong for a sea power to buy from its neighbors.

They say it's all right to sell wheat, but they overlook that it was the fact that Germany did not have wheat which ended the war.

They say if America sells her goods, her arms, to any purchaser who "comes and gets them," it will contribute to the carnage of war.

I say if America does not sell her goods, the carnage of war will spread.

I say if America's goods or guns are bought and taken home by any country who uses them in the defense of human freedom, for the preservation of the Christian religion, for the sanctity of human rights, the sacredness of human hopes and aspirations, I thank God for it.

They say America's destiny is isolation. I say if they mean by isolation staying out of Europe's quarrels, not haggling over other people's territory, not seeking other nations' conquest, we are all isolationists; but if they mean by isolation that we are disinterested in whether civilization perishes from the earth, whether bloody Hitlerism baptizes the earth, whether dastardly dictatorship encompasses the world, whether the iron feet of tyrants trample down the free peoples of the earth, whether religion endures and God is worshipped, whether we have no sense of right, no feeling of wrong, no sympathy for victims, no sentiment for the oppressed, no care for those who are maimed and mangled; if they mean that America is alike without a conscience or a cause; if they mean that America repudiates all her glorious past, that she forfeits all her noble destiny, that she has grown callous to every fine thing that moves the hearts of men and women, I say, "Thank God, I am not that kind of an isolationist."

Now, therefore, in this crucial hour let America be prayerful, patriotic, calm, cool, solemn, for what we are about is the serious business of preserving all that we have saved out of the wreckage of the past. A united people, one from many, we stand forth before the world to find and to follow a course which is fair, which is right, and which our ancestors before us and the Providence which has guided us will alike approve.

Neutrality Issue

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], at the request of the Detroit News and the North American Newspaper Alliance, dealing with the subject of neutrality.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit News and the North American Newspaper Alliance]

(By Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS)

For those who wish to understand clearly the problems facing Congress during the special session in bringing about a modification of the so-called Neutrality Act of 1937 it is well to keep certain definite facts in mind at all times.

International law is a series of customs governing the habits of nations in carrying out their relations with one another and the relations of their nationals with nationals of foreign states. Customarily international law is divided into two major groupings, the law during peacetimes and the law during wartimes. Neutrality is a division of international law.

The law which Congress is considering is domestic law. Anything which Congress does will not modify international law as such, but it will curb the activities of American citizens in their dealings with belligerent states and with nationals of belligerent states.

Thus, when it is said we shall go back to international law, such a statement means merely that the Government of the United States will remove those restrictions from the activities of American citizens if the restrictions are in excess of what is deemed a proper act under international law. There will be no going back to international law as such as a result of the special session of Congress, because neither the President nor Congress is in a mood to remove all restrictions.

LIMIT FOR AMERICANS

Therefore, that which Congress will do will be merely to limit the activities of Americans. Congress will enact only domestic law, and that which it may do will not affect the international law of neutrality so far as other countries are concerned, because no other country has a law similar to our Neutrality Act of 1937.

Now, then, it is said that it would be unneutral to change the rules of the game while a war is in progress. It would be unneutral if we were to take a stand to allow American citizens rights outside the realm of international law, but as long as any restriction we put on our American citizens will be within this realm such change could not be deemed unneutral.

A restriction on American citizens might work to the advantage or disadvantage of certain belligerents, but this would not be contrary to the law of neutrality, because there is no way under the sun to do or not to do anything which will affect all the belligerents in the same way.

Another thing for us to keep in mind is the fact that America today is a declared neutral, not because of the Neutrality Act of 1937, but because of the international law of war. The President proclaimed America's neutrality first in accordance with international law and domestic law, and then proclaimed certain embargoes and prohibitions in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1937.

NO WAR PARTY

Therefore there can be legally no pro-war group of American citizens, and actually there are very few citizens who want to see America in war. No one is advocating it.

I cannot emphasize this point too greatly. There is no war party in America, there is not even a saber bloc, such as attracted substantial support before the war of 1917. For an orator to insist otherwise is tantamount to going into the street shouting "Fire" when there is no fire, to cry "Stop thief" when there is no theft, to alarm and to panic a sensitive and worried public without reason or excuse. There are no war groups in the United States today. This may be stated as an axiom.

I personally stand exactly where I have always stood, claiming that America's mission is to remain neutral and that no possible advantage could come to us or to the world by our getting into this war. Therefore everything that I would work for would be something which in my opinion would tend to keep us out of war and tend toward building American neutrality traditions and practices stronger than ever.

If we can keep most of the nations of the world from becoming belligerents, not only shall we save lives but also there will be some chance to have a constructive peace tempered by neutral influences rather than a harsh peace imposed by victors upon the vanquished.

AGREE ON NEUTRALITY

Therefore I emphasize the fact that those on both sides of the controversy concerning the embargo actually stand shoulder to shoulder on the peace program and both are in hearty agreement that American neutrality shall be preserved. How best this can be done is therefore the question. Those who want to modify the act press for modification because of a firm conviction that the act as it exists may be more likely to bring us into war than it will as modified.

Why do we say this? In the first place the act merely embargoes shipments of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war. All other things can be shipped to belligerents. The nation, therefore, which is lacking in arms, ammunitions, and implements of war, and which could get those things from us, is a nation that is hurt by our present embargo.

Now it just happens in this war that those nations which have not turned their entire economy into a war economy find themselves behind in the matter of certain implements of war, primarily airplanes. So strongly did the nations of the world feel that future war activities would depend upon airplanes that the nations which lost the World War were prohibited from building military airplanes. Germany did not start her present program until 1934 in respect to arming of the air. The Allies did not protest this in spite of the treaty. The results of the breach now are apparent to all.

LIMITATION HITS ALLIES

Therefore, the lifting of the embargo on airplanes undoubtedly will aid England and France. But if America restricts all exports to belligerents and makes those materials and commodities which now are outside the realm of arms, ammunitions, and implements exportable only after title has passed and ownership has been transferred to the buyer and consideration for the purchase received, we will thereby put a tremendously great limitation upon England and France, for they are in need of many things.

In the sum of all exports, then, the modifications to the act as suggested will primarily affect (and this will be adversely) England and France. Germany must buy indirectly because of, first of all, the barter system and, secondly, the hazards of the British-French blockade. Therefore the practical effect of the projected modifications cannot be looked upon as pro-Ally and will not, actually, because of the restrictions placed upon other things than arms, ammunitions, and implements of war.

Then, too, we must remember that the same restrictions in respect to purchases, transfer of title and ownership will hold for arms, ammunitions, and implements of war because those articles and materials can continue to be exported only under license and under complete governmental supervision, and the National Munitions Board has to report to Congress all transactions in those three classifications of articles.

RESTRICTIONS SET UP

Thus America is not going back to international law, but will remain even if all the President's points are incorporated into law, a nation restricting her citizens very much beyond the demands placed upon them through the provisions of international law, and America, too, will remain in that position of restricting her citizens more greatly than are the citizens of any other neutral restricted.

For example, in addition to the transfer of title in all commerce which will go to states at war, all American merchant vessels will be prohibited outright from carrying passengers or goods to belligerent states. The only modification of this rule probably will be certain activities under restriction covering American ships on the Great Lakes and in other territorial waters of the United States. Americans will be prohibited from traveling on belligerent ships.

The arming of American merchant ships will be prohibited. This will be done because of a firm conviction as a result of our experiences in the World War that it was a mistake to arm our merchantmen. It is assumed now that, even in a period of unrestricted submarine warfare, if a belligerent ship knows that our merchant ships cannot carry arms or any other goods to belligerent countries, and if it is known that our merchant ships have no facilities at all to do harm to a submarine there can be no excuse other than dastardly and wanton wickedness for a submarine to attack one of our ships.

COMPLETE CONTROL

Under the restrictions of the projected law an American ship could not be other than a messenger of peace. The financing of wars, the sale of belligerent bonds, and the sale of belligerent credit certificates will be completely prohibited. The solicitation of funds and the collection of money for belligerents will be stopped.

The prohibition against the use of American ports as a base of supplies for war vessels and submarines will be a part of the law. There will be a complete control of any armed merchant ships and any submarines of belligerents that may come into our ports.

The Munitions Control Board will control to the utmost the exportation of all arms, ammunitions, and implements of war and will report its findings and decisions regularly to Congress. The Congress of the United States will always know all necessary particulars in regard to the trade in arms. Then if abuses should arise they may be stopped very quickly.

Then I am sure that the projected law will continue the provision that "this act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war." Thus the solidarity of American neutrality will be developed and one more step toward making the Monroe Doctrine universal in its acceptance for the Americas will be made.

Pastorius Day Celebration, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES J. DAVIS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, on October 6 I attended a great mass meeting in the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia as a part of the Pastorius Day celebration. The music was splendid beyond my words to describe. The first number was Hail, Columbia, Happy Land, and the meeting was concluded with the singing of The Star-Spangled Banner. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address which I delivered on this occasion.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is the United States of America. It is our land. Here we live under the Constitution. Here we have the protection of the Bill of Rights. I speak from experience when I say that if there are any unnaturalized citizens present this evening you should at once begin to prepare yourselves for American citizenship and to enjoy the blessings which come from complete loyalty to this land in which we live.

In these times that stir and try the souls of men our hearts are filled with conflicting emotions. The need of the hour is sober thought and disciplined emotion. More than everything else, ours is the desire for peace. We find ourselves facing the upheavals of the Old World culture and the crest of the wave of hatred and war is moving rapidly toward our own shores. Believing as we do in peace, we are determined to withstand the barrage of propaganda and the false idealism which threaten to engulf us and destroy our peace.

We have lived through a World War and we have seen the terror of revolution. The influences of these events have cast their lengthening shadows far into the future. They have taken their toll on the battlefields of Africa, China, and Spain. We have witnessed the political and economic disaster of Central Europe. We have seen since the World War whole nations on the verge of bankruptcy and financial chaos. We have observed the destructive consequences of a peace that was framed in the spirit of war. From it we have learned that no issue is really settled until it is settled in the spirit of peace.

In our own country we have undergone an unprecedented depression. These 10 long years since 1929 have shattered our proud dreams of Utopia to which the Technocrats pointed in other days. The millions of hungry unemployed have gone everywhere in search of jobs. The right to work has been challenged. The hope of continuous employment from youth to old age has been shattered. Almost overnight we seem to be confronted with strange conditions and unusual problems which have taxed our social intelligence to the breaking point. While we continue to speak of "balancing the Budget" and putting men "back to work" we are coming to realize that we are in a death grapple with fundamental problems more serious than mankind has ever faced before. We are fighting in the cause of humanity—the battle of industrial freedom. Until we penetrate beneath the surface of these problems and get to the bottom of public issues, there is little hope for economic revival for the American people. In the past we have thought of our problems as very largely economic or political. Today we are coming to see that they are intensely human problems wrapped up in the inner nature of man himself. They depend upon the framework of mind, spirit, and character within the individual citizen. Until the greed and the selfishness which have marked the blind partisanship of the past have been restrained there is not much prospect of the human progress we so greatly desire. Recourse has been had to legislation. We now have the statute books heavy with new laws but the coming of the new legislation has not given a guaranty of the better day we seek. Facing these problems, the verdict of the future will be either that we are the gravediggers of a great and glorious past, or the pioneers of a better and more constructive tomorrow. Which shall it be?

As we face the future, it must be as good Americans. We are challenged to find within the framework of American culture and upon the background of American history a higher design for living and our individual destiny. For surely the position of Americans of German descent is one of great prominence. You and your fathers have become American citizens because of your free resolve to live your lives in this New World. Not only have you come here and remained here voluntarily, but you have chosen irrevocably to cast in your lot with the free people of this great continent. You have adopted for yourselves freely and fully the fundamental principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States. Particularly is this true in Germantown and Philadelphia, the shrine of American liberty, the cradle of the charter of our liberties. If there is any place in all the land where the Bill of Rights should mean the most, it is here in the very heart of Pennsylvania. Not only have you adopted these principles in the past, but from year to year as you gather in the celebration of Pastorius you have reaffirmed this confession of faith, taking once again the oath of allegiance. No one may rightly say that this oath has been taken lightly. You cannot and do not seek any other political allegiance. You cannot and do not hold a separate political faith. You cannot and do not approve of un-American methods and activities. You cannot and do not hold before your eyes any greater loyalty than that which you yield to these United States.

I have enjoyed over a long period of years the association with my many friends of German birth and descent. I know how strongly you feel attached to the glorious history of German achievement in this New World. I have sung with you your folk songs. I have talked and mingled in many of your festive occasions. I have met with many of your congregations gathered in sanctuary. I have found you steadfast and faithful in the performance of your individual responsibilities in your patriotic duties. I am confident that you will continue to be faithful to your fundamental pride and loyalty in America.

No one born in a foreign land as I have been can better estimate the true affection which one holds for the place of one's birth. This is the land of my adoption. This is the land where I have found great life and liberty. This is the land where I have married and where my children have been raised. This is the land where I expect to be buried. Even so, my thought goes back to the land of my birth. I cherish the companionship of those who speak of it as their homeland, and I am not forbidden to speak to them in the familiar folk tongue of a language of our common birth. I sing with them the old Welsh hymns. I feel with them a pride in the skill and the ingenuity of the workman of Welsh descent. I glory in the contribution which the Welsh have made to this New World. Surely I should be counted unnatural and a strange creature, should I forget the land of my birth and the blood heritage of the past. Similarly I can understand how men and women of German blood in America feel for their kindred. I can understand this feeling when found in any one of a dozen nationalities represented numerously in the State of Pennsylvania. As Americans we take pride in our ability to think differently, to acknowledge a different ancestry, and yet to remain together in peace and brotherhood.

Even before the landing of Germans under Franz Daniel Pastorius on October 6, 1683, and the subsequent founding of Germantown, Pa., there were Germans in this New World. In reality, there were Hessians present in Fort Royal, S. C., as early as 1562. That was more than 120 years before the landing of the good ship Concord, I am told, and the records show that in 1607 a goodly number of German artisans lived in Jamestown, Va. As with the German immigrant of today, so with the Germans who settled in Pennsylvania. They have shed luster upon the early history of our Commonwealth. Conrad Weiser, sometimes called the Father of the Pennsylvania Germans—pioneer, patriot, volunteer, and trusted interpreter—has special significance at this time. A monument has been erected to his memory. Standing at Weiser's grave at the time of Washington's visit to Womelsdorff, the Father of his Country said: "The departed man rendered many services to this country in a difficult period and posterity will not forget him." Daniel Boone, of German-American stock, was the first to penetrate the wilderness of the Far West. A German Marylander, Johann Lederer, was the first to explore in 1669 the country west of the Alleghenies. John Zinger, a German printer in New York, was the father of the liberty of the press in this country. The two Conrad Weisers, father and son, were the first interpreters of the Indians. General Muhlenberg, of revolutionary fame, was afterward the first Speaker of the House of Representatives and first United States Senator of Pennsylvania. I. L. Hassler created our coastal survey. Two Germans, the Roeblings, father and son, planned and perfected the great Brooklyn Bridge. William Rittenhaus in 1690 erected the first paper mill in America. Thomas Ruetter in 1716 founded the first iron works in Pennsylvania. Christopher Witt in Germantown built our first church organ, and Johann Behrent in 1775 built the first American piano. Casper Wuster in 1738 founded the first glass factory in America. The Cramps, great American shipbuilders, were also of German descent. Johann G. Cramp, the founder, came to the United States in 1756. Karl S. Herreschoff, the famous builder of racing yachts, was born in Minden, Germany, and came to the United States an accomplished engineer in 1800.

Eberhard Faber, founder of the American lead-pencil industry, was born in Nuremburg, Germany; Klaus Spreckels, founder of the American beet-sugar industry, was born in Hanover; John I. Astor, founder of the American Fur Co., in Walldorff; and G. Martin Brill, largest car manufacturer, in Cassel. A man who may be regarded as the founder of the American department store, John Wanamaker, was originally known as "Wannamacher." I am told that he was a life member of the German Society of Pennsylvania, founded in 1764. And who will forget the fame of Inspector General Baron von Steuben, Major General de Kalb, Major General Muhlenberg, Gen. Christopher Ludwig, Senior Surgeon Dr. Otto—all of Revolutionary fame. During the War of 1812 Major General Armistead was the defender of Fort McHenry, Baltimore. The heroic deeds of Armistead and his men inspired Francis Scott Key to write The Star-Spangled Banner—our national anthem. During the Civil War 1,176,817 Americans born in Germany joined the Army of the North and no less than 52 Germans rose to the rank of general in the Union armies. These few names do not begin to tell the story of German achievement in behalf of America.

I very well remember speaking in Berlin in praise of Karl Schurz, who did so much to bring a new spirit of liberty into our own American political institutions. Today his name is honored both in America and in Europe for his love of liberty and his vision of true representative government. The Karl Schurz Memorial Foundation has been established to keep alive the principles to which he dedicated his own life.

I have received a number of honorary degrees. Among them I prize none more than that which I received from Muhlenberg College. I have regarded with more than usual affection the relationship thus established between this college and myself, particularly because I have rejoiced to have my name associated with that of the beloved Muhlenberg.

The deeds of the past challenge us to greater deeds in the future. Those who have gone before us have paved the way for a glorious tomorrow. The difficulties of the present hour must not fill us with terror, but should call us to a more active endeavor in behalf of this country which we so greatly love. There are always those who seek to misunderstand and misinterpret any activity of a cultural nature of foreign origin. False implications have even been drawn from our meeting today. However, we are here fully intent upon the preservation of our American form of government and to acknowledge the great debt which this Nation owes to men and women of German descent who for long generations have made this land their home and the last abode of their affections.

The problems of peace and neutrality are now before us. There are many sinister influences at work in our land which in the name of peace desire secretly to embroil this Nation in war. They are the ones who say "I believe in peace, but," people who are endeavoring to lead us away from the principles of George Washington. Efforts are being made to identify this country with foreign quarrels not of our own making. I wish to say emphatically—the present strife of Europe is not our war. As I have said many times in the past, I shall do everything in my power to keep this country free from war.

Our first responsibility is the maintenance of our own domestic economy. We have unsolved problems in our own land from which we are being diverted at the present time. We still have 10,000,000 unemployed. We still have a national debt of staggering proportions. We still have millions on relief and work relief for whom only a temporary provision has been made. We still have railroads that are next door to bankruptcy. We still have farm prices that are ridicuously low. We have these and other domestic problems for which no permanent provision has been made. I am thoroughly convinced that the best judgment of both business, labor, investment, and the taxpayers of America counsels us that war can never bring the solution to these problems that they require. War will take our best and use it for the worst. War will take our young men and use them as cannon fodder. War will disrupt the normal processes of business and trade. War will build hate where once there was good will. For every problem war solves, it throws up a dozen greater problems to be solved. America wants peace, not war. America wants work and peace.

A propaganda has gone abroad in the land that we should now come to the rescue of the democracies of Europe. In effect, we are urged to replace our own present form of government with a centralized military government in behalf of the age-long quarrels of the rival imperialisms of the Old World. Fortunately in this hour of propaganda and counter propaganda the American people are not asleep. I rejoice that so many are alert and watchful. I rejoice that the American people as a whole are now asking for peace and not for war. Our people are able to think for themselves and they can see beneath the subtle suggestions that have been thrown out for the purpose of embroiling us in Europe's conflict. As Americans we still believe with George Washington that this country should avoid entangling alliances. We still believe that this country has a set of conditions which are not at present found elsewhere in the world and which permit us to remain at peace while other lands are plunged in war. In fact, we are now drawing to the close of a decade of war. The world has witnessed war ever since 1931. The imperialistic designs of warring powers have turned both China, North Africa, and Spain into a human slaughter house. We successfully adhered to our fundamental American principle—to keep out of foreign wars. We kept out then and we should keep out now.

Our first and last thought must now be for America. We have here a form of government which has carried on for over 150 years—the oldest government of any major power in the world. These blessings have come to us because of the Constitution of the United States. We are grateful for the blessings we here enjoy. We are determined to allow no alien philosophy of government to destroy these blessings. There is no place in America for those who would put first the cause of communism or fascism. There is no place in America for a totalitarian concept of government contrary to our Constitution. There is no place in America for the iron hand of a dictatorship.

We have within our borders a great prize. We have here the wealth of the world. We have a body of over 130,000,000 American citizens. They have had the opportunities of education such as no other people have so largely enjoyed. Here we have freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of organization. We are determined to maintain these liberties and to perpetuate our American form of government.

We would do well to remember that these blessings will remain with us only so long as we are strong enough to protect them. We need a national defense that will permit no foreign power to entertain destructive visions of our American civilization. We want a Navy on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts equal to any in the world. We want an air force of intelligent, highly trained men equal to any emergency. We want industrial adaptation that can be directed to any military need. In a word, we are determined to protect ourselves on land, sea, and in the air.

I very well recall when I came with my mother to this land, she carried with her pictures of Queen Victoria and Abraham Lincoln. She had lived under an unwritten constitution. She had held allegiance to the British Crown. When they landed in New York City, however, she said, "This is now my land; it is our new home; it shall be the land for my children"; and she was completely faithful to the land of her adoption. She passed on to her children this same loyalty to America. From first to last, since I came to this land, I sought in every possible way to be faithful to the Stars and Stripes and to the Constitution of the United States and to the Government of the people, by the people, and for the people which, please God, shall not perish from the earth.

In conclusion I wish to say that I was invited to speak at this meeting by Capt. Louis Schmidt, whom I have known for over 30 years. I have implicit confidence in his loyalty to this country. He had assured me that the purpose of this meeting is fundamentally patriotic and American. I am not for Hitler; I am not for Stalin; and I do not stand under the banners of nazi-ism or communism. I am opposed to the infiltration of alien doctrines of the totalitarian states into this country. I believe I am well within my rights as an American citizen when I say that I resent the activities of those who seek to intimidate me or to prevent me from exercising fully and freely the civil rights of an American citizen. I would have kept my appointment at this meeting even though it should have been necessary for me to come from Washington to Philadelphia on a handcar and pump my own way. If for no other reason, I would be here to address loyal German-American citizens gathered to uphold the principles of free speech to which all of us stand committed under the Constitution of the United States.

I do not expect to be caught up in any controversy between Nazis and Communists in this country. It is well known that the battle between these alien philosophies is being carried on throughout the land. At the present time, I understand that the American League for Peace and Democracy is under investigation by the Dies committee. The Washington branch of this organization has issued a statement, October 4, saying: "We advocate a foreign policy for the United States that closely corresponds with the express views of the President. On domestic issues we have backed the program of the New Deal and defended the constitutional guaranties of civil liberties against the attacks of un-American and undemocratic forces." And yet Miss Neulight, speaking for the American League for Peace and Democracy, declared that I should cancel my engagement to speak to our German-American citizens. I am confident that my appearance tonight in the Metropolitan Opera House gives no comfort to Herr Hitler or to those who favor his methods and form of government.

During the World War I spoke in many German-American meetings. I found them steadfastly loyal to our flag. My observation is the same as that of Gen. Hugh Johnson, who last night on the radio declared that "during the war he did not find a more loyal or patriotic group of American citizens anywhere than those of German descent in the United States." I am for peace. I am working for peace, but should our country become engaged in war, I would not expect on that account to be separated from loyal German-Americans or any other loyal group of Americans with whom I have lived and worked these many years. The worst foes of America at the present time are not the armed forces of any foreign power; they are the forces within our own midst which seek to divide and separate the American people on the basis of class or race. We are all one people; we have a common destiny; we have a common allegiance; we put first our loyalty to the Government of the United States and the principles of constitutional government under which we live.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY L. STIMSON, FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an address recently delivered by former Secretary of State, Henry L. Stimson, over the Columbia Broadcasting System. I wish to say that, while I do not agree with every position taken by the former distinguished Secretary of State, it is a very able address, and I think it is worthy of being published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In discussing the so-called neutrality legislation I shall try to start from a basis on which we can all stand together. Then we can more easily see what the problem is and what our real differences in regard to its solution may be. I believe that our people are very much united in the common objective which they are trying to attain and that such differences as exist are differences only as to the best method of reaching that common purpose. In such a situation we ought to be able to discuss the matter as American citizens in a common spirit of tolerance and patriotism.

I think that the problem before us is really a problem of national defense and what we are all trying to decide is how best to preserve and protect the security of the people of the United States. That is the purpose which I think President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull have in mind when they ask for a repeal of the present embargo. I think it is also the objective which their opponents have in mind when they oppose the repeal of the embargo. The only difference between them is as to which method will best promote that ultimate aim. If I had the naming of the bill now before the Senate, I should call it a bill to promote and preserve the security of the United States. I should not call it a neutrality bill. Neutrality is not the end of our efforts. It is merely one of the means which is being discussed in an effort to reach the real objective, security.

Again a great many people think the end which we are considering is how to keep the United States out of war. But after all that again is only a means toward the achievement of a further ultimate end. It is true that at the present moment we are all united on trying to keep out of war.

But a time may well come when the only way to promote the security of the people of the United States would be to fight for that security. That has been the case several times in our history, and very often the case in the history of other nations. The people of Great Britain and France think that it is the case with their countries today. If a time should come when it was clear beyond peradventure that the only way to preserve the security of the United States and its institutions was to fight for them, I believe that the great majority of our people would choose war rather than the greater evil of submission to an enemy on our shores. So I think I am right in my analysis of the ultimate aim of all of us, and I hope that those who are listening to me tonight will agree with me. I will therefore discuss the issue pending in the Senate from that standpoint.

I am one of those who believe that the President and Mr. Hull are right. I believe that the embargo provisions of the present law have not been an aid to the security of the United States, but that, on the contrary, they have greatly jeopardized that security. For 4 years these provisions have tended to make the leaders of Germany and other nations believe that the people of the United States took no concern in what was going on in the world outside their boundaries; that they did not feel any responsibility or apprehension for anything that might happen abroad even if those events might result in the destruction or subjugation of all of the democratic and peace-loving nations in Europe and the domination of that entire continent by the aggressive power of the dictatorships. I think that those leaders have been encouraged to believe that we did not have foresight enough to see what would happen to us in case of such a catastrophe and that we would take no step whatever, even peaceful steps, to forestall such a danger. I thus think that these provisions for an embargo have to a material extent encouraged the present breach of the peace by Germany when she invaded Poland. I believe that such opinion as to the United States constitutes a gross slander on the foresight, wisdom, and patriotism of our people and a gross misapprehension of our history; of what we have done in the past and what we would do in the future in case necessity required. And I believe that these provisions of the present law have thus produced a situation which, unless altered, is almost certain to result in an ultimate clash between ourselves and the leaders who have thus so completely misunderstood us and our character.

Under these circumstances I am confident that a repeal of this embargo would be of both material and moral help in preventing such a disaster. It would not only materially assist and encourage the nations who are fighting for freedom but it would aid in keeping those nations who are now wavering from joining the side of the dictators. Thus I consider that such a repeal would greatly contribute to our own safety. It would not only help to keep us from becoming involved in this war but it would help prevent a subsequent attack upon us and our hemisphere in case the dictators should win this war.

Let us examine the lessons of history and experience bearing on this question. This provision in the present law for a compulsory automatic embargo against the shipment of arms by this Nation was adopted 4 years ago, and its adoption was a departure from our general policy as a nation which had lasted almost unbroken for 150 years. An examination of that policy may help us today. It was based upon the wisdom of early American statesmen who knew the character of their countrymen, who also knew Europe during a great war, and who were uncommonly foresighted in devising the means of guiding a growing American Nation through the difficulties of a stormy world.

These ancestors of ours were peace-loving but not pacifists. They had had the hardest kind of fighting to preserve their liberties. They were idealistic but cool-headed. Above all they were not oblivious to the outside world. The seafaring men of early America were among the boldest sailors of the sea. The merchants and the traders of New England and the eastern seaboard were in touch with all foreign markets and were familiar with the vital influence of commerce upon us and other countries. The statesmen who represented these men believed that the United States would always be a peace-loving Nation and that its future would be devoted to the orderly development of its inheritance on this continent. They themselves were devoted to personal liberty and for that reason were deeply opposed to the maintenance in times of peace of a large military establishment or of stores of arms and ammunition. But they recognized very clearly that such a policy might at times endanger our country in case we should be attacked by a more military or aggressive nation. They therefore believed that we should keep ourselves free to purchase arms for our self-defense in case any such attack were made.

They also recognized that there were other peace-loving nations in the world like ours who might be similarly attacked by more aggressive or better armed enemies, and they were wise enough to see that what they sought for themselves they could not deny to others. Consequently our Government has urged that there should be full freedom under international law for other nations as well as ourselves to purchase arms and ammunition in the markets of the world even after the outbreak of war. It saw clearly that otherwise there would be no alternative except for every nation to have in readiness at all times sufficient munitions of war to meet any emergency and they believed that this would eventually result in the whole world becoming an armed camp. It was that such a situation would be the death of any hope for general disarmament or for the establishment of a system of reason and justice in the settlement of international disputes.

It therefore deliberately took its stand for a policy which would encourage nations to avoid militarism in time of peace but would permit them to obtain through purchases outside their borders the means of self-defense in case war was forced upon them by a better armed aggressor nation. This policy of the United States has been long recognized by our Secretaries of State and our historians.

In the light of what has happened in the world today I think we can now see that this former American policy was wise and that it was dangerous and unwise to depart from it 4 years ago. Today the world is being confronted with one of the most powerful, deliberate, and dangerous efforts in organized national aggression that has ever been attempted. For at least 400 years most of the nations had been slowly laboring for a better international organization for peace. They have had many setbacks but their progress, though slow, had been unmistakable and hopeful. They have been trying to establish a system which should depend upon accepted rules of conduct rather than assertions of force and which should be founded upon the general principle of mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and safety. They have been struggling to introduce reason and justice rather than the sword as the arbiters for international disputes. They have thus sought gradually to establish a true system of international law.

But within the past decade a group of aggressive nations has suddenly arisen which has rejected this effort and cast all its beliefs and traditions into the discard. These nations have frankly reverted to aggression and force as the only rule of international practice. They have laughed to scorn the principle of fidelity to rules and treaties and agreements among nations. Instead they have developed a skillful technique of terrorism and force, the methods of which have of late become familiar to us all. Every reader of the world's news can now recognize when a new aggression is being planned and set on foot. The successive steps which will lead up to a final ultimatum or blow, whether it be against Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, China, Ethiopia, Albania, Estonia, or the Ukraine, can be recognized from the first moment when a servile and controlled press begins its clamor. In such a situation all of the peace-loving nations of the world, including ourselves, are thrown back upon the only remaining recourse—self-defense—and woe to them if the privilege which our ancestors sought to preserve as a policy of this country is not left open to them, namely, the privilege of buying arms in the markets of the world for their self-defense.

Consider what an adverse effect our experiment 4 years ago in embargo legislation is having upon France and Great Britain as they face this organized system of aggression in Europe. A few years ago in the Washington and London naval conferences of 1921 and 1930 they joined with us in an earnest effort to promote world peace by naval disarmament. They reduced and limited the number of their ships. Both of their navies are weaker today than they would have been if they had not made this effort. But now, when that effort has failed and other nations have been secretly arming against them, we have passed an embargo law which forbids them to resort to our markets in order to repair their consequent weakness in national defense. The safety of those navies today would certainly be greatly strengthened if their owners could buy airplanes from our manufacturers.

I am not calling your attention to these matters for the sake of these other nations. I am speaking to you solely in the interest of our own country. I ask you, in all seriousness, cannot you yourselves see how the security of the people of the United States will be affected by a naval disaster to those two nations? If the fleets of France and Great Britain should be beaten down by the dangers that threaten them today, have you any doubts as to the seriousness of the situation which would then confront us? Have you any doubts as to the jeopardy in which our own American interests in this hemisphere would then be placed? This very week there has been going on at Panama a conference between representatives of all the republics of this hemisphere "for the purpose of taking the measures necessary to safeguard the peace of the Americas." That is the language in which our Secretary of State described the meeting. Now, by whom is that peace threatened? Against whom are these safeguards being constructed for the preservation of our Monroe Doctrine? I do not think that either Great Britain or France would in these days be considered by even the smallest or weakest of the 21 republics of this hemisphere to be a threat to its peace or to the safety of its institutions. The representatives at the Panama conference evidently have other nations in mind. They evidently recognize that if Germany and her supporters should win this war, and should then with their fleets control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, a very novel and a very grave situation would then confront the nations of this hemisphere.

But some one may assert that the repeal of the embargo would be an unneutral act because we would be trying to help Britain and France win the war in which they are engaged. My answer is that in opening our markets for the sale of arms to all who can come and get them we should be doing only what has been recognized as lawful for a neutral nation to do for a hundred and fifty years. Furthermore, if any should seek to ask our reason for so doing, we are doing it for the purpose of preserving our own security in a world where international law has been so broken down by the acts of the dictator nations that the necessities of national defense have become more clearly paramount than ever.

Again some of the opponents of repeal have said that it would be illegal for us during the pendency of the war which has now broken out to change our law as to the embargo and go back to our practice of former years. These gentlemen do not hesitate to favor other changes in the law, such as the new proposed restrictions on American shipping which may well have results adverse to France and Britain. But they would have us stand by our error of 4 years ago as to the embargo even if it endangered our own safety to do so, lest otherwise we might have misled and done a wrong to Chancelor Hitler. Such language seems like a voice from Mars. In the face of the present situation it is fantastic. These objectors base their objection upon precedents which have never applied to such a situation as faces the world today—a situation where the old rules of international law have been reduced to chaos by the action of Germany itself. To illustrate what I mean, just consider the absurdity of the situation which would be presented if Chancelor Hitler appeared before an international tribunal with a claim against the United States based upon our repeal of the embargo provision. He would have to say in substance: "The United States has wronged me by changing this law. I invaded Poland and destroyed her cities in the confident belief that America would not make this change and that I could carry out my aggression with immunity. Now she has changed and I have been visited with punishment by Poland's guarantors. I demand damages." How far would he get? The objection sounds like a product of hysteria. I put forward such details only to emphasize the absurdity that a grave measure of legislation for the purpose of promoting our national safety should be delayed by arguments like these.

In short my view is that the security, present and future, of the United States and of its people will be promoted by the repeal of the embargo and that such a step will not tend to drag us into war. So long as Great Britain and France are fighting and their forces command the seas, the people of the United States cannot be dragged into war except by their own deliberate volition. They need not fight unless they want to fight. And they can be counted on to make that momentous decision with great prudence and caution. The real time of danger will only come in case France and Britain are beaten down, subjugated, and their fleets taken or destroyed or made useless by air attacks. Then and then only may the people of the United States lose their choice to determine whether they will go to war or not. Then, and then only, is a foreign aggressor likely to enter this hemisphere and approach our shores and seize positions on the continent which will actually threaten us. Then, and then only, will we face the worst of all possibilities—the possibility of an invasion of our land and homes by a foreign force. The British and the French are now fighting a battle which, in case they are beaten, will, whether we wish it or not, become our own battle; and in the interest of our own safety we should repeal this foolish and dangerous embargo and return to the wise policy of our forefathers. Our national security is an aim upon which we can all stand together animated by a common patriotic purpose.

Projection of America Into War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Getting America Into War Has Started Again" delivered on September 27, 1939, by Dr. John Haynes Holmes.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Nothing is so vitally important to the American people at this present moment as to keep our own country out of the war now raging on the continent of Europe. This is especially important in view of the efforts being made on every side to get this country into the conflict. One would think that the proposition was so ridiculous that it could find no salesmen foolish enough to try to put it over. We went into the last war under the impression that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy and to end war forever on this planet. We sacrificed 137,000 of our fairest young men dead or maimed; we expended $40,000,000,000 of our hard-earned wealth; we corrupted our public morals, disordered our political and economic life, prepared the way for the great depression, only to discover that Europe was not interested in ideals, that France and England were concerned not with peace but with extending and consolidating their empires, that in the Versailles Treaty were the inevitable causes and conditions of another war. And now this war has come. Is it conceivable that the American people are such idiots as to be drawn into war again? Are we actually going to burn our fingers a second time pulling the hot chestnuts of other nations out of the imperialistic fire? It would seem to be impossible. The worst cynics could not charge a democracy with conduct which a moronic child would know enough to avoid. Yet siren voices are again enticing us into the whirlpools of deceit and disaster. In a few months, even a few weeks, we shall be in dire danger of being swept off our feet by a campaign to get us into this new war even as we went into the old one. This campaign is being organized on at least three fronts.

First, there is the English propaganda, which is already well under way. Indeed, this propaganda got started long before hostilities began, for the visit to this country last June of King George and Queen Elizabeth, a delightful social event in which guests and hosts alike were at their best, was in essence nothing in the world but a magnificently camouflaged attempt to persuade every American to do his duty when Great Britain was again fighting for her empire. Now this English propaganda is descending upon us like an avalanche. We know just how it was prepared and loosed a quarter of a century ago. Every detail of the long-sustained, highly organized, enormously expensive, and completely successful undertaking upon the part of the English to drag us into the last war has long since been published, and is familiar. Even the plans for getting us into this next war have been carelessly or callously laid bare in Mr. Sidney Rogerson's amazing book, entitled "Propaganda in the Next War," published in England a year ago but not yet published in this country. Every move for our seduction, in other words, has been prepared, and now, with the opportune arrival of a new British Ambassador, Lord Lothian, well trained by his experience in the last war, may be expected to be started without delay. Newspapers, radios, movies, and lecture platforms will combine to release these propaganda germs upon us. We shall encounter them at our public dinners, in our churches, in our drawingrooms, in our homes. It will be like breathing the foul atmosphere of pestilence. Have we become immune to this contagion? Have we built up resistance to such attack? Or are we the same old "easy marks" we were in 1914–17? This coming year will give us the answer.

Secondly, there are the business interests which are eager to get us into the war for the sake of the profits that may be made. "Thar's gold in them thar hills" was the cry of the pioneer prospectors who wandered the ranges of the far West in the covered-wagon days. "There's gold in that there fighting" is the cry of American industrialists, exporters, and jobbers generally who supply the myriad materials with which a modern war is kept going. Chief among them, of course, are the armament and munition manufacturers whose methods are no longer mysterious. These "merchants of death," as they have been called, have for years been fomenting wars, continuing wars, extending wars, for the sake of keeping business at top speed in the munitions plants. Again and again they have started war scares, organized preparedness campaigns, defeated disarmament and peace conferences, and always in wartime have sold their goods indiscriminately to both sides, the enemy as well as their own country. Just now they are dedicating their talents to breaking down the neutrality law, by removing the present embargo against selling and shipping arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations. For this is the real explanation of what is going on in Washington today. It is not the will of the President nor the wish of the people that is important, but the nefarious purposes of those munitions manufacturers to whom the neutrality law is an obstacle in the way of big profits. The Capitol is swarming with the lobbyists of the big-business interests. The President is surrounded no longer by the liberal and progressive counsellors who have fashioned the New Deal, but, strangely enough, by the very crowd of bankers and corporation magnates whom he has for so long been fighting. The neutrality law was passed 2 years ago, and signed by the President, for the express purpose of keeping this country out of another European war. Now it is being attacked for the express purpose of getting us into the war by those who know exactly what they want.

This is not to deny that there are good citizens who seek the repeal of this embargo law for reasons purely unselfish and idealistic. They believe that we should not deny arms and munitions to France and England in their struggle against Hitler's Germany, which they regard as involving everything that is precious to our civilization. But do these people know what they are doing? Do they realize that the repeal of the embargo is the first step of an entrance into the European war, which will not end until our boys are being shipped across the seas by the millions to die in strange and lonely lands? If they do realize this, why do they not tell us and urge now, instead of later, that America become one of the active belligerents against Germany? There is no mystery about this process of entering a war. We went through the whole thing a quarter of a century ago. First, we sell goods to the embattled nations. Then we provide loans and credits, which may easily be accomplished by the repeal of the Johnson Act. Then we discover that the nations not accessible to our aid become angry, then hostile, and at last openly our enemy. Then we are attacked and ourselves get angry and talk loudly about honor and national interests and the vindication of democracy, and before we know it are in the war. "Easy is the descent into Avernus." If we change the neutrality law by repealing the embargo we shall have entered the war, to all intents and purposes, at the moment of repeal. All the support of this proposal, consciously or unconsciously, is a move to get us lined up on the battle front with Britain and France. We shall decide within the next few weeks, in this single congressional fight, whether a year or 2 years hence American blood will soak the soil of Europe.

Lastly, there is the political influence which is today headed straight for the goal of war. By this I mean specifically our President, who, despite his many excellent and even great qualities, has yet shown tendencies of thought and action in relation to foreign affairs which constitute elements of danger in the present crisis. In saying this I do not mean to charge or even suggest that Mr. Roosevelt is not a sincere and ardent lover of peace. On more than one occasion and in more than one way he has shown that he desires peace as wholeheartedly as any of us. But he interprets peace in terms of arms and of intervention in war. Already he has chosen sides in this European struggle.

At this moment, in Washington, he is using every means at his disposal to bring about a situation in which he may give aid to France and England in their battle against Germany. As the struggle becomes severe and long continued, he will want to do more than help the Allies with arms and munitions. He will want to intervene actively on their side by loaning them money, sending them ships, giving them our Navy, and at last giving them our boys. Already, before the war is a single month old, Mr. Roosevelt is walking in the footsteps of his great political hero, Woodrow Wilson. Let it be remembered that Wilson was a peace lover also; that he took us into war less than 6 months after he had won an election on the slogan, "He kept us out of war"; that he entered this war sincerely to establish a durable peace and thus to get rid of war forever. It is when I look most intently at Mr. Wilson's example that I fear most dreadfully Mr. Roosevelt's policies. In both cases I see a sincere love of peace, coupled with an indubitable love of power, and an overleaping ambition to use power to dictate peace to a warring world. Mr. Wilson tried it, with results all too terribly familiar. If anybody can tell me how Mr. Roosevelt can succeed where Mr. Wilson failed, I should like to hear.

Such are some of the influences now directed to getting America into this war. If these influences succeed, they will achieve the supreme tragedy of history, for America, the last hope of the world, the last refuge of civilization, will then go down in a common ruin with mankind. For ourselves and for mankind alike, we must stay out of this war that we may be able to do certain indispensable things which we alone can do. First, preserve inviolate within our borders those democratic institutions and principles without which civilization cannot hope to survive; secondly, bring succor to the millions of distressed and dying who will soon be cumbering the earth; thirdly, work, as only a neutral and thus mutually friendly nation can work, to stop the fighting at the earliest possible moment; lastly, seek peace, and see to it, when peace is made, that it is a peace which is merciful and just, and thus calculated to endure. Our fatal mistake in the last war was to sit at the peace table as a belligerent and thus as a friend of the victors. In this war we must plan to sit at the peace table as a neutral, and thus as a friend of humankind.

This is our mission. It will be lost if it is not defended, and it must be defended now if it is to be achieved. Therefore, the slogan of this hour, "Keep America out of war."

Small Business and Its Credit Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY ERNEST G. DRAPER

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Ernest G. Draper, member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, on Small Business and Its Credit Problem. The article was published in the Washington Post of Sunday, October 1, 1939.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMALL BUSINESS AND ITS CREDIT PROBLEM

(By Ernest G. Draper, member, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System)

May I say at the outset that the opinions expressed below are my personal views and in no sense represent an official viewpoint of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

How small is small business? Nobody knows and nobody will ever know, because, in this instance, size is purely relative. A large concern in Noroton, Conn., looks small in New York City.

We can make the picture somewhat clearer by having our definition of small business cover both small and medium-sized concerns. Even then the argument will be endless. So let us make an arbitrary ruling. It will not satisfy everybody but it will come closer to the facts. Let us say that, speaking broadly, a small or medium-sized concern is one which hires 500 or less employees or has total assets of less than $1,000,000. If we use these guides—and they seem to me to be fair—we discover some interesting facts.

Before attempting to give any statistics, may I say that there are a number of ways by which to gage the relative importance of small business in the national economy. If, for instance, you are a private individual and are thinking of purchasing a small concern, you naturally center your efforts upon finding out the asset value of the company, its earning power, the scope of its market, either present or potential, and other facts of that nature. But if you are looking at this problem of small business from the standpoint of the public interest, then the information that you seek will be of an essentially different character. From the standpoint of the public interest—that is, of the people as a whole—there are three essential facts to know about small business. First, what proportion of those employed in industry are employed in small business? Second, what proportion of the national income is earned by small business? And third, what percentage of the total number of corporations and unincorporated enterprises in this country have total assets of less than $1,000,000?

According to a recent survey made by the Twentieth Century Fund, an impartial agency devoted to the dissemination of factual information upon a variety of economic subjects, we find, first, that of those employed in 1929—the latest date available—in all manufacturing industries more than 62 percent were employed in plants hiring 500 workers or less.

We find, second, that of the total national income approximately 60 percent is produced by small unincorporated enterprises and corporations with total assets of less than $1,000,000.

We find, third, that of all the corporations in this country about 95 percent have total assets of less than $1,000,000.

In giving these figures I do not wish to mislead you by exaggerating the importance of small business. For instance, it is true that 95 percent of all corporations are small. But it is also true that these 95 percent own only 14 percent of the total corporate assets in the country, whereas the remaining 5 percent of large corporations own 86 percent of these assets. But when we are judging a problem of this character from the public interest standpoint, we must remember that assets, while most important, do not tell the whole story. The whole story must also include the number of employees dependent upon the successful functioning of small business and also the relative importance of small business in providing the Nation with its yearly income.

From these two vital standpoints our country has a stake in small business and a responsibility toward it which our Government should not shirk. While it may be true that a general recovery cannot be stimulated merely by stimulating small business, nevertheless it is likewise true that we shall never get a broad recovery of large and lasting proportions if we do not see to it that the credit flow to small business is continuous and of sufficiently generous proportions as to satisfy the legitimate needs of all classes of sound small business.

Also, it may be true that, as a result of the European war, all business will expand and that will have its temporary stimulating effect upon small business as well as large industry. Undoubtedly something of this sort may take place. But we must also remember that war conditions will bring about innumerable dislocations, some of more or less violent nature. A small business that was recently regaining a good earning basis may, through no fault of its own, be thrown off balance or permanently crippled by the indirect but devastating effects of a European conflict.

Based upon a wide variety of information which includes Government and private surveys and reports, testimony of various individuals in Government hearings and many unsolicited letters from small-business men, it is my opinion that there are two groups of business enterprises whose needs are not adequately met by existing financial machinery:

1. Those who need short and intermediate credit but whose credit standing at the present level of business activity does not make them acceptable risks for banks. These are not misconceived or mismanaged or insolvent businesses but businesses whose prospects of success are dimmed by the current economic situation.

2. Small- and medium-sized businesses which need loan or equity capital for an intermediate or long period. The growth of Nation-wide business units, the discontinuance of bank affiliates and of underwriting by banks, the increased cost of security issues, and the disappearance of local underwriters have made it difficult for this type of business concern to find long-time credit except at prohibitive cost.

It has been said by many persons that government should not enter further into the field of rendering financial assistance to business, because by so doing it will subsidize many mismanaged, unprofitably operated concerns. I would never advocate that the Government assist in making funds available to such enterprises. However, I do believe that there are many small concerns whose liquid resources have been severely strained by a series of depression losses. There are others who require funds to finance the purchase of new machinery and equipment or to extend or improve plant operations in order to enable them to carry on a more profitable operation.

In years past a substantial portion of outstanding commercial loans held by banks consisted of what would be termed today capital advances, but they were evidenced by short-term paper that was renewed from time to time as it matured. Today the demand is increasing for longer-term credit. These long-term loans are opening an avenue to banks for the expansion of their earning assets. While these loans lack liquidity and marketability, nevertheless many banks have made a number of such advances safely.

In making long- or intermediate-term loans, a bank not only has to consider the nonliquid and nonmarketable character of such assets but must consider the added risks involved, such as an adverse turn in the business cycle during their life or management and technical changes that may occur. The volume of such loans any one bank can make will depend upon the nature of its deposit liabilities; the volume of its holdings of other nonliquid and nonmarketable assets, such as real-estate loans; the quality of such loans available to it; and the ratio of its capital structure to its deposits. The risks involved are such that the Federal Reserve banks as banks of discount for their member banks would be performing the proper functions of a central banking system in assisting commercial banks to make this type of credit available.

Section 10b of the Federal Reserve Act now authorizes a Federal Reserve bank, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, to make an advance to a member bank on its promissory note, with a maturity up to 4 months, when secured "to the satisfaction of such Federal Reserve bank." This makes eligible as security at Federal Reserve banks long- and intermediate-term loans made to business. This provision in the Federal Reserve Act, although providing aid from the Federal Reserve System to member banks in making such loans, does not offer as effective cooperation as is provided for under the limited provisions of section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act. This section authorizes the Federal Reserve banks under certain circumstances and conditions to make loans to business enterprises. However, the statutory limitations of section 13b, which provide that loans can be made only to established commercial and industrial enterprises for working-capital purposes, and that maximum maturities cannot exceed 5 years, do not permit the Federal Reserve banks to operate satisfactorily in meeting the present situation.

In spite of the restricted nature of the present section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act, it may be interesting to note what the Federal Reserve banks have accomplished in making direct advances, advances in cooperation with banks, and commitments to banks covering advances made by such banks, to business enterprises since June 1934.

The Federal Reserve banks have received over 9,300 applications, amounting to $400,000,000. Of these, 2,750 were approved, amounting to $184,000,000. Approximately 1,200, amounting to $60,000,000, were declined because the funds were not to be used for working capital purposes as required by law, or because the applicants were not established industrial or commercial enterprises. Of this grand total of $184,000,000, advances and commitments direct to borrowers amounted to only $38,000,000, whereas the total commitments to and advances through financing institutions amounted to $73,000,000.

To the end of 1938 net earnings on industrial advances, before making provision for losses, amounted to $2,800,000. Determined losses charged off aggregated $160,000, and reserves set aside to take care of estimated losses amounted to $1,865,000. This left net earnings of about $770,000 for the period June 19, 1934, to December 31, 1938. At the present time the Federal Reserve banks have outstanding $15,000,000 in advances and $11,000,000 in commitments. Of the advances outstanding about $2,500,000 are past due 3 months or more. The Reserve banks have acquired about $1,300,000 of miscellaneous assets in connection with the liquidation of defaulted obligations. What the final losses will be is impossible to state at this time, but present indications are that they will not be unduly large.

From the record cited above, you can see that the Federal Reserve System has materially aided banks in meeting the long-term working capital needs of business. However, it is undoubtedly true that the restrictions placed upon the Reserve banks, to which I have referred, have prevented the granting of many loans that could have otherwise been made. For this reason, it is my belief that a plan for the creation of an Industrial Loan Corporation as an integral part of the Federal Reserve System, using the Federal Reserve banks and branches as its field force, would be of great assistance to both banks and business enterprises, both in the field of long-term financing and in those other situations mentioned previously. This is the plan originally suggested by Chairman Eccles before a congressional committee last spring.

The Federal Reserve banks have offices already established in 36 cities (12 Federal Reserve banks and 24 branches). These offices are widely distributed in the various trade areas throughout the country, and are well qualified for such service, because of their knowledge of business and economic conditions in their respective districts and their close contacts with local banking institutions. With this organization already in existence, it would be possible to commence operations with a minimum of delay and expense. Also operations could be expanded or contracted from time to time in accordance with changing conditions. The experience gained by the Board of Governors and the Federal Reserve banks in connection with industrial loan operations during the past 5 years would be of great aid to them in performing this service.

Briefly the plan is this: Funds in the Treasury now set aside or used for industrial loans under the provisions of section 13b—about $139,000,000—would be turned over to an industrial-loan corporation. This would involve no additional borrowing or increase in the public debt. The Board of Governors would be the board of directors of this corporation, and the 12 Federal Reserve banks with their 24 branches would be the field agents to pass on applications. In this way prompt and economical action would be assured by utilizing existing machinery and experienced personnel.

The corporation would make loans or commitments or acquire preferred stock, but not more than $1,000,000 to any one borrower. Intermediate or long-term loans could be made by private lenders and insured banks protected by commitments of the corporation.

The corporation would have $100,000,000 of capital and $39,000,000 of surplus. It would have power to issue $500,000,000 of Government-guaranteed debentures. Upon liquidation, all remaining assets would go to the United States Government. One important feature of the plan would be to set aside, out of its surplus, $25,000,000 for an insurance fund for small loans not exceeding $25,000. The industrial-loan corporation would guarantee 10 percent of any lender's aggregate insured loans, so that the loss on any loan even up to 100 percent would be absorbed by the corporation, so long as aggregate losses did not exceed one-tenth of the lender's insured loans. The principle behind this plan is the same as that in title I of F. H. A. The corporation's possible losses on insured loans would be limited to the $25,000,000 set aside as an insurance fund. It has been estimated that the aggregate cost to the borrower, including insurance and service charges, would not exceed 6 percent.

In making this proposal my only object is to offer what seems to me to be a practical plan for meeting the problem as it exists today. This plan does not provide for the creation of a new Government credit-granting agency, but broadens the powers of the Federal Reserve System in order to enable it to be of more effective assistance to banks and business.

Why not get to the bottom of this problem once and for all by devising legislation which is simple in character, inexpensive in operation, and cooperative in its approach? In this way we could meet the present situation squarely and without reliance on an entirely new set-up of elaborate and perhaps unwieldly machinery, but with the assistance of a flexible, permanent Federal agency such as the Federal Reserve System. Then if it should develop, after the passage of such simplified legislation, that the need is not as serious as anticipated, no great harm would be done and no great expense incurred. If, however, the need should prove to be greater than anticipated, the flexible machinery of this new plan would take care of this increase in demand regardless of volume.

This plan seems to me to offer the most effective solution to the difficulties in which a large and important sector of our industrial economy finds itself bogged down. The discouraging condition of small business is not primarily a result of its own inefficiency. It exists because of powerful economic disturbances over which it has no control and against which it cannot individually wage a successful fight without some reasonable amount of cooperation from a permanent public-interest agency.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN, OF MISSOURI, AT CARUTHERSVILLE, MO., OCTOBER 8, 1939

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on October 8 the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] delivered at Caruthersville, Mo., a very interesting address on the historical background of our problem of remaining out of war. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a very great pleasure and a privilege to be here today with my many friends. I shall always be grateful to this great section of the State, because you believed in me when I needed you, and I shall never forget it.

I know that you are interested in the special session of Congress, and this being the Sabbath Day I am going to talk to you a little while on peace. My text will be from the Sermon on the Mount, "Love Thy Neighbor."

I shall begin by praying to the great Creator of Heaven and Earth, the Divine Father of us all, to give to our world rulers and to those in authority wisdom and the ability to forget their supposed wrongs and to earnestly try to bring everlasting peace and happiness to this troubled world.

The present situation in Europe has been brought about by greed and selfishness and by a refusal of the several nationalities which make up the population of that continent to learn to love their neighbors.

There are the Italians, who have been taught to hate Frenchmen and Englishmen; Russians, who are taught that Greeks, Turks, and Japs are devils and inferior races. Then there are the Germans, who by propaganda have been brought to a state where they hate all who are not of Tuetonic descent. The words "love" and "tolerance" have been eliminated from the German vocabulary. They've become persecutors and robbers of other races and nationalities. They have even gone so far as to teach that the Prince of Peace was an imposter because he was a Jew.

The three dictators, Russian, German, and Italian, have gone back to a code little short of cave-man savagery. They've used this magnificent machine age of ours to destroy our vaunted civilization, and I am here to tell you that if there isn't a moral reawakening in high places in this old world, we'll go into another and darker age than the tenth century ever was. The role of this great Republic is to save civilization. We must keep out of war. We must keep out of brawls, hates, and prejudices of that Old World mess, and to do it we must use the best brains and judgment of which we are capable.

Four great men have walked across the world stage and have tried to solve the problems now troubling mankind in Euorpe. Those four men were Caesar, King Henry the Fourth of France, Napoleon, and Woodrow Wilson. They all failed magnificently.

Caesar and Napoleon wanted to place the whole continent of Europe, Asia, and Africa (and they are really one continent) under the same hegemony, break down the trade barriers, and use their unlimited resources for the benefit of the whole population. Caesar was assassinated before he finished his plan and no successor of his had his ability or insight.

Napoleon almost succeeded, and then he went to Russia. Hitler is trying to do what Napoleon did. He's gone to Russia, too. I wonder if he'll wind up as the great Frenchman did.

King Henry's plea was a United States of Europe with a congress and a senate to work out the difficulties of the various states, take down the trade barriers, live and let live. He also was assassinated before he could accomplish his purpose.

None of you have forgotten Woodrow Wilson and his 16 points for peace. He was destroyed by European power politics as played by Lloyd George and Clemenceau, and by the United States Senate. His grand plan was almost the same one that Henry the Fourth proposed. It failed, and Europe is right back where Julius Caesar left off. His 16 points for peace are just as good today as ever.

We went into the World War of 1914–18 with high hopes and the ideals of a crusade, and we came out disillusioned and went on a mad debauch of our own. Professional pacifists and professional neutrality preachers have endeavored to make the Nation believe that we went into that war for profits and for gain; that we were drawn in by munition makers and J. P. Morgan. Nothing is farther from the truth. We went in because more than 500 American lives had been ruthlessly taken by the same savage policy now being pursued by the German Government.

For 4 years the Senate of the United States has been groping for a method to keep us out of war. The present so-called Neutrality Act is the result of that keep-us-out-of-war sentiment. It isn't a neutrality act. It is a domestic attempt to stay out of trouble. The President in his message to the special session emphasized the fact that all sides and all factions honestly want to keep us out of war.

I honestly believe that the proposed amendment to the present law will come more nearly doing that than if the present law is not amended. Our entry into the last war was directly caused by the sinking of American ships and the killing of American citizens in the war zone. We propose to stop American citizens and American ships from taking that risk. We propose to strengthen our position as a neutral. We are not abandoning our so-called neutrality legislation at all. We propose a better law in its place. The proposed law provides that Congress, as well as the President, may put the provisions of the law into effect by declaring a war is in existence.

The proposed law would lift the arms embargo, but it provides that American vessels may not transport goods or passengers to nations at war or into combat zones. It would provide that title to purchases made by a nation at war, or by one of its nationals, shall pass before the merchandise leaves our shores. It makes "cash and carry" mandatory. It creates a munitions-control board which would be responsible for keeping records on munitions and arms sales. This board would be required to make reports to Congress every 6 months.

The present law and the one proposed forbid the arming of American merchant vessels and forbid the solicitation of funds in this country for belligerents except for Red Cross and relief activities.

No loans may be made to nations at war. They must pay cash and transport their purchases in their own ships. These self-imposed restrictions are something new under the sun. We are honestly endeavoring to prevent incidents that may involve us in the war. We are trying to profit by past experience. No person is wise enough to foresee the future. No Member of Congress is wise enough to foretell what may happen. But we all know that we must stay out of war. We all know that it was only after the indiscriminate sinking of American ships and the murder of American citizens on those ships that the United States entered the war.

Those ships carried wheat, oil, pig iron, spelter, flax, and other merchandise. Some of them carried munitions. They were American ships, manned by American sailors and, in some instances, carried American passengers. They were operating in the war zone. They were carrying goods to belligerents. Under the proposed law that will not happen. Under the present law it can and may happen.

Now, as to the sale of munitions, I am of the opinion that we should not help the thugs among nations by refusing to sell arms to our friends. We virtually say to aggressor nations, "We'll sell you arms and ammunition in peacetime and help you get ready to attack those nations who have not put on an armament race, who have tried to live peaceably with their neighbors, those nations who maintain no bunds or Silver Shirts or Communist parties to help undermine our institutions; but when war comes we'll help you by not letting our friends buy arms and munitions in our markets."

I think it is to our interest, our very selfish interests, to lift the embargo. Our best insurance for peace, as George Washington said, is to be prepared for war. Our factories, if geared up to manufacture implements of war for foreign sales, will be in position to supply us if we need to be supplied, which God forbid. I hope—we all hope—we'll never have to face that contingency.

We shouldn't, however, sit idly by and let a catastrophe come upon us as England and France have done.

I have read everything I can get on this subject; have listened carefully to the Senate debate; and I have come to the conclusion that the measure reported to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee should become the law in substantially its present form.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 9 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, OF NEW YORK, OCTOBER 7, 1939

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a most eloquent and illuminating address on the subject of neutrality delivered by my colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Saturday, October 7, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Night after night over the air, you have heard debates about how to change or whether to change the present Neutrality Act. Day after day in the public press you have read the editorials pro and con on the Neutrality Act.

In order to avoid repetition, in order to direct your attention to an issue far closer to your welfare and your interest than the form of any particular law, I want to change the whole emphasis of this discussion.

The sole vital concern of the American people in the present international situation, the one desire that burns passionately and continuously within them, is to keep America at peace with all the world. This overpowering emotion subordinates all other issues and reduces them to their proper magnitude. If I may paraphrase a great statement made by Abraham Lincoln, I would say this:

If America can best be kept at peace by retaining the Neutrality Act in its present form, that is what the American people are for. If America can best be kept at peace by repealing the Neutrality Act in its entirety, that is what the American people are for. And if America can best be kept at peace by retaining the act in part and revising it in part, that and that alone is what the American people want.

It is in this spirit, animated by this sole objective, that all the Members of Congress are approaching the legislative questions now before them. The differences are honest differences about methods. My own careful study has convinced me profoundly that neither the repeal of the old law nor its retention in its present form can best safeguard our neutrality and our peace. I feel as certain as anyone can be that in view of changing world circumstances, changes in the old law must be made.

The pending bill makes these changes. It profits by the unfortunate experience which took us into the last World War. It draws upon the experience that has kept us through all our history a peace-loving Nation, and through almost all our history a peaceful Nation.

Now what are these changes and what would they accomplish?

Under the present law, except for munitions, American ships and American seamen can carry any American-made goods owned by American citizens, to be sold in any port in the world. Under the present law, an American ship, if not stopped by the British Navy, can sail into the North Sea and sell steel to Germany, to be made into shells or cannon. Under the present law, if not sunk by a German submarine, an American ship manned by American seamen can carry American-owned cotton to Liverpool, to be sold to the Allies and made into explosives.

In short, under the present law, about 90 percent of all the articles we sold to Europe during the last war before we entered it—90 percent of the goods that the belligerents in Europe today would normally want to buy from us to feed their war machines and the people backing up their war machines—can be carried across the seas on American boats by American seamen, if not stopped or sunk by one of the belligerent nations.

But in these crucial words, "if not stopped or sunk," we have what experience and common sense tell every thinking person is the most serious threat of war to the United States.

For when nations are at war, such high-sounding terms as international rights and freedom of the seas are conveniently forgotten. When nations are at war, their vital self-interest will not permit them indefinitely to allow the free passage of supplies to their enemies.

On the other hand, no self-respecting nation, American least of all, can allow its ships and its nationals to be attacked upon the high seas, even by nations which are fighting for their lives.

And because of the conflict between these two hard facts, there is only one realistic course for America to follow if it wants to avoid the causes of war and at the same time maintain its dignity and self-respect. This course is for the American Congress absolutely to prohibit American ships from carrying American passengers or American goods of any kind to any belligerent nation, or to proceed through any combat areas. The bill provides that any belligerent nation which wants to purchase American goods must come and get them, must take title to them before they leave our shores, must carry them across the waters in their own boats and at their own risk. There is no possible way that this kind of commerce can involve America in a war.

Now what is the second main step that the pending bill takes to keep America at peace? Under the present law, there is a limited restriction against arming American ships engaged in trading with the belligerents. The pending bill not only prohibits such trading altogether, but also prohibits the arming of any American merchant ships sailing anywhere on the seven seas. If a merchant vessel is armed, what is to prevent the suspicion that instead of being the ship of a neutral nation, it is the ship of a nation at war, flying the wrong flag? What is to prevent the suspicion, if a vessel is armed, that no matter what its seeming destination, it is headed directly or indirectly toward the war zone and to the aid of some belligerent? Our own history shows clearly that the arming of neutral merchant vessels leads to incidents which threaten to involve them in the conflict.

If we are determined to remain at peace with the world, we do not need and do not want to arm our merchant vessels. America has its Navy on both coasts to protect it from any possible aggression. In our Navy, expanded to meet the needs of these uncertain times, America can well rely for its peace and its security.

The third important step in the direction of peace is to prevent American investments in warring nations, which may draw America nearer to war. The pending bill places additional and drastic restrictions on the financing of any business transactions with the belligerents. In place of the law now in effect permitting commercial credits without clear limitations, the new bill insists that warring nations must buy our goods on a cash basis, or at most a 90-day credit basis, without renewal. A single default even on these restricted conditions will require return to a mandatory cash basis. For myself, I would make assurance doubly sure by requiring belligerents to pay cash in every case. There must be no American soldiers following American loans to fight on foreign ground.

It is evident that none of these three vitally important provisions has anything to do with the arms embargo. Why, then, has the pending bill anything to do with the arms embargo?

The bill seeks merely to make the munitions provision of the present law consistent with the three all-important steps in the direction of peace which I have already discussed. If these changes will strengthen our neutrality under international law, if these changes will help to keep us out of war, the remainder of our neutrality law can and should be made consistent with them.

It is not consistent to prohibit the sale of 10 percent of the supplies a warring nation may need while permitting the sale and transportation in our own boats of the other 90 percent they need just as badly. It is not consistent to forbid the sale of finished airplanes while permitting the sale and carriage in our own boats of raw and semifinished materials to make those airplanes, or of high-test motor fuel to fly them. It is not consistent to forbid foreign ships to come here to buy some war materials but to allow our ships to carry into the perilous war zones other war materials.

A neutrality policy which in time of war among other nations is so unbalanced and inconsistent cannot be a guardian of American peace nor promote good will on the part of all nations toward America. As a final step toward peace, therefore, the pending bill removes the inconsistencies of the present law. It places an embargo, not upon a few arbitrarily selected commodities but upon all American ships, seamen, and passengers from getting into danger. It places an embargo on the flotation of extensive credits that would tie us up too closely with those at war. It lifts the embargo on all materials that anyone wants to buy here, pay for here, and carry away without risk to us.

A year ago, in charting our relations with the outside world, I declared to the people of my State: "I will never vote to send troops to Europe to fight in any war. I am unalterably opposed to our country's becoming involved in the rivalries and the hatreds of the European Continent. Our policy should be to go about our peaceful missions, without fear of anyone and without anyone's favor, taking sides with none, and free from entanglements with all."

I stand squarely upon that statement today, confident that it expresses America's convictions, confident that we may rest securely upon our strength, our national unity, and the good will we hold toward all mankind and deserve of all mankind.

Lloyd George Looks to America To Invite Peace-Solution Parley

STATEMENT BY HON. DAVID LLOYD GEORGE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a statement made by Hon. David Lloyd George, Prime Minister of the British Empire during the World War, which I hope every Member will take time to read.

The matter referred to follows:

LLOYD GEORGE LOOKS TO AMERICA TO INVITE PEACE-SOLUTION PARLEY—PRECIPITATE AND FURIOUS REPLY TO HITLER'S OFFER MAY DRIVE SOVIET ACTIVELY INTO ENEMY CAMP, HE WRITES

(By David Lloyd George)

LONDON, October 8.—The war between the western powers and Germany has not yet begun in earnest—on land, on sea, or in the air. There have been minor conflicts in the air, but the thousands of bombers and fighters which each of the parties has at its command have not yet clashed or displayed to any appreciable degree their terrible destructive power. The fight on land is mainly a long-distance artillery duel designed to clear the ground in front of the real scene of the struggle. The opposing forces have not yet come to grips.

There has been some submarine activity, with diminishing results for the assailants and increasing successes for the defenders, but no one believes the German attack on allied shipping has yet been fully developed. The airplane has not so far been called to the aid of the submarine. Activities and counteractivities at sea have only so far revealed the probability that the struggle is to be conducted as a war of strangulation. We are effectively blockading Germany on the most important sea frontiers. Germany is retaliating by attacking all neutral vessels that carry food or materials to Britain.

The rival powers make the most of every incident in this preliminary fencing. The grim reality has not started. What are combatants waiting for?
